TITLE 46
CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

CHAPTER 1
GENERAL PROVISIONS

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

1991 Chapter Comments: These statutes govern the practice and procedure in all criminal proceedings in the courts of Montana except when provision for a different procedure is specifically provided by law.

These statutes are intended to provide for the just determination of all criminal proceedings. The statutes must be construed to secure simplicity in procedure, fairness in administration, and elimination of unjustifiable expense and delay.

Chapter Compiler's Comments

Section Not Codified: Section 95-202, R.C.M. 1947, was not codified in the MCA because it is redundant with 1-2-105. This section has not been repealed and is still valid law. Citation may be made to sec. 1, Ch. 196, L. 1967.

Chapter Case Notes

Police Commission Hearings: In view of the limited nature of the proceedings and the lack of legal expertise on the part of the Commissioners, the provisions of this title do not govern Police Commission hearings. Steer v. Missoula, 169 M 389, 547 P2d 843 (1976).

Case Notes

Search Warrant Procedural Irregularity Not Affecting Defendant's Substantial Rights: Defendant contended that because of a procedural error on the part of investigating officers who were executing a search warrant, the District Court erred when it did not suppress the seized evidence. The error was detected and corrected within 24 hours. An error in the manner in which notice of seized articles is given is an irregularity in the proceedings that does not affect the substantial rights of the accused and thus does not constitute reversible error. The corrected receipt effectively gave defendant notice of seized items. St. v. Abe, 1998 MT 206, 290 M 393, 965 P2d 882, 55 St. Rep. 876 (1998).

Appeal of Misdemeanor Conviction From Justice's Court to District Court — No Record of Oral Pronouncement of Sentence in Justice's Court — District Court Jurisdiction Upheld: Tweedy was convicted by a Justice's Court jury of misdemeanor assault and was scheduled for sentencing on April 18, 1989. On April 19, Tweedy filed a notice of appeal to the District Court. The Justice's Court filed its sentencing order on May 3. Later, in response to a motion by Tweedy to dismiss the underlying charge, the state contended that the District Court had not acquired jurisdiction over Tweedy. The Supreme Court held that since there was no evidence in the record that the sentencing hearing scheduled for April 18 did not, in fact, take place and since, under St. v. Mortenson, 175 M 403, 574 P2d 581 (1978), appeal may be taken within 10 days after sentence is orally pronounced in open court, Tweedy's notice of appeal was timely filed and the District Court had jurisdiction over the case. The Supreme Court also noted that the later enactment of 46-18-116, which applies to Justices' Courts by virtue of this section, requiring a signed judgment on the record, should eliminate confusion in the future regarding when the statutory time for appeal begins to run. St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996).

Guilty Plea Not to Be in Writing: Both 46-12-201, regarding the arraignment of an accused, and 46-17-201, regarding the procedure applicable to a plea in Justice's Court, require that a defendant appear in open court, that there be actual communication between the judge and defendant, that the judge first make the requisite inquiries of and provide mandated information to the defendant, and that a plea be accepted as part of that communicative process. There is no provision in either statute that allows a judge to accept a guilty plea from a defendant in either a felony or misdemeanor case through the expedient of the defendant or defendant's counsel simply filing a written plea with the court. The Supreme Court expressed its disapproval of the practice and admonished state courts to comply with the statutory mandates. However, in this case, defendant was at all times represented by counsel, who was personally involved in the written plea. Because defendant's substantive rights were not affected, acceptance of the written guilty plea by the trial court was allowed to stand. St. v. Schneiderhan, 261 M 161, 862 P2d 37, 50 St. Rep. 1242 (1993).

Compiler's Comments

2001 Amendment: Chapter 303 inserted definition of advanced practice registered nurse; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 20, 2001.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 395 in definition of conviction before "plea" inserted "or nolo contendere"; in definition of sentence after "plea" inserted "of guilty or nolo contendere"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 546 in definition of parole, in two places, substituted "board of pardons and parole" for "board of pardons"; and in definitions of parole and probation substituted "department of corrections" for "department of corrections and human services". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 deleted definition of concealment that read: ""Concealment" means any act or deception done purposely or knowingly upon or outside the premises of a wholesale or retail store or other mercantile establishment with the intent to deprive the merchant of all or part of the value of the merchandise."

Name Change: The Code Commissioner changed "department of institutions" to "department of corrections and human services", pursuant to sec. 1, Ch. 262, L. 1991, directing the Code Commissioner to make the change wherever necessary in the Montana Code Annotated. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Case Notes

Aggravated Assault as Lesser Included Offense of Felony Homicide — Merger of Offenses — Conviction for Both Offenses Error: Russell was convicted of felony homicide and aggravated assault. Aggravated assault was charged as the predicate offense for charging felony homicide.

Russell asserted that because the felony homicide conviction was predicated on the same assault, the conviction for aggravated assault should be dismissed. The District Court declined to dismiss the assault conviction, but on appeal the Supreme Court reversed. A defendant cannot be found guilty of felony homicide without having committed a predicate felony offense. When the offenses are charged in that fashion, the offenses merge and the predicate offense becomes a lesser included offense of felony homicide. Therefore, the District Court erred by not granting Russell's motion to dismiss the lesser included offense of aggravated assault after being convicted of felony murder. St. v. Russell, 2008 MT 417, 347 M 301, 198 P3d 271 (2008).

Statements Made in Another State Without Effect on Montana Homicide Proceedings — Right to Counsel "Offense Specific": Schneider was stopped in Arizona while trying to gain entry into Mexico, and while detained, Schneider confessed to two murders in Montana. At the time of arrest, Schneider was on probation for felony theft in Montana and was prohibited from leaving the state without permission. Arizona charged Schneider with being a fugitive from justice and appointed a public defender. A Montana court moved to revoke Schneider's probation, and Montana officers went to Arizona to interrogate Schneider regarding the murders. Schneider waived his Miranda rights and did not request counsel during questioning, during which he made incriminating statements regarding involvement in the murders. Montana subsequently charged Schneider with two counts of accountability for deliberate homicide. Schneider moved to suppress the statements made in Arizona on grounds that his right to counsel was violated, but the motion was denied based on the holding in Texas v. Cobb, 532 US 162 (2001), and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Under Cobb, the right to counsel is "offense specific", meaning that it only applies with respect to the charged or related offense and cannot be invoked once for all future prosecutions. Because the right to counsel in the Montana Constitution is consistent with Art. VI of the U.S. Constitution, the court declined Schneider's request to extend any further protection under Montana law beyond that expressed in Cobb. The constitution does not negate society's interest in the ability of police to talk to witnesses and suspects, even those charged with other offenses. In addition, regarding Schneider's argument that the Arizona statement should be suppressed under the "same transaction" rule, the Arizona case was not before the Montana court and had no effect on the disposition of the issues. Thus, Schneider's statements made in connection with the Arizona fugitive charge were admissible in the Montana homicide proceedings, and Schneider's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Schneider, 2008 MT 408, 347 M 215, 197 P3d 1020 (2008), following St. v. Reavley, 2003 MT 298, 318 M 150, 79 P3d 270 (2003).

Bond Forfeiture Not Generally Synonymous With Conviction — No Double Jeopardy for Assault Proceedings: Toth forfeited bond for disorderly conduct that occurred on the same day that he was charged with assault with a weapon. Toth claimed that if the bond forfeiture arose from the same events that led to the assault charge, double jeopardy would bar further conviction for assault. The Supreme Court disagreed. Absent specific legislation to that effect, bond forfeiture is not generally synonymous with a conviction for double jeopardy purposes. Bond forfeiture is essentially a civil action and is not admissible as evidence in any other civil action, but bond forfeiture is included within the definition of conviction for particular statutorily delineated purposes only, not including assault. Thus, even if Toth's felony assault charge bond forfeiture arose out of the same transaction as the disorderly conduct, jeopardy did not attach by the bond forfeiture, so Toth's claim failed. St. v. Toth, 2008 MT 404, 347 M 184, 197 P3d 1013 (2008). See also Scott v. S. Carolina, 513 SE 2d 100 (S.C. 1999).

Continuation of Trial Not Double Jeopardy Violation: Based on pretrial conversations with both counsel, a Justice's Court Judge anticipated an abbreviated bench trial designed to get Barron's DUI case through Justice's Court as quickly as possible so that Barron could then receive a trial de novo in District Court. However, defense counsel immediately began lodging objections, and the judge realized that the proceedings would not be quickly resolved. After concluding that neither party was ready for a more full-blown proceeding, the judge decided in the interests of justice to continue the trial to another date when the parties could be more fully prepared and more time could be allotted for trial. Defense counsel subsequently objected to the continuance on double jeopardy grounds, and following conviction and appeal to District Court, defense counsel again raised the issue, asserting that the trial following the continuation in Justice's Court constituted double jeopardy and warranted dismissal of the charges. The District Court declined to dismiss the charges, and Barron appealed. The Supreme Court considered whether Barron had been subjected to double jeopardy when the Justice's Court continued the initial bench trial and decided that no double jeopardy violation occurred. The trial following the lawful continuance did not constitute a new trial because the Justice's Court did not issue any findings or reach a verdict following the initial hearing, the state did not use the continuance to encourage the judge to reexamine evidence presented in the initial hearing, and Barron was not subjected to multiple punishments for the same offense. Double jeopardy did not apply because Barron was not subject to a second or successive trial on the underlying charges. St. v. Barron, 2008 MT 69, 342 M 100, 179 P3d 519 (2008).

Remand or Order to Lift Stay Unnecessary Upon Affirmation by Appellate Court — Supreme Court Jurisdiction of Municipal Court Appeal Affirmed but Remanded by District Court: A Municipal Court sentenced Costa for misdemeanor traffic offenses, then stayed imposition of sentence pending Costa's appeal to District Court. The District Court affirmed judgment and remanded to the Municipal Court for imposition of sentence. The question then arose as to whether the Supreme Court had jurisdiction to address the District Court's decision. The Supreme Court noted that the definition of remand is to send something back for further action; however, the Legislature did not intend to require an appellate court to formally remand in cases involving affirmed criminal judgments. In addition, it is unnecessary for an appellate court to direct that a stay pending appeal be lifted once a defendant has exhausted the right to appeal and the underlying judgment and sentence have been affirmed. Therefore, the District Court's remand was premature, unnecessary, and of no immediate consequence and had no effect on the Municipal Court's final judgment and sentence. The Municipal Court stayed Costa's sentence pending appeal, which presumably encompassed an appeal to the Supreme Court, so because the District Court's remand was unnecessary, the Supreme Court had jurisdiction over Costa's appeal. Billings v. Costa, 2006 MT 181, 333 M 84, 140 P3d 1070 (2006).

Failure to Give Jury Instruction on Lesser Included Offense of Unlawful Restraint in Aggravated Kidnapping Trial — Reversible Error: In Meyer's aggravated kidnapping trial, Meyer requested a jury instruction allowing the jury to consider unlawful restraint as a lesser included offense, but the instruction was denied. The Supreme Court noted that what constitutes isolation in terms of kidnapping and unlawful restraint is an issue for the trier of fact to decide, as long as there is some basis in the evidence for its conclusion. The jury as trier of fact in this case did not receive full and fair instructions on the applicable law and thus was not allowed to consider whether Meyer was guilty of the lesser included offense of unlawful restraint in light of the evidence. The judgment was reversed, and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Meyer, 2005 MT 215, 328 M 247, 119 P3d 1214 (2005).

Washington Youth Sexual Offender Required to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender if Residing in Montana: At age 15, Villanueva was adjudicated guilty of first degree rape in Washington state and was later required to register for life in that state as a sexual offender. Villanueva subsequently moved to Montana where he resided for 6 weeks. After being arrested for a domestic disturbance, it was discovered that Villanueva had not registered as a sexual or violent offender in Montana, and he was charged with failure to register. Villanueva contended that Montana law did not apply to his Washington registration requirement because he did not meet the definition of sexual or violent offender under 46-23-502 and because a 1989 Attorney General's opinion held that juveniles adjudicated delinquent under the Montana Youth Court Act whose cases have not been transferred to District Court are not required to register. Villanueva moved to dismiss the charge, but the District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the Washington definition of sexual offender may not have been identical to the Montana definition, Villanueva was nevertheless a sexual offender under Washington law and was therefore required to register in Montana under 46-23-504. Further, Villanueva could not rely on the Attorney General's opinion because he was not adjudicated under the Montana Youth Court Act. The Supreme Court noted that the Washington sexual offender registration law also required Villanueva to register in another state if he changed state residency, so under both Washington and Montana law, Villanueva was required to register as a sexual offender. Villanueva's motion to dismiss was properly denied. St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

Violation of City Ordinances Constituting Particularized Suspicion for Investigative Stop: An officer saw Todd drive into a closed city park and exit his vehicle with an open beer. When the officer approached Todd's vehicle to inform him that the park was closed and that the city had an open container ordinance, the officer observed that Todd appeared to be intoxicated, and Todd was arrested for DUI. Todd moved to dismiss on grounds that the officer lacked a particularized suspicion to investigate because Todd had not broken any driving laws. The Supreme Court disagreed. A particularized suspicion exists if an officer believes that a person or occupant of a vehicle has committed, is committing, or is about to commit an offense, including a violation of a city ordinance. Thus, Todd's violation of the city ordinances was sufficient to provide the officer with a particularized suspicion of an offense to obtain or verify an account of Todd's presence or conduct, and based on the officer's subsequent observations of objective data indicating Todd's intoxication, the investigative stop was justified. Todd's motion to dismiss was properly denied, and Todd's DUI conviction was affirmed. St. v. Todd, 2005 MT 108, 327 M 65, 111 P3d 677 (2005).

Misinformation in Plea Agreement and Incomplete Information Provided by District Court Raising Doubt as to Intelligent Guilty Plea — Denial of Withdrawal of Plea Reversed: Rave was charged with sexual assault with bodily injury. Following advice of counsel, Rave accepted a plea agreement and pleaded guilty. Prior to sentencing, Rave moved to withdraw the guilty plea, but the motion was denied, and Rave was sentenced pursuant to the plea agreement. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the plea agreement erroneously advised Rave that sexual assault may be a lesser included felony offense and that the penalty was the same as for sexual assault with bodily injury when, in fact, the lesser included offense was a misdemeanor. In addition, the District Court did not correct the misinformation in the plea agreement when accepting the guilty plea, so Rave could not have made a knowing, intelligent, and voluntary plea. Thus, the Supreme Court reversed the denial of Rave's motion to withdraw the guilty plea and remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Rave, 2005 MT 78, 326 M 398, 109 P3d 753 (2005).

Criminal Possession of Dangerous Drugs, but Not Possession of Precursors to Dangerous Drugs, Considered Lesser Included Offense of Criminal Production or Manufacture of Dangerous Drugs by Accountability: Becker was convicted of criminal possession of dangerous drugs, accountability for criminal production or manufacture of dangerous drugs, and criminal possession of precursors to dangerous drugs. However, because the production or manufacture of dangerous drugs cannot be a criminal act until the drug has been created, the state had to first prove that Becker or one of his codefendants possessed drugs in order to convict Becker on the charge of producing or manufacturing those same drugs. Read together, 46-11-410(2)(a) and subsection (9)(a) of this section barred Becker's conviction for both criminal possession of dangerous drugs and accountability for criminal production or manufacture of dangerous drugs because criminal possession is a lesser included offense of criminal production or manufacture of dangerous drugs. However, criminal possession of precursors to dangerous drugs is not a lesser included offense of accountability for criminal production or manufacture of dangerous drugs. Thus, the Supreme Court reversed the criminal possession conviction and ordered resentencing on only the criminal possession of precursors and accountability for criminal production or manufacture. St. v. Becker, 2005 MT 75, 326 M 364, 110 P3d 1 (2005). See also St. v. Peterson, 227 M 511, 744 P2d 870 (1987).

Failure of Counsel to Argue Included Offenses Under State Law Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Becker was convicted of criminal possession of dangerous drugs, accountability for criminal production or manufacture of dangerous drugs, and criminal possession of precursors to dangerous drugs. On appeal, Becker argued that he should have been convicted only of criminal production or manufacture by accountability because the other two charges were part of the manufacturing process and that failure to include the other charges violated his due process rights. The Supreme Court declined to address the double jeopardy issue under the plain error doctrine because Becker raised it for the first time on appeal. However, the court found it appropriate to address the issue under Becker's ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Becker's counsel's failure to include all the relevant charges in a dismissal motion and to rely on the proper statutory grounds for dismissal constituted deficient performance under the first prong of the Strickland test. The second Strickland prong was also met because Becker was prejudiced by counsel's deficient performance, inasmuch as there was a reasonable probability that the result of the proceeding would have been different but for counsel's errors. The Supreme Court thus vacated the convictions and remanded for resentencing. St. v. Becker, 2005 MT 75, 326 M 364, 110 P3d 1 (2005). See also St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001).

Misdemeanor Assault Not Lesser Included Offense of Sexual Assault — Denial of Lesser Included Offense Instruction Not Error: In a sexual assault trial, Cameron requested a jury instruction that misdemeanor assault was a lesser included offense of sexual assault. The request was denied. On appeal, Cameron raised several arguments regarding the lesser included offense and claimed error in denial of the instruction. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 306, 968 P2d 705 (1998), two criteria must be met before a defendant is entitled to a lesser offense instruction: (1) the offense must actually constitute a lesser included offense of the offense charged; and (2) there must be sufficient evidence to support the lesser included offense instruction. The court examined the elements of both offenses and concluded that the elements of misdemeanor assault and sexual assault are not similar and do not overlap. Thus, misdemeanor assault is not a lesser included offense of sexual assault. The jury was therefore properly instructed, and the sexual assault conviction was affirmed. St. v. Cameron, 2005 MT 32, 326 M 51, 106 P3d 1189 (2005), followed in St. v. Gerstner, 2009 MT 303, 353 M 86, 219 P3d 866 (2009).

Assault With Weapon Not Lesser Included Offense of Assault of Peace Officer — No Double Jeopardy in Convicting of Both Offenses: Matt was charged with assault with a weapon and with assault on a peace officer. Matt pleaded guilty to assault on a peace officer and moved to dismiss the assault with a weapon charge, contending that it was a lesser included offense of assault on a peace officer and that prosecution for assault with a weapon therefore violated Matt's double jeopardy rights. The Supreme Court noted that each offense requires proof of an element not included in the other offense, so assault with a weapon is not a lesser included offense of assault on a peace officer. Thus, prosecution of both offenses did not violate Matt's constitutional or statutory double jeopardy protections, and both convictions were affirmed. St. v. Matt, 2005 MT 9, 325 M 340, 106 P3d 530 (2005), following St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371 (1999).

Endangering Welfare of Children Not Lesser Included Offense of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: At a felony sexual intercourse without consent trial, Grindheim requested a jury instruction on a lesser included offense of endangering the welfare of a child. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Because the elements of the crimes are different and require different elements of proof, endangering the welfare of a child cannot be considered a lesser included offense of sexual intercourse without consent. St. v. Grindheim, 2004 MT 311, 323 M 519, 101 P3d 267 (2004). See also St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371 (1999).

Criminal Endangerment, Negligent Endangerment, and Partner or Family Member Assault Not Considered Lesser Included Offenses of Aggravated Assault: At trial for aggravated assault, the District Court refused Hoffman's request of lesser included offense instructions on the offenses of criminal endangerment, negligent endangerment, and partner or family member assault, and Hoffman appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Under subsection (8)(a) of this section, a lesser included offense is one that is established by proof of the same or less than all the facts required to establish commission of the offense charged, while under subsection (8)(c) of this section, a lesser included offense is one that differs from the offense charged only in the respect that a lesser kind of culpability suffices to establish its commission. Although Hoffman made prefatory reference to both subsections, the substance of Hoffman's argument focused entirely on subsection (8)(c), and the Supreme Court declined to address arguments related to subsection (8)(a) that were raised for the first time on appeal. It is incumbent on counsel to specify at trial which subsection is being relied upon. Subsection (8)(c) does not support a conclusion that criminal endangerment, negligent endangerment, or partner or family member assault is a lesser included offense of aggravated assault. The District Court's properly concluded that the offenses were too dissimilar to warrant a lesser included offense instruction. St. v. Hoffman, 2003 MT 26, 314 M 155, 64 P3d 1013 (2003), following St. v. Fisch, 266 M 520, 881 P2d 626 (1994).

No Abuse of Discretion in Refusing to Instruct Jury on Lesser Included Offense of Negligent Homicide Absent Supporting Evidence: German was convicted of attempted felony assault and deliberate homicide. At trial, the court instructed the jury on German's defense of justifiable use of force and gave a mitigated deliberate homicide instruction but refused to give a jury instruction regarding the lesser included offense of negligent homicide, finding no evidence to support the instruction. German appealed on grounds that the trial court erred in failing to give the negligent homicide instruction. The Supreme Court affirmed. District Courts have broad discretion in formulating jury instructions, including the authority to reject instructions that are not supported by evidence. A lesser included offense instruction must be given when properly requested and when the jury could be warranted in finding defendant guilty of the lesser included offense, based on the evidence, but the instruction need not be given if there is no evidence to support it. A lesser included offense instruction is not supported by the evidence when defendant's evidence or theory, if believed, would require an acquittal. Here, German's justifiable use of force defense, if proved, would have required an acquittal. German cited St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 306, 968 P2d 705 (1998), for the proposition that a defendant is generally entitled to a lesser included offense instruction and that the District Court may usurp the jury's function by factually deciding the merits of the lesser included offense. The Supreme Court disagreed. Martinez neither overruled nor was inconsistent with cases entitling defendant to a lesser included offense instruction when evidence supports the instruction, and in both civil and criminal proceedings, the determination of whether there is sufficient evidence to raise an issue of fact for a jury is a question of law for the trial court. Only when the trial court determines as a matter of law that factual disputes exist are those disputes turned over to the jury. In this case, German's own testimony was that he consciously made the decision to shoot the victim, so there was no support for a negligent homicide instruction and the trial court did not err in refusing to give one. St. v. German, 2001 MT 156, 306 M 92, 30 P3d 360 (2001), following St. v. Swan, 279 M 483, 928 P2d 933 (1996).

Assault on Peace Officer Not Lesser Included Offense of Attempted Deliberate Homicide: Assault on a peace officer requires proof of an additional fact not necessary for attempted deliberate homicide, namely that the victim is a peace officer. Thus, assault on a peace officer is not a lesser included offense of attempted deliberate homicide. St. v. Martin, 2001 MT 83, 305 M 123, 23 P3d 216 (2001), distinguishing St. v. Castle, 285 M 363, 948 P2d 688 (1997).

No Error in Refusing Instruction on Mitigated Deliberate Homicide Absent Evidence of Extreme Emotional Distress: Martin contended that during his attempted deliberate homicide trial, the trial court erred in not giving an instruction on mitigated deliberate homicide, relying on St. v. Buckley, 171 M 238, 557 P2d 283 (1976), for the proposition that the instruction is required if there is any evidence of mitigation. The evidence Martin offered in support of the contention that he was under extreme emotional distress when he shot a pursuing police officer included the surprised look on his face after the shooting, coupled with his homelessness, unemployment, and pregnant girlfriend. The trial court concluded, and the Supreme Court agreed, that Martin's reliance on Buckley was misplaced and that Martin's evidence did not rise to the level of extreme emotional or mental distress. The evidence must indicate provocation of some sort in the form of a reasonable excuse or explanation. St. v. Martin, 2001 MT 83, 305 M 123, 23 P3d 216 (2001).

Negligent Endangerment Not Lesser Included Offense of Assault of Peace Officer: Section 45-5-210 provides that criminal endangerment, negligent endangerment, and assault are not included as offenses of assault on a peace officer. Fuqua was convicted of assault on a peace officer and argued that 45-5-210 unconstitutionally eliminated consideration of his claim of negligent endangerment as a lesser included offense. The Supreme Court noted that negligent endangerment differs from assault on a peace officer by requiring a lesser kind of culpability and by requiring proof of different conduct; thus, negligent endangerment is not a lesser included offense of assault on a peace officer. Having so concluded, the court declined to address the constitutional question of whether the Legislature can specifically eliminate consideration of an offense as a lesser included offense. St. v. Fuqua, 2000 MT 273, 302 M 99, 13 P3d 34, 57 St. Rep. 1141 (2000).

Criminal Counts Part of Same Transaction Not Subject to Further Prosecution: In arguing that defendant's conduct attributable to Munchausen Syndrome by Proxy (MSBP) was part of the same transaction that led to joinder of offenses of similar character under 46-11-404, the state could not adopt a contrary position and argue that the counts were not part of the same transaction for purposes of further prosecution under 46-11-503. Although 46-11-404 does allow joinder of offenses of the same or similar character as well as those arising out of the same transaction, the distinction was irrelevant in this case because the state's theory was always that defendant's conduct attributable to MSBP was part of the same transaction. The Supreme Court held that MSBP is a criminal objective—namely, seeking of attention through harming one's children—so defendant's actions toward two children came within the same transaction; thus, further prosecution for one child's death was barred by a former prosecution that resulted in a conviction for criminal endangerment of another child. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000). See also St. v. Waldrup, 264 M 456, 872 P2d 772 (1994).

Gopher Rule Relates to Instructions on Lesser Included Offenses, Not Alternative Offenses: Beavers was charged with criminal endangerment, but maintained that he was entitled to a jury instruction on reckless driving as an alternative theory under the rule in St. v. Gopher, 194 M 227, 633 P2d 1195, 38 St. Rep. 1521 (1981), that a defendant is entitled to an instruction to cover every issue or theory having support in the evidence. However, Gopher applies only to instructions on lesser included offenses, not alternative offenses. The rule of law applied to alternative offenses is that of prosecutorial discretion. When the facts support a possible charge of more than one crime, the crime charged is a matter of prosecutorial discretion. (See St. v. Booke, 178 M 225, 583 P2d 405 (1978).) Beavers was properly disallowed arguing an alternative offense theory that involved an offense that was not a lesser included offense of the offense charged. St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371, 56 St. Rep. 1035 (1999).

Lesser Included Offense Must Constitute Included Offense of Crime Charged: A criminal defendant is entitled to jury instructions that cover every issue or theory having support in the evidence, including an instruction on a lesser included offense when one of the parties requests it and when the record contains evidence from which the jury could rationally find defendant guilty of the lesser included offense and acquit of the greater. However, in order for the District Court to instruct the jury on a lesser included offense, the offense must actually constitute an included offense of the crime charged. To make the determination, the Supreme Court will apply the test in Blockburger v. U.S., 284 US 299, 76 L Ed 306, 52 S Ct 180 (1932), and consider the statutory definitions of the offenses involved, in light of the definitions in this section. St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371, 56 St. Rep. 1035 (1999).

Reckless Driving Not Lesser Included Offense of Criminal Endangerment: Reckless driving is a distinct offense and not an included offense of criminal endangerment. St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371, 56 St. Rep. 1035 (1999), following Blockburger v. U.S., 284 US 299, 76 L Ed 306, 52 S Ct 180 (1932).

Sufficient Evidence of Criminal Endangerment — Instruction on Negligent Endangerment Not Required: Martinosky was charged with felony criminal endangerment. During settlement of jury instructions, Martinosky offered a proposed instruction on negligent endangerment as a lesser included offense of criminal endangerment, but the instruction was refused. On appeal, without reaching the question of whether negligent endangerment was a lesser included offense of criminal endangerment, the Supreme Court found that the evidence established that Martinosky was fully aware of his actions and the probable outcome of those actions and thus acted knowingly, so an instruction on negligent endangerment was not warranted. St. v. Martinosky, 1999 MT 122, 294 M 427, 982 P2d 440, 56 St. Rep. 495 (1999), following St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 306, 968 P2d 705, 55 St. Rep. 1093 (1998).

DUI and Negligent Homicide Arising From Same Accident Not Part of Same Transaction — No Double Jeopardy: Booth pleaded guilty in Justice's Court to a DUI charge and claimed double jeopardy when he was subsequently charged in District Court with two counts of negligent homicide arising out of the accident that led to the DUI charge and conviction. Neither 46-11-503 nor 46-11-504 barred the District Court charges. Under each section, double jeopardy requires that the offenses arise out of the same transaction. Because Booth's conduct in allegedly causing the two deaths was not motivated by a purpose to accomplish the criminal objective of DUI, the DUI and negligent homicide offenses did not arise out of the same transaction within the meaning of the statutory definition of "same transaction" as conduct consisting of a series of acts that are motivated by a purpose to accomplish a criminal objective and that are necessary or incidental to the accomplishment of that objective. State ex rel. Booth v. District Court, 1998 MT 344, 292 M 371, 972 P2d 325, 55 St. Rep. 1395 (1998), followed in St. v. Condo, 2008 MT 114, 342 M 468, 182 P3d 57 (2008).

City Police Officer Making Arrest Outside Territorial Jurisdiction — Probable Cause Required: A city police officer, investigating a phone call reporting a suspected drunk driver, pursued Williamson outside city limits and arrested him, although the officer observed no erratic driving or other indicators of alcohol impairment prior to stopping Williamson's truck. Williamson moved to suppress all the evidence on the basis that the officer did not have probable cause to make the stop, contending that probable cause was necessary because the officer was acting outside his territorial jurisdiction as a city police officer and that the information within the officer's knowledge at the time of the stop did not rise to the level of probable cause. Williamson's motion was denied. Clarifying the difference between the probable cause necessary to effectuate a valid arrest and the particularized suspicion necessary to justify an investigative stop, the Supreme Court noted that although an officer ordinarily needs only a particularized suspicion for a traffic stop, under these circumstances, the officer was outside his jurisdiction when the stop was made and was thus not acting within the scope of his authority as a peace officer. The criminal procedures in 46-5-401 and 46-6-311 were not available to the officer. Rather, as a peace officer acting outside his territorial jurisdiction, his authority was limited to that provided to private citizens under 46-6-502, so probable cause was required. The citizen informant's telephone report was not sufficient to establish probable cause because the relayed report was devoid of information as to why the informant believed that Williamson was intoxicated and the officer did not inquire into the basis of the report before stopping Williamson's truck. The report created, at most, a suspicion that an offense was being committed, but that suspicion alone was insufficient to establish probable cause. Even if the informant had sufficient information to establish probable cause for a citizen's arrest of Williamson, that information was not relayed to the officer, who thus did not possess sufficient information to make the stop. The judgment was reversed because the District Court erred in refusing to suppress the evidence. St. v. Williamson, 1998 MT 199, 290 M 321, 965 P2d 231, 55 St. Rep. 843 (1998), distinguishing St. v. Schoffner, 248 M 260, 811 P2d 548 (1991), and followed in St. v. Reiner, 2003 MT 243, 317 M 304, 77 P3d 210 (2003), and St. v. Ellington, 2006 MT 219, 333 M 411, 143 P3d 119 (2006).

Supreme Court Without Jurisdiction Over Appeal From Guilty Plea With No Sentence: Diesen pleaded guilty to misdemeanor boating under the influence of alcohol, reserving his right to appeal the denial of his pretrial motion to dismiss for improper venue. Judgment was entered, and sentencing was deferred pending appeal. The Supreme Court held that it had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal because no sentence had been given by the District Court. The Supreme Court pointed out that because judgment is defined as including a sentence, no appeal can be taken from a judgment pursuant to 46-20-104 until the sentence has been pronounced by the District Court. St. v. Diesen, 1998 MT 163, 290 M 55, 964 P2d 712, 55 St. Rep. 655 (1998).

Misdemeanor Traffic Offenses in Tribal Court and Felony DUI in State District Court Not Arising From Same Transaction — No Double Jeopardy: Couture was cited for two misdemeanor traffic offenses in tribal court. A few days later he was moved to state District Court and charged with felony DUI, sixth offense. He pleaded guilty to the tribal court misdemeanors and then sought dismissal of the District Court felony on grounds of double jeopardy. He contended that because the offenses all arose from the same transaction and he had been convicted in tribal court, prosecution in District Court was barred under 46-11-504. The District Court properly held that the misdemeanors—driving without a license and without proof of insurance—were unrelated to the criminal objective of DUI. Because by definition the offenses did not arise out of the same transaction, the District Court felony prosecution did not constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Couture, 1998 MT 137, 289 M 215, 959 P2d 948, 55 St. Rep. 548 (1998), following St. v. Sword, 229 M 370, 747 P2d 206 (1987).

Assault Lesser Included Offense of Deliberate Homicide — Error to Refuse Instruction on Lesser Included Offense: The defendant was convicted of deliberate homicide. At trial, the court refused the defendant's proposed jury instruction on the offense of assault. The Supreme Court determined that as a matter of law, under the express terms of this section, assault is an included offense of the crime of deliberate homicide. When there was some evidence supporting a defendant's theory that the defendant was guilty of assault but not murder, the District Court erred in refusing the proposed jury instruction on assault as a lesser included offense of deliberate homicide. St. v. Castle, 285 M 363, 948 P2d 688, 54 St. Rep. 1194 (1997).

Parole Officer Duty of Care to Supervise Parolees — Jury Instruction Properly Given: Corliss was paroled, after serving time for an execution-style slaying with a handgun, under the condition that he not possess a firearm. While on a visit, with the approval of his parole officer, to Washington state to look for work, Corliss failed to return to Montana within the established time, failed to see a parole officer in Washington, had a temporary restraining order obtained against him by a girlfriend because of threats made to her and her family, and had an altercation with his wife involving a handgun. In neither instance of violence did Corliss's parole officer investigate the circumstances of the violence. Later, Corliss shot and killed one friend of his girlfriend and injured another. Both the estates of the deceased woman and the wounded woman brought actions against the state for negligent supervision of Corliss's parole. The state objected to an instruction given by the District Court concerning a parole officer's duty of care, claiming that there must be some special relationship between the parole officer and the person injured by a parolee in order for a duty of care to arise. The Supreme Court reviewed statutes defining negligence, statutes describing the general duty of one individual toward another, and statutes concerning parole and concluded that Robbins had a general duty to exercise reasonable care in the supervision of Corliss and had a duty to the killed and injured women in particular. Starkenburg v. St., 282 M 1, 934 P2d 1018, 54 St. Rep. 214 (1997). See also Lopez v. Great Falls Pre-Release Serv., Inc., 1999 MT 199, 295 M 416, 986 P2d 1081, 56 St. Rep. 771 (1999).

Incest Not Included Offense of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: McQuiston contended that his conviction for both incest and sexual intercourse without consent violated double jeopardy protections because under 46-11-410, a defendant may not be convicted of more than one offense if one offense is an included offense in another, as defined in this section. The Supreme Court held that incest is not an included offense of sexual intercourse without consent but rather is a distinct and wholly separate offense, each crime requiring proof of distinct elements that the other does not have. McQuiston's conviction for both crimes was not a double jeopardy violation. St. v. McQuiston, 277 M 397, 922 P2d 519, 53 St. Rep. 729 (1996), following St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367 (1991).

Prosecution for Possession Not Barred by Prior Conviction for DUI as Arising From Same Transaction: Tadewaldt argued that he could not be tried for felony possession of dangerous drugs because that charge arose out of the same transaction that resulted in his DUI conviction. The Supreme Court upheld the second conviction on the grounds that the DUI resulted from his being arrested for drugs that he had ingested. The DUI was not the same transaction as the charge for drugs in his possession that were found on his person subsequent to his being stopped for DUI. St. v. Tadewaldt, 277 M 261, 922 P2d 463, 53 St. Rep. 635 (1996), following the rationale of St. v. Sword, 229 M 370, 747 P2d 206 (1987).

Theft of Lost or Mislaid Property Not Lesser Included Offense of Theft of Stolen Property: Smith was charged with theft of stolen property and subsequently convicted. The District Court refused to give an instruction that theft of lost or mislaid property was a lesser included offense. The Supreme Court used the Blockburger test applied in St. v. Long, 223 M 502, 726 P2d 1364 (1986), and St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307 (1994)—that is, whether proof of the same facts will support a conviction under either charge. The Supreme Court held that because the state would have to prove that the defendant knew that the property was lost or mislaid under one section of law but not under the other, theft of lost or mislaid property was not a lesser included offense of theft of stolen property. St. v. Smith, 276 M 434, 916 P2d 773, 53 St. Rep. 459 (1996). However, see St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371, 56 St. Rep. 1035 (1999).

Judgment as Including Sentence — Sentence Not Strictly Premised on Punishment: A defendant had 60 days under former Rule 5(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to appeal a final judgment. Although prior to the 1991 enactment of this section, "sentence" was interpreted as being the same as "punishment", this section now defines a sentence as any judicial disposition of a criminal proceeding upon a plea, verdict, or finding of guilt. The judicial disposition is itself a sentence regardless of whether actual punishment is deferred or imposed immediately. This broader definition applies to deferment cases, but in double jeopardy cases, the narrower meaning premised on the punishment factor still applies. Therefore, a judgment that includes a deferred sentence is final for purposes of appeal, and an appeal filed more that 60 days after sentencing was dismissed as untimely. St. v. Rice, 275 M 81, 910 P2d 245, 53 St. Rep. 48 (1996), followed in Davis v. St., 2004 MT 112, 321 M 118, 88 P3d 1285 (2004).

Resetting Execution Date Not Considered Appealable Judgment — Setting Execution Date as Ministerial Rather Than Judicial: McKenzie was sentenced for deliberate homicide and aggravated kidnapping, and the death penalty was imposed in 1975. Despite the subsequent process of appeals spanning nearly 20 years, the 1975 sentence was never vacated by any court. The District Court held a hearing in 1995 to reset the execution date after the appeals proceedings, none of which were ultimately successful for McKenzie, had run their course. McKenzie claimed that the hearing constituted a resentence that reimposed the death sentence, which was beyond the jurisdiction of the District Court. The Supreme Court noted that setting the execution date was a ministerial function rather than a judicial act. Because McKenzie's substantial rights could not be implicated by that ministerial act, the District Court's order resetting the execution date could not be defined as a new judgment from which an appeal could lie. The District Court merely executed the judgment before it. Further, under St. v. Hanners, 254 M 524, 839 P2d 1267 (1992), once the valid judgment and sentence had been signed, the District Court had no jurisdiction to vacate the original judgment except as provided by law. Montana has no law allowing amendment of an original judgment at a hearing resetting an execution date. St. v. McKenzie, 271 M 32, 894 P2d 289, 52 St. Rep. 312 (1995).

Included Offense Based Upon Less Risk, Injury, or Culpability — Negligent Endangerment Not Lesser Included Offense of Aggravated Assault: Fisch was convicted of aggravated assault after the District Court refused to accept a jury instruction on negligent endangerment, which Fisch argued was a lesser included offense of aggravated assault. Citing St. v. Sheppard, 253 M 118, 832 P2d 370 (1992), the Supreme Court held that a person is entitled to an instruction on a lesser included offense only if, based upon the evidence, the jury could rationally find the person guilty of the lesser offense and if that entitlement is based upon one offense being, in law, an included offense of the other. Because the definition of "included offense" is written in the disjunctive with the qualifier "only", a lesser included offense may differ in one and only one way from that of the offense charged. Fisch's argument fails because at least two of the variations in degree exist between the offense charged and negligent endangerment. Moreover, Fisch's "less serious risk", "less serious injury", and "lesser kind of culpability" arguments under subsection(8)(c) of this section also fail. As a result, the Supreme Court held that no amount of evidence as to negligent endangerment would entitle Fisch to the instruction he sought. St. v. Fisch, 266 M 520, 881 P2d 626, 51 St. Rep. 907 (1994), followed in St. v. Greywater, 282 M 28, 939 P2d 975, 54 St. Rep. 16 (1997).

Included Offense Based Upon Similar Proof — Failure to Raise in District Court: Fisch was convicted of aggravated assault after the District Court refused to accept a jury instruction on negligent endangerment, which Fisch argued was a lesser included offense of aggravated assault. Citing St. v. Henderson, 265 M 454, 877 P2d 1013, 51 St. Rep. 606 (1994), the Supreme Court noted that Fisch's argument for a lesser included offense based upon subsection(8)(a) of this section was not raised in the District Court and that Fisch could not change his theory on appeal from that argued in the District Court. St. v. Fisch, 266 M 520, 881 P2d 626, 51 St. Rep. 907 (1994).

Indecent Exposure to Different Victims on Different Dates Not Considered Same Transaction — Prosecution Not Barred: After charging Waldrup with three counts of indecent exposure, to which he pleaded guilty on two counts, police continued to investigate previous reports of a man exposing himself. Waldrup was a suspect. After Waldrup was identified from a photographic lineup, he was charged with four additional counts of indecent exposure in incidents involving four different victims. Under 45-5-504, a third or subsequent conviction of indecent exposure allows for enhancement of punishment to a felony. Waldrup moved to dismiss the charges on the grounds that prosecution was barred for reasons of fundamental fairness and violation of constitutional provisions. The District Court granted the dismissal motion on the basis of double jeopardy. About 1 week after dismissal, the Supreme Court decided St. v. Berger, 259 M 364, 856 P2d 552 (1993), holding that the 1991 amendments to 46-11-503 did not eliminate the "same transaction" requirement or expand statutory protection to unrelated offenses. Because the charges against Waldrup were based on incidents that were not part of the same transaction, within the meaning of this section, the incidents could not be considered part of a plan resulting in the repeated commission of the same offense against the same person. Thus, prosecution of the four later counts was not precluded. St. v. Waldrup, 264 M 456, 872 P2d 772, 51 St. Rep. 344 (1994).

Premature Appeal of Judgment Not Including Sentence — De Novo Appeal Only — Appeal Not Perfected Properly Dismissed: Todd was convicted of assault in Justice's Court and, before he was sentenced, filed a notice of intention to appeal. The Justice's Court nevertheless proceeded to sentencing, and Todd was sentenced to pay a $250 fine or to perform community service, to pay costs, and to a 6-month deferred sentence. Several months after fulfilling the community service, Todd was informed that he had not paid the costs, whereupon the state moved for imposition of sentence and for dismissal of the earlier appeal. The court granted the state's motion, and Todd subsequently filed a notice of appeal from the Justice's Court's order dismissing the first appeal. The District Court held that it had no jurisdiction to review the Justice's Court's order and dismissed the appeal. Citing St. v. Hegeman, 248 M 49, 808 P2d 509 (1991), and St. v. Wilson, 252 M 264, 827 P2d 1286 (1992), the Supreme Court held that the right to appeal from a judgment was a right to appeal from a judgment that includes a sentence and that because sentence had not been pronounced at the time that Todd filed his first notice, the notice was premature and ineffective. The Supreme Court held that the second notice of appeal was also ineffective in that it was filed months after sentencing and not within the time required by statute. The District Court was correct in holding that it had no jurisdiction to review the Justice's Court's order dismissing the first appeal, both because the appeal to District Court is a trial de novo and not a review of lower court orders and because the notice of appeal was untimely filed. St. v. Todd, 262 M 108, 863 P2d 423, 50 St. Rep. 1466 (1993), followed in St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996), and St. v. Mora, 277 M 411, 922 P2d 516, 53 St. Rep. 736 (1996).

Arrest by Peace Officer Outside Officer's Jurisdiction — Applicability of Driving Under the Influence Implied Consent Law: A peace officer is by statute "any person who by virtue of the person's office or public employment is vested by law with a duty to maintain public order and make arrests for offenses while acting within the scope of the person's authority". Though a city police officer's authority did not extend beyond the city limits and his arrest of a driver beyond the city limits for being under the influence could only be a citizen's arrest, he was within the definition of a peace officer even when outside the geographical area in which he had jurisdiction because he was at the time of the arrest a peace officer in fact and by virtue of holding the particular job. Therefore, the implied consent law applied even though it refers to a person "arrested by a peace officer". Maney v. St., 255 M 270, 842 P2d 704, 49 St. Rep. 980 (1992).

Right to Due Process and Speedy Trial Denied — When Defendant Becomes "Accused" — Insufficient Reason for Delay — Prejudice to Defendant: Where 376 days elapsed between the filing of a complaint in Justice's Court charging the defendant with arson and the filing of an information in District Court, and 423 days elapsed between the defendant's arrest and the defendant's scheduled trial, the court did not err in dismissing with prejudice for lack of a speedy trial the information charging the defendant with arson. The defendant became an "accused" on the day the complaint was filed against him in Justice's Court, the State failed without good reason to diligently pursue the charges against the defendant, and the defendant had asserted the denial of his right to a speedy trial and had shown prejudice in his plausible claims that he was no longer able to recall facts constituting an alibi and was no longer able to discover physical evidence for use in his defense independently of that evidence found by the prosecution. The defendant thus satisfied the requirements to prove a violation of his constitutional right to a speedy trial. St. v. Larson, 191 M 257, 623 P2d 954, 38 St. Rep. 213 (1981).

Issuance of Search Warrant by Justice of the Peace in Case Involving Dangerous Drugs: Justices' Courts are constitutionally created, and when the Legislature has had the opportunity to limit their jurisdiction and has not seen fit to do so, a legislative intent to authorize the practice of Justices' Courts issuing search warrants is presumed as a Justice of the Peace meets the United States constitutional standard of "a neutral and detached magistrate" to examine the application for a search warrant and determine whether reasonable cause exists for its issuance. St. v. Snider, 168 M 220, 541 P2d 1204 (1975).

Issuance of Warrant by City Judge: A City Court Judge does not have the statutory authority to issue search warrants, and the trial court correctly suppressed evidence obtained under color of a search warrant executed by a City Court Judge. St. v. Tropf, 166 M 79, 530 P2d 1158 (1975), applied, with regard to substitute judges, in Potter v. District Court, 266 M 384, 880 P2d 1319, 51 St. Rep. 853 (1994).

Disqualification of Justice of the Peace: Under former law, the word "judge" did not include "justice of the peace", and a Justice of the Peace could not be disqualified on a simple affidavit for substitution of judge. Bailey v. St., 163 M 380, 517 P2d 708 (1973).

Attorney General's Opinions

Criminal Trials on Sundays: Montana law does not permit criminal trials to be conducted on Sundays except to conclude a trial already initiated, as specified in 3-1-302. 43 A.G. Op. 27 (1989).

Power of "Accident Investigator" to Enforce Provisions of Mandatory Insurance Law: The role of an "accident investigator", who is not a peace officer, in enforcing the provisions of the mandatory insurance law is the same as that of a private person. If the accident investigator has reasonable cause to believe an offense has been committed, he must execute a sworn complaint pursuant to 46-6-201. 38 A.G. Op. 49 (1979).

Private Citizen Cannot Prosecute Complaint: Since the term "magistrate" includes Justices of the Peace in 7-4-2712, the County Attorney is charged with the responsibility of prosecuting complaints in Justice's Court and a Justice of the Peace cannot allow a private citizen to prosecute a complaint. However, a County Attorney is vested with normal discretion and need not file and prosecute every individual's complaint when there is insufficient evidence to warrant prosecution or when such a prosecution would not be in the interests of justice. 36 A.G. Op. 47 (1975).

Incarceration Enhancement

46-1-401. Penalty enhancement — pleading, proof, and mental state requirements.

Compiler's Comments

2003 Amendment: Chapter 154 in (1) in introductory clause after "impose" deleted "an incarceration"; inserted (1)(d) providing that a penalty enhancement may not be imposed unless a defendant who knowingly and voluntarily pleaded guilty to an offense also admitted to the enhancing act, omission, or fact; in (3) near middle of first sentence substituted "a penalty" for "an incarceration period" and inserted second sentence providing that aggravating circumstances are enhancing acts, omissions, or facts; in (4) near middle after "enhance the" deleted "incarceration"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Case Notes

No Exception to Sixty-Day Rule for Prosecutor's Filing of Notice to Seek Death Penalty — Lack of Prejudice to Defendants Irrelevant: The defendants petitioned the Supreme Court to take supervisory control and reverse the trial court's decision that the prosecutor's failure to file the notice to seek the death penalty within the 60 days required by rule was acceptable because the late filing did not prejudice the defendants. The defendants argued that the late filing was a violation of their rights to due process under the federal and state constitutions. The Supreme Court held that it did not have to resort to a due process analysis but that the issue could be decided on the basis of Art. VII, sec. 2(3), Mont. Const., granting the Supreme Court its rulemaking authority. The Supreme Court noted that it had amended Standard 1.1.a. in 2002 to include the 60-day notice rule and that the Legislature had not exercised its right to disapprove the rule in the two following legislative sessions. The state argued that the 60-day rule was subject to exceptions, stating that in the present case, the defendants and their counsel were well aware that the death penalty was a potential punishment and that the notice was filed sufficiently in advance of the trial to afford the defendants ample opportunity to defend against a capital case. The Supreme Court stated that the state's reliance on St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307 (1997), for the proposition that the defendants were entitled only to adequate notice was misplaced. The Supreme Court held that even if the defendants' rights to due process were met by adequate notice, that did not nullify their argument that the 60-day notice rule is a mandate. The defendants argued that the plain language of the 60-day rule was clear and left no room for the trial court to inject the concept of allowing a late notice if a defendant is not prejudiced by the delay. The Supreme Court agreed and held that the court rules were subject to the same rules of interpretation as statutory law and the notice rule was clear on its face that a prosecutor has only 60 days after arraignment to file the notice of intent to seek the death penalty. The Supreme Court pointed out that the rule states that the prosecutor "shall" not "should" or "may" file the notice within 60 days and that the use of shall creates a mandate for when the notice must be filed. Miller v. District Court., 2007 MT 149, 337 M 488, 162 P3d 121 (2007).

Enhanced Sentence for Use of Weapon — Apprendi Applied Retroactively Under Harmless Error Test — Enhanced Sentence Without Unanimous Jury Finding Harmless Error: After Adams received an enhanced sentence for use of a weapon during an aggravated assault, Adams appealed on grounds that there was insufficient evidence to support a finding that a weapon was used and that the enhanced sentence violated due process because there was no separate jury finding that a weapon was used, as required by Apprendi v. N.J., 530 US 466 (2000). The 2001 Legislature updated the law to address the Apprendi requirement, but as it read in 1997 during Adams's sentencing, this section did not require a separate jury finding, so Adams argued that this section was therefore unconstitutional. The Supreme Court held that Apprendi imposes a new obligation on the state and is thus a new rule that applies retroactively to cases pending on direct appeal or not final at the time that the new rule was issued, so Apprendi applied retroactively to Adams's direct appeal. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence on both issues. First, there was uncontroverted evidence that a weapon was involved in the crime. Second, the Supreme Court applied Neder v. U.S., 527 US 1 (1999), to determine the proper test to apply when a trial court fails to instruct the jury to make a finding of materiality. Under Neder, the proper test is the harmless error test, i.e., whether it appears beyond a reasonable doubt that the error complained of did not contribute to the verdict obtained. Thus, in this case, the question was whether, beyond a reasonable doubt, Adams would have received an enhanced sentence based on the display or use of a weapon had the question been submitted to the jury. Given evidence that a gun was used was uncontroverted, the result would have been the same, so any error in failing to present the question to the jury was harmless. Adams v. St., 2007 MT 35, 336 M 63, 153 P3d 601 (2007), applying St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001).

Maximum Statutory Sentence for Deliberate Homicide When Death Penalty Not Sought: Because 46-18-202(2) does not remove from the jury a determination of facts necessary to restrict parole, the statutory maximum for deliberate homicide when the death penalty is not sought is life imprisonment without the possibility of parole. St. v. Garrymore, 2006 MT 245, 334 M 1, 145 P3d 946 (2006), followed in St. v. Giddings, 2009 MT 61, 349 M 347, 208 P3d 363 (2009).

No Implied Presumption of Parole Eligibility — Federal Constitutional Protections Not Violated by Sentence of Life Imprisonment Without Parole — Montana Constitutional Protections Not Addressed: Garrymore was sentenced to life in prison without parole for the deliberate homicide of his adopted infant child. Garrymore appealed the parole restriction and sought to have the sentence vacated on grounds that 45-5-102(2) contains an implicit presumption of parole eligibility. Garrymore contended that under the statute, standing alone and without the operation of 46-18-202, he was entitled to a parole-eligible sentence, subject to 46-23-201, that was taken away by the sentencing judge in violation of due process and a trial by jury. The Supreme Court found nothing in sentencing statutes that creates a presumption in favor of parole eligibility that must be overcome in order for a sentencing judge to impose a parole restriction. Rather, sentencing courts have broad discretion under 46-18-202 to impose parole eligibility restrictions on felony sentences, and the Legislature has placed no limitation on the exercise of that authority. A parole-eligible sentence was not taken away from Garrymore because he was not entitled to such a sentence to begin with. Additionally, although the judge must state the reasons for a parole eligibility restriction when one is imposed, no particular finding of fact need be included among those reasons. Therefore, because the statutory maximum for violating 45-5-102(1)(a) is life in prison without parole, restricting Garrymore's parole eligibility did not violate any federal constitutional rights. The Supreme Court also declined to address Garrymore's undeveloped argument that the parole eligibility restriction violated the Montana Constitution's greater jury trial right absent a compelling reason why Montana's greater jury trial right dictated a different result. St. v. Garrymore, 2006 MT 245, 334 M 1, 145 P3d 946 (2006), followed in St. v. Rosling, 2008 MT 62, 342 M 1, 180 P3d 1102 (2008).

Sentencing Court Neither Allowed nor Required to Increase Punishment for Charged Offense: Garrymore contended that 46-18-202 allowed or required the sentencing court to add on to the sentence imposed by 45-5-102(2), in violation of this section. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under 45-5-102, a District Court may impose both life imprisonment and life imprisonment without the possibility of parole. Thus, 46-18-202(2) does not, vis-a-vis an act, omission, or fact, allow or require a sentencing court to increase punishment for a charged offense. St. v. Garrymore, 2006 MT 245, 334 M 1, 145 P3d 946 (2006).

Error in Applying Weapon Enhancement Sentence Without Complying With Statutory Procedure: Following a conviction for negligent homicide, the District Court sentenced Strauss to 20 years in prison plus 10 years for use of a firearm. Strauss contended that the sentence was unlawful because Strauss was not notified of the enhancement before the sentencing hearing and because the jury did not make a separate finding at trial that the enhancing act occurred, as required by this section. The Supreme Court agreed. It was error to enhance Strauss's sentence without following the statutory procedure in this section, so the weapon enhancement portion of the sentence was stricken. St. v. Strauss, 2003 MT 195, 317 M 1, 74 P3d 1052 (2003).

No Youth Court Authority to Expunge DUI Offenses — Elements of Judicial Estoppel Not Met: Following Darrah's completion of a Youth Drug Court program in 2004, the Youth Court ordered that Darrah's prior criminal record be expunged, including a previous minor in possession offense and a 2002 DUI. Darrah was subsequently charged in 2005 with second offense DUI, based on the prior 2002 DUI, and in 2006 Darrah was charged with third offense DUI. Citing the principle of judicial estoppel, Darrah asserted that because the Youth Court record had been expunged, the 2002 DUI should not count against him. The District Court disagreed and Darrah appealed. The Supreme Court applied the elements of judicial estoppel set out in Vogel v. Intercontinental Truck Body, Inc., 2006 MT 131, 332 M 322, 137 P3d 573 (2006), and determined that Darrah had failed to demonstrate that each element was met, so judicial estoppel did not apply. Further, there is no authority under which the Youth Court could order expungement of Darrah's DUI offenses. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Darrah, 2009 MT 96, 350 M 70, 205 P3d 792 (2009), following St. v. Chesley, 2004 MT 165, 322 M 26, 92 P3d 1212 (2004).

Part 1
Jurisdiction of the State

46-2-101. State criminal jurisdiction.

Commission Comments

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, section 1-5. See also Model Penal Code, section 1.03(5) and the Montana Constitution [1889], Article VIII, section 11 [now Art. VII, sec. 4, 1972 Mont. Const.].

The purpose of this section is to establish a broad grant of jurisdiction for all crimes rather than individual grants for specific crimes. This section should clarify and centralize the topic of criminal jurisdiction which is now scattered and confused with the topic of venue.

The phrase "partly within this State" as used in subsections [(1) and (2)] is intended to cover all situations included in offenses commenced outside and consummated within this state and those commenced within and consummated outside this state, and, also, when some elements thereof occur within the state.

Subsection [(1)(a)] covers situations where some elements of the crime were committed in Montana, if not the complete crime.

Subsection [(1)(b)] covers extraterritorial attempts to commit crimes in Montana.

Subsection [(1)(c)] covers solicitation or conspiracy outside the state which result in some element of the crime being performed within the state.

Subsections [(1)(b)] and [(1)(c)] thus allow Montana to prosecute for inchoate offenses which are committed outside the state but relate to intended offenses within the state, and thus should be within the power of the state. The language in [46-2-101] makes no distinction between a principal and an accessory for purposes of jurisdiction.

Subsection [(2)] is an intentionally broad statement of jurisdiction. It does not require that the complete criminal act be committed in Montana. This is achieved through the use of the phrase "partly within this State." It is intended that this provision will permit the state to prosecute for homicide (a) although only the conduct which puts in motion the instrument or agency of death occurs in Montana; (b) only the physical contact which causes death occurs in Montana; (c) only the death occurs in Montana. Another example would be obtaining property in Montana by means of false pretenses made in another state. Subsection [(3)] grants jurisdiction to Montana to prosecute for a person's failure to comply with a legal duty or obligation regardless of the location of the offender at the time of the omission.

Subsection [(4)] purports to claim for the State of Montana the maximum territorial jurisdiction compatible with state sovereignty and federal claims. Provisions for federal jurisdiction are compiled in [2-1-202 through 2-1-211 and 2-1-307], covering such places as military reservations, national parks, etc. Also, see [2-1-301 through 2-1-306] pertaining to Indian reservations. The extent of federal jurisdiction is qualified by the terms by which the federal government acquired the land.

Case Notes

Federal Crime Defined by State Law Considered Federal Offense — Incorporation of State Law Definition: An Indian juvenile was charged with burglary under the federal Indian Major Crimes Act, 18 U.S.C. 1153, by reference to Montana's burglary statute only for the purpose of definition. The Act creates federal jurisdiction over 14 major offenses, including burglary, committed by Indians against Indians or any other person in Indian country, but does not define residential burglary. However, under the Act, if an enumerated crime is not defined and punished in accordance with federal law, the offense is defined and punished in accordance with the laws of the state in which the crime occurred. The juvenile argued that because the burglary was determined by reference to substantive state law, the violation of 18 U.S.C. 1153 did not constitute a violation of federal law. The Ninth Circuit Court disagreed. The fact that no federal residential burglary statute exists, requiring incorporation of Montana's definition of burglary, does not strip the commission of burglary on an Indian reservation of its federal character. Therefore, offenses defined by state law are nevertheless treated as federal offenses under the federal Act. U.S. v. Male Juvenile, 280 F3d 1008 (9th Cir. 2002).

Pursuit of Traffic Offender Onto Reservation Allowed — Good Faith Exception to Exclusionary Rule Applicable to Evidence Seized During Arrest of Tribal Member by Nontribal Officers on Reservation: Bird was observed by city police officer Olson driving recklessly in Cut Bank, but when Olson attempted to stop Bird, a chase ensued onto the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, where Bird was eventually stopped and held by the city police officer and an assisting county officer. When the officers were informed that Bird was an enrolled tribal member, they notified a tribal police officer, who arrested Bird and a passenger, and transported them off the reservation and back into Cut Bank in violation of the extradition provision of the Blackfeet Tribal Code. Bird was subsequently charged in City Court with reckless driving and was convicted. Bird appealed to District Court, moving to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction and to suppress evidence of activities and statements after the vehicle crossed onto the reservation. The District Court found that the city officer did not have jurisdiction to arrest Bird on the reservation and granted Bird's motion to suppress. The state appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Pursuant to U.S. v. Patch, 114 F3d 131 (9th Cir. 1997), under the doctrine of hot pursuit, once the officer observed an offense occur within his jurisdiction, he had authority to pursue the violator onto the reservation in order to make an arrest. Further, the evidence was erroneously suppressed because the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule, discussed in St. v. Nahee, 745 P2d 172 (Ariz. App. 1987), applied. The city and county officers acted in good faith reliance that the tribal officer would carry out the arrest and extradition in a manner conforming to tribal code procedures, and it was the tribal officer who neglected to follow the tribal code. The primary purpose of the exclusionary rule—to ensure that law enforcement is not rewarded by violating a defendant's constitutional rights and to deter such conduct in the future—would not be served by sanctioning the city and county officers for a mistake in which they had no part. Failure to follow tribal extradition procedures did not warrant exclusion of the evidence in this case. Cut Bank v. Bird, 2001 MT 296, 307 M 460, 38 P3d 804 (2001). See also State ex rel. Old Elk v. District Court, 170 M 208, 552 P2d 1394 (1976).

District Court Lacking Jurisdiction to Hear Charges of Theft Allegedly Committed on Indian Reservation — Felony Theft Not Continuing Offense: Eagle Speaker was charged with five counts of felony theft for allegedly stealing five horses on the Blackfeet Indian Reservation and transporting them off-reservation to Shelby for sale. Eagle Speaker contended that as an enrolled tribal member, the state lacked jurisdiction to prosecute because the alleged thefts occurred on the reservation and involved other members of the tribe. The District Court agreed. On appeal, the state alleged that there was probable cause to believe that both elements of felony theft occurred outside the reservation when Eagle Speaker tried to sell the horses in Shelby. The Supreme Court affirmed. Under St. v. Mullin, 268 M 214, 886 P2d 376 (1994), the crime of felony theft is not a continuing offense for purposes of tolling the statute of limitations. Rather, a theft is complete once all the elements of the crime transpire, and in this case, all elements of the theft, if it occurred, clearly occurred on the reservation. The offense of theft occurs for jurisdictional purposes where the elements of the offense take place. The alleged theft occurred on the reservation, and the state was without jurisdiction to hear the charges. St. v. Eagle Speaker, 2000 MT 152, 300 M 115, 4 P3d 1, 57 St. Rep. 600 (2000).

Elements of Crime Committed in Montana and Wyoming — Montana Jurisdiction Proper: Defendant contended that Montana had no jurisdiction to prosecute for robbery, aggravated kidnapping, and deliberate homicide because the actual killing occurred in Wyoming. However, uncontroverted evidence showed that the first two crimes occurred in Montana and that two of the three elements of deliberate homicide took place in Montana, with only the actual death occurring in Wyoming. All offenses were therefore within the scope of Montana jurisdiction pursuant to this section. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Minor Portion of Crimes Committed by Indian on Reservation — State Jurisdiction: Defendant contended that if any portion of a major offense occurred within Indian country, under the Major Crimes Act, 18 U.S.C. 1153(a), federal jurisdiction was exclusive. However, in this case, major elements of robbery, aggravated kidnapping, and deliberate homicide were satisfied within Montana and outside of Indian country. The state has jurisdiction of off-reservation offenses even though a connected offense occurs within Indian country. The fact that defendant crossed the reservation three times during the course of the kidnapping did not deprive the state of jurisdiction. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990), distinguishing U.S. v. Torres, 733 F2d 449 (7th Cir. 1984).

Offense Committed Partly Within State: The defendant and his companions picked the victim up in Montana and subsequently beat and robbed him before transporting him to Wyoming, where they killed him. The Supreme Court held that the District Court did have jurisdiction because part of the events constituting aggravated kidnapping occurred in Montana. St. v. Kills On Top, 241 M 378, 787 P2d 336, 47 St. Rep. 366 (1990).

Part of Crime Occurring on Reservation: The defendant and his companions picked the victim up in Montana and subsequently beat and robbed him before transporting him to Wyoming, where they killed him. During the course of events, the parties entered and left reservation land several times. The defendant, a full-blood Native American, argued that the federal government had exclusive jurisdiction to try the case. The Supreme Court ruled that the major portion of the criminal activity occurred off the reservation and therefore the state did have jurisdiction to try the defendant. St. v. Kills On Top, 241 M 378, 787 P2d 336, 47 St. Rep. 366 (1990).

Presence of Intent to Kill Not Bar to Felony-Murder Conviction: The defendant and his companions picked the victim up in Montana and subsequently beat and robbed him before transporting him to Wyoming, where they killed him. The defendant was convicted of felony murder and argued that Montana did not have jurisdiction to try him for the crime. The defendant argued that he could not be tried for felony murder in Montana because the killing was not causally connected to the aggravated kidnapping in that he did not originally intend to kill the victim. The defendant contended that the decision to kill the victim occurred in Wyoming and therefore Wyoming had jurisdiction over the deliberate homicide. The Supreme Court held that the felony-murder rule eliminated the state's burden to prove intent and that the presence of intent did not mean that the defendant could not be convicted on that particular crime. St. v. Kills On Top, 241 M 378, 787 P2d 336, 47 St. Rep. 366 (1990).

Result of Deprivation as Element of Offense: Defendant was a long-distance truck driver operating a truck belonging to his employer. While defendant was on a trip outside Montana, the employer withdrew authorization for defendant to operate the truck, after which defendant failed to return the truck to its owner. The majority found that the result of depriving the owner of his truck was an element of the offense of theft under 45-6-301, that the deprivation occurred in Montana because of defendant's failure to return the truck to its owner in Montana, and that therefore the Montana court had jurisdiction of the charge under subsection (2) of this section. A dissenting opinion asserted that the elements constituting theft are elements of conduct and mental state, and not result. St. v. White, 230 M 356, 750 P2d 440, 45 St. Rep. 270 (1988).

Illegal Pretrial Process and Procedure — State's Right to Charge and Try Case: Youth Court petition initiating proceedings did not state the facts constituting the offense youth was charged with in ordinary and concise language so as to enable a person of common understanding to know what was intended. The petition did not include a witness list. An arrest warrant was issued out of the Youth Court, although there is no provision in the Youth Court Act for issuance of an arrest warrant. Presumably the warrant was issued under 46-6-201, but there was no showing of probable cause supported by oath or affirmation reduced to writing. The youth had already been arrested in Oklahoma at the time the warrant was issued. By what process and authority he was arrested in Oklahoma was not shown, nor was it shown he was arrested by a law enforcement officer. He was subsequently transferred to the District Court for trial as an adult and convicted of two counts of deliberate homicide. The Youth Court proceedings from issuance of the warrant for arrest onward were patently defective. However, this did not preclude the State from having him transferred to the District Court, proceeding against him, and obtaining a conviction. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Tribal Indians — Crime Committed in Hardin: The area of Hardin, Montana, was disestablished from the exterior boundaries of the Crow Reservation by a valid act of Congress, and Montana courts had jurisdiction of crime of rape committed in the town by a Crow Indian. Little Light v. Crist, 649 F2d 682 (9th Cir. 1982).

Jurisdiction Over Solicitation: In a trial for solicitation of another to possess dangerous drugs, trial court properly refused to exclude as irrelevant all evidence of events outside Montana. It also properly refused to grant motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction a motion premised on the exclusion of evidence. Appellant solicited another person in Montana to commit, unknowingly and in another jurisdiction, the offense of possession of dangerous drugs by being an unwitting carrier from Peru to Los Angeles. St. v. Bush, 195 M 475, 636 P2d 849, 38 St. Rep. 2045 (1981).

Tribal Indians — Arrest: Petitioner, a Crow Indian, was arrested within the exterior boundaries of the Crow Reservation for a crime committed off the Reservation. The court followed State ex rel. Old Elk v. District Court, 170 M 208, 552 P2d 1394 (1976), which held that the arrest of an Indian on a reservation for a crime committed off the reservation was a valid arrest. In re Little Light, 183 M 52, 598 P2d 572 (1979).

Crime Committed on Air Force Base: There is nothing in the language of this section indicating legislative intent to restrict jurisdiction this state had previously exercised over crimes committed on land purchased by the federal government. St. v. Stewart, 175 M 286, 573 P2d 1138 (1977).

Indians Generally: Crimes committed by Indians within Montana but without the bounds of "Indian Country" are within the jurisdiction of the state courts. Petition of Fox, 141 M 189, 376 P2d 726 (1962); In re Diserly's Petition, 140 M 219, 370 P2d 763 (1962); Buckman v. St., 139 M 630, 366 P2d 346 (1961).

Tribal Indians — Forgery: A state court had jurisdiction of the prosecution of a tribal Indian for forgery of a check obtained from an Indian agency office when the check was cashed in a town outside of the boundaries of the Indian reservation. Petition of Fox, 141 M 189, 376 P2d 726 (1962).

Tribal Indians — Larceny: A state court presumptively had jurisdiction of the prosecution of a tribal Indian charged with larceny of a horse from Indian land when the accused did not show that the entire crime took place on Indian land. St. v. Akers, 106 M 43, 74 P2d 1138 (1938).

Tribal Indians — Statutory Rape: A state court properly entertained jurisdiction of a prosecution for a crime committed by a tribal Indian against an Indian girl while off the reservation, as against the contention that the federal court had exclusive jurisdiction of the offense. St. v. Youpee, 103 M 86, 61 P2d 832 (1936).

Stolen Property Brought From Canada: There was no variance between the information charging larceny of horses in the county and proof that the horses were stolen in Canada and driven into the county. St. v. De Wolfe, 29 M 415, 74 P 1084 (1904), overruled on other grounds in St. v. Penna, 35 M 535, 90 P 787 (1907).

Jurisdiction of the Courts

Part Case Notes

Constitutionality of Conviction Before Lay Judge: Kentucky's court system, which vested jurisdiction of penal and misdemeanor cases punishable by a fine of up to $500 and/or 1 year's imprisonment concurrently in police and circuit courts, provided that while police court (now City Court) judges in first- and second-class cities must be members of the bar they need not be in smaller cities, and required a trial de novo in the circuit court upon any appeal from a police court judgment, did not violate either the Equal Protection or Due Process Clause of the 14th amendment. Legislature's Authority to Confer Jurisdiction: Within constitutional limitations, the Legislature may confer jurisdiction in any class of cases on either the District Courts or Justices' Courts. St. v. Holt, 121 M 459, 194 P2d 651 (1948).

Part Attorney General's Opinions

Gambling Offenses: The District Court has exclusive jurisdiction over violations of the Montana Card Games Act, the Bingo and Raffles Law, and the sports pool law, found in Title 23, ch. 5. 35 A.G. Op. 86 (1974).

This section is a general statement of the broad jurisdiction vested in the District Courts by the Montana Constitution [1889] in Article VIII, section 11 [now Art. VII, sec. 4, 1972 Mont. Const.]. The District Courts have power over all criminal cases amounting to a felony and all misdemeanors not specifically delegated to the Justice or Police Courts. The District Courts are courts of general jurisdiction in criminal matters in the State of Montana.

Case Notes

Jurisdiction of Offense of Selling Alcohol Without a License: The District Court was the proper court to try the offense of sale of beer or wine without a valid state license. St. v. Barnes, 232 M 405, 758 P2d 264, 45 St. Rep. 1150 (1988).

Youth Legally Capable of Committing Crime — Jurisdiction When Crime Disclosed After Majority: The District Court has jurisdiction to try an individual charged at age 22 for felonies allegedly committed at age 15, as provided in the court's constitutional grant of jurisdiction over all felonies. The Youth Court Act does not contain any direct statement or implication that the Legislature intended to set the minimum age of criminal responsibility at 16, making a 15-year-old incapable of committing a crime. The primary purposes of statutes defining a "delinquent youth" and providing for transfer to District Court are to clarify that delinquency proceedings are noncriminal and to prohibit prosecution of youths in District Court while they are youths. State ex rel. Elliot v. District Court, 211 M 1, 684 P2d 481, 41 St. Rep. 1184 (1984).

District Court Jurisdiction — Invoked by Probable Cause in Leave to File Information — Res Judicata After Appeal Process: The issue of subject matter jurisdiction cannot be waived or conferred by consent of a party and may be raised at any stage of a judicial proceeding or sua sponte by the court; but if the question of jurisdiction turns upon a finding of whether the affidavit of application for leave to file an information shows probable cause and the defendant has been found guilty and the judgment has not been appealed or has been affirmed on appeal, the issue of probable cause is res judicata. St. v. Davis, 210 M 28, 681 P2d 42, 41 St. Rep. 898 (1984).

District Court Not Appellate Court for City or Justice's Court: A District Court may not sit as a court of review. Therefore, on appeal from a Justice's or City Court, the District Court must try a case de novo and may not remand it. Hardin v. Myers, 194 M 248, 633 P2d 677, 38 St. Rep. 1512 (1981).

District Court Jurisdiction — Venue — "Indian Country": An attack on District Court jurisdiction made on the basis of alleged failure to prove the venue of the crime and on the allegation the crime occurred in "Indian Country" was rejected. The District Court could take judicial notice that the areas where the crimes occurred are not within the Crow Indian Reservation but are in Big Horn County, Montana, thus proving venue. An argument that the landholdings between Indians and non-Indians in a "checkerboard" pattern made the entire area "Indian Country" was also rejected because of precedent to uphold the "disestablishment" of the land in question. St. v. Bad Horse, 185 M 507, 605 P2d 1113 (1980), followed in St. v. Johnson, 257 M 157, 848 P2d 496, 50 St. Rep. 209 (1993).

Evidence of Prior Convictions: The defendant's prior convictions for driving while intoxicated did not have to be proved at the trial in order to establish District Court jurisdiction even though such convictions were necessary to invoke potential penalties sufficiently harsh to invoke District Court jurisdiction. Prior convictions are generally for consideration only at sentencing. Section 46-18-503 (renumbered 46-13-108) expresses a legislative concern that evidence of prior convictions may prejudice the defendant during the trial. St. v. Nelson, 178 M 280, 583 P2d 435 (1978).

Sufficiency of Information: An information charging the defendant with "the crime of Driving While Under the Influence of Intoxicating Liquor (3rd offense)" was sufficient to establish jurisdiction in the District Court even though 61-8-714 uses the term "third or subsequent conviction" rather than "third offense" in providing for a potential penalty sufficiently harsh to invoke District Court jurisdiction. St. v. Nelson, 178 M 280, 583 P2d 435 (1978).

Jurisdiction Retained: When the District Court's jurisdiction is originally invoked by an information charging a felony, it is not lost by the State's subsequently reducing the charge to a lesser included misdemeanor. St. v. Shults, 169 M 33, 544 P2d 817 (1976).

Case Notes

Issuance of Search Warrant by Justice of the Peace in Case Involving Dangerous Drugs: Justices' Courts are constitutionally created, and when the Legislature has had the opportunity to limit their jurisdiction and has not seen fit to do so, a legislative intent to authorize the practice of Justices' Courts issuing search warrants is presumed as a Justice of the Peace meets the United States constitutional standard of "a neutral and detached magistrate" to examine the application for a search warrant and determine whether reasonable cause exists for its issuance. St. v. Snider, 168 M 220, 541 P2d 1204 (1975).

Enlargement of Jurisdiction by Implication: A statute providing for penalty assessments in addition to the statutory limitations on the imposition of fines was void for indirectly enlarging the jurisdiction of the Justices' Courts and police courts (now City Courts), as prescribed by statutes, when the title of the bill enacting the statute did not express a purpose to enlarge jurisdiction. State ex rel. Sanders v. Butte, 151 M 171, 441 P2d 190 (1968).

Unlicensed Practice of Medicine: The Justice's Court did not have jurisdiction of a prosecution for practicing medicine without a license, bearing maximum punishment of $1,000 fine or 1 year's imprisonment. State ex rel. Freebourn v. District Court, 105 M 77, 69 P2d 748 (1937).

The language of this section sets the jurisdiction of the police [now city] and municipal courts in the language of the Montana Constitution [1889], Article VIII, section 24 [now deleted]. The commission is not empowered to alter municipal ordinances and it does not attempt to do so. The commission merely placed this section concerning police [now city] and municipal courts at this point in the reorganization to facilitate comparison of the jurisdiction of the three major courts (District, Justice and Police). The police magistrate may also be constituted an ex-officio justice of the peace [, a conclusion that is questionable since deletion of sec. 24].

Case Notes

Authority of Properly Appointed Substitute Justice of the Peace to Issue Search Warrant: A search warrant was issued by a substitute Justice of the Peace, and Beaupre contended that the fruits of the search should be suppressed because no attempt was made to call in another Justice of the Peace or City Judge and because the substitute was not properly appointed. The Supreme Court dismissed the claims. The regular Justice of the Peace had letters from judges in nearby cities indicating that they were not available should the Justice of the Peace be absent, and the letters were updated every 6 months in accordance with the Attorney General's recommendations in 48 A.G. Op. 11 (2000). Further, the substitute was timely designated during the second term of the regular Justice of the Peace, and incorrect wording on the waiver of training form was inconsequential and did not affect the authority of the substitute to act. St. v. Beaupre, 2004 MT 300, 323 M 413, 102 P3d 504 (2004). See also Potter v. District Court, 266 M 384, 880 P2d 1319 (1994), and St. v. Vickers, 1998 MT 201, 290 M 356, 964 P2d 756 (1998).

City Court Jurisdiction Over Misdemeanor Public Nuisance Charges: This section provides a City Court with jurisdiction over criminal misdemeanor charges as authorized by 3-11-102. A violation of 45-8-111, maintaining a public nuisance, is clearly a misdemeanor; therefore, a City Court has jurisdiction over a criminal prosecution for public nuisance. Billings v. Panasuk, 253 M 403, 833 P2d 1050, 49 St. Rep. 499 (1992).

Issuance of Warrant by City Judge: A City Court Judge does not have the statutory authority to issue search warrants, and the trial court correctly suppressed evidence obtained under color of a search warrant executed by a City Court Judge. St. v. Tropf, 166 M 79, 530 P2d 1158 (1975), applied, with regard to substitute judges, in Potter v. District Court, 266 M 384, 880 P2d 1319, 51 St. Rep. 853 (1994).

Enlargement of Jurisdiction by Implication: A statute providing for penalty assessments in addition to the statutory limitations on the imposition of fines was void for indirectly enlarging the jurisdiction of the Justices' Courts and police courts (now City Courts), as prescribed by statutes, when the title of the bill enacting the statute did not express a purpose to enlarge jurisdiction. State ex rel. Sanders v. Butte, 151 M 171, 441 P2d 190 (1968).

Driving While Intoxicated: The city police court (City Court) had jurisdiction of the defendant, arrested by a city police officer without a warrant, while driving on city streets, and promptly taken to the city police court where the arresting officer reported and charged the defendant with operating a motor vehicle within the corporate limits of the city while under the influence of intoxicating liquor, in violation of a city ordinance. CHAPTER 3
VENUE

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

Criminal Procedure—Montana Law and the Federal Impact: Paragraph IV.A. discusses jurisdiction and venue. Elison, 38 Mont. L. Rev. 52 (1977).

Part 1
General Provisions

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: As in every area of the 1987 criminal procedure statutes, the Commission sought to eliminate unnecessary code sections and to bring the criminal procedure processes into conformity with case law. The Commission's principal concern was to eliminate the confusion generated from the use of the term "venue" vis-a-vis "place of trial". The transition should not be difficult, however, because the place of trial has long been synonymous with venue. See Stanton Trust v. Johnson, 104 Mont. 235, 238 (1937), and Milliken v. Gray, 81 Cal. Rptr. 525, 528 (1969). The Commission suggested a definition for "place of trial", which now appears in 46-1-202.

A significant change incorporated by these statutes is the phrase identifying the proper place to file a criminal charge. Under the 1987 code, venue was the county in which the trial was held—the place where the offense was committed. The plain language statute now avoids the use of the term "venue" and recognizes that the initial step in any criminal prosecution is the filing of a charge. Under the statutes, the proper place of trial is where the charge was filed unless otherwise ordered by the court.

The statutes retain the substance of the 1987 general code provisions governing venue for a criminal prosecution. See 1987 MCA 46-3-101 through 46-3-106. The only general provision not retained in the statutes is 1987 MCA 46-3-103, which related to an offense committed on or near a county boundary. The Commission determined that the substance of that provision is now adequately reflected in 46-3-114, which relates to cases in which the county of offense is unknown.

Two provisions of the 1987 code, treason (MCA 46-3-206) and escape from prison (MCA 46-3-203) allowed the trial to be conducted in any county. Treason is a constitutional offense (Art. II, sec. 30, Mont. Const.) and has no statutory counterpart. As such, the Commission felt that the offense of treason did not require a specific statute identifying the place of trial. Given the arrangement between Powell County and the state regarding prosecution for escape from prison, the Commission felt that the code section allowing such prosecutions in any county in the state was unnecessary.

The code provisions identifying venue for specific criminal offenses have not been retained. The statutes are sufficiently general to establish the proper place of trial in any criminal case.

Part Case Notes

No Finding of Juror Prejudice Due to Pretrial Publicity: The District Court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a change of venue and a motion for an individually sequestered voir dire when the allegations given for the requested change of venue failed to establish any possibility of jury prejudice due to pretrial publicity. The two jurors who learned anything about the case in the newspaper or radio were eliminated by peremptory challenge. Further, an alternate juror who read the articles but was not prejudiced did not sit as a juror in the deliberations. St. v. Hansen, 194 M 197, 633 P2d 1202, 38 St. Rep. 1541 (1981).

District Court Jurisdiction — Venue — "Indian Country": An attack on District Court jurisdiction made on the basis of alleged failure to prove the venue of the crime and on the allegation the crime occurred in "Indian Country" was rejected. The District Court could take judicial notice that the areas where the crimes occurred are not within the Crow Indian Reservation but are in Big Horn County, Montana, thus proving venue. An argument that the landholdings between Indians and non-Indians in a "checkerboard" pattern made the entire area "Indian Country" was also rejected because of precedent to uphold the "disestablishment" of the land in question. St. v. Bad Horse, 185 M 507, 605 P2d 1113 (1980), followed in St. v. Johnson, 257 M 157, 848 P2d 496, 50 St. Rep. 209 (1993).

Venue Jurisdictional Fact to Be Proved at Trial: Venue is a jurisdictional fact that must be proved at the trial the same as any other material fact in a criminal prosecution. Positive testimony that the violation occurred at a specific place is not required; it is sufficient if it can be concluded from the evidence as a whole that the act was committed in the county where the indictment is found. Here, there was no testimony specifically directed to the venue issue, but testimony taken for other purposes indicated that the defendant had the stolen property in his possession in Yellowstone County. St. v. Jackson, 180 M 195, 589 P2d 1009 (1979).

Multiple Offenses Committed in Different Counties: When the defendant was charged under former law with grand larceny, larceny by a bailee, or obtaining money by false pretenses and, with respect to the larceny and false pretenses charges, it was alleged that he exercised control over the property in Cascade County, while at least some of the acts alleged in the remaining charges were alleged to have occurred in Cascade County, venue was proper in Cascade County. St. v. Bretz, 166 M 444, 534 P2d 496 (1975).

Stolen Property Brought From Canada: There was no variance between the information charging larceny of horses in the county and proof that the horses were stolen in Canada and driven into the county. St. v. De Wolfe, 29 M 415, 74 P 1084 (1904), overruled on other grounds in St. v. Penna, 35 M 535, 90 P 787 (1907).

46-3-110. Filing the charge.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is largely a reflection of 1987 MCA 46-3-101(1) and is designed to work in conjunction with 46-3-111, which provides for the appropriate place of trial. This statute recognizes that the initial step in any criminal proceeding is the filing of a charge. Rather than designate the place of trial, this statute establishes that the charge is properly filed in the county in which the offense was committed.

The Montana criminal procedure code, the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, and the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure do not designate a proper place to file a charge. In this respect, the statute is new. The statute, however, provides a base upon which the appropriate place of trial may be determined—whether or not the place of trial is later changed. See Title 46, ch. 13, part 2.

Compiler's Comments

1995 Amendment: Chapter 177 inserted (2) allowing a charge under 45-7-306 to be filed, without defendant's objection, in any county in the state.

Code Commissioner Change: Pursuant to sec. 5, Ch. 546, L. 1995, the Code Commissioner substituted Department of Corrections for Department of Corrections and Human Services.

Case Notes

Proper Venue for Prosecution of Common Scheme to Manufacture Methamphetamine in Several Counties — Possession Charge Dismissed for Improper Venue: Following arrest in Sanders County, Galpin was charged in Ravalli County with possession of methamphetamine in Sanders County, operating a methamphetamine lab in Ravalli County, possessing methamphetamine precursors in Ravalli and Missoula Counties, and criminal endangerment in Ravalli County. Citing venue grounds, Galpin questioned the evidence on the endangerment charge and moved to dismiss the possession charge and the Missoula County precursor charge because there was no evidence that the crimes were committed in Ravalli County where the charges were filed. The Supreme Court agreed that possession has but one requisite act, which is possession of the drug itself, and because neither the state's information nor trial testimony established that Galpin possessed methamphetamine anywhere but Sanders County, Ravalli County was not the proper venue for the possession charge, so it was dismissed. However, in pursuit of the common scheme to manufacture methamphetamine, Galpin kept precursors in storage facilities in both Ravalli and Missoula Counties and knowingly or purposely prepared, processed, or manufactured the drug as he traveled between Ravalli and Missoula Counties, so venue was proper in Ravalli County for the precursor charges. Ravalli County was also a proper venue for the criminal endangerment charges based on witness testimony that Galpin manufactured methamphetamine on at least three occasions at the witness's home in Ravalli County when children were present. St. v. Galpin, 2003 MT 324, 318 M 318, 80 P3d 1207 (2003).

Proper Venue of Custodial Interference Proceeding: Price was charged with custodial interference after failing to return his daughter to her mother. Price moved to dismiss the charge for improper venue, arguing that Lake County, where he had withheld the child, rather than Missoula County, where both parties resided and where dissolution proceedings were taking place, was the proper venue. Venue is a jurisdictional fact that must be proved at trial as any other material element. Deprivation of custodial rights is a requisite element of the offense of custodial interference, so the state must establish that the defendant: (1) knowing that there was no legal right to do so, took, enticed, or withheld a child; and (2) deprived the legal custodian of custody. When establishing the commission of an offense requires proving two or more acts, the charges may be filed in any county in which any of the acts occurred. In this case, at least one of the elements of custodial interference occurred in Missoula, so Missoula County was a proper venue for prosecution of the offense, and the District Court properly denied the motion to dismiss for improper venue. St. v. Price, 2002 MT 229, 311 M 439, 57 P3d 42 (2002), followed in St. v. Young, 2007 MT 323, 340 M 153, 174 P3d 460 (2007).

Charges Filed in Wrong County — Venue Waived Upon Plea of Guilty: Thompson was charged in Powell County for felony escape while in detention in Yellowstone County. As part of a plea agreement, Thompson pleaded guilty and signed a waiver of rights. On appeal, Thompson contended that his constitutional and statutory rights were violated because he was prosecuted in a different county from the county where the alleged offense was committed. However, pursuant to St. v. Feeley, 170 M 227, 552 P2d 66 (1976), and McGuinn v. Risley, 210 M 349, 681 P2d 699 (1984), the statutory right to venue may be waived. Further, 46-3-111 provides that in criminal cases, venue is waived if not raised prior to the first witness being sworn. Thus, despite the fact that charges were filed in the wrong county, any assertion of improper venue was waived by Thompson's failure to object prior to pleading guilty. St. v. Thompson, 1999 MT 108, 294 M 321, 981 P2d 778, 56 St. Rep. 444 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Preite, 172 M 318, 564 P2d 598 (1977), St. v. Jackson, 180 M 195, 589 P2d 1009, 36 St. Rep. 169 (1979), and St. v. Johnson, 257 M 157, 848 P2d 496, 50 St. Rep. 209 (1993).

46-3-111. Place of trial.

Commission Comments

Source: New. See Montana Constitution [1889], Article III, section 16 [now Art. II, sec. 24, 1972 Mont. Const.].

The place of trial is fixed by the Montana Constitution [1889], Article III, section 16 [now Art. II, sec. 24, 1972 Mont. Const.]. The place of trial, however, is subject to a change of venue for prejudice. See [46-13-203]. Change of Place of Trial.

If an objection to venue is made, and it is shown that the offense occurred in a different county, or there is cause for the change, then the proceeding will be dismissed in that county. The same proceeding would then be reinstated in the proper county.

The second sentence was included by the commission because it felt that a failure by defendant to object to the venue before trial should be construed as a waiver. The important element of the waiver feature is that the defense should forewarn the prosecution that it plans to contest venue so that a legitimate determination can be made before the trial rather than allowing the question of venue to slip by and then grant the defendant a new trial or reversal for a defect that was never seriously questioned or fairly raised. The section is designed to prevent a defendant who knows that the place of trial is improperly alleged from saying nothing until after his gamble on the verdict has lost.

Under the proposed code, venue is completely separated from jurisdiction. Venue is a constitutional right of the defendant which may be waived, while jurisdiction is the power of the court to act and may not be waived.

The concept of venue in a criminal case is thereby brought into agreement with the view of venue and jurisdiction found in civil cases. See Stanton Trust & Savings Bank v. Johnson, 65 P.2d 1188, 104 Montana 235, 238.

Venue falls within that class of constitutional rights of the defendant which may be waived either by affirmative action, or through failure to object at the proper time. As such, venue should not be regarded as an absolute right, for not only may it be waived, but upon proper motion by either the state or defendant the place of trial may be changed by proving the existence of prejudice. Thus, venue is not an essential element of the actual trial, to be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Instead the determination of the correct place of trial should be a pre-trial procedure principally for the benefit and convenience of the parties involved to be established by a preponderance of the evidence.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: At beginning of (1) deleted "In all criminal prosecutions" and before "unless" substituted "charge is filed" for "offense was committed"; in (2), near end of first sentence, inserted "the first witness is sworn at the time of" and in second sentence substituted "proper county in which to file the charge" for "venue" and at end substituted "further proceedings may take place" for "proceeding to trial"; and made minor changes in style.

Further, this section provides that in criminal cases, venue is waived if not raised prior to the first witness being sworn. Thus, despite the fact that charges were filed in the wrong county, any assertion of improper venue was waived by Thompson's failure to object prior to pleading guilty. St. v. Thompson, 1999 MT 108, 294 M 321, 981 P2d 778, 56 St. Rep. 444 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Preite, 172 M 318, 564 P2d 598 (1977), St. v. Jackson, 180 M 195, 589 P2d 1009, 36 St. Rep. 169 (1979), and St. v. Johnson, 257 M 157, 848 P2d 496, 50 St. Rep. 209 (1993).

Judicial Notice of County in Which City is Located: Where testimony establishes that an act took place in a particular city, judicial notice may be taken of the county wherein the city is located, citing St. v. Jackson, 180 M 195, 589 P2d 1009 (1979), followed in St. v. Bad Horse, 185 M 507, 605 P2d 1113 (1980). St. v. Harvey, 219 M 402, 713 P2d 517, 43 St. Rep. 46 (1986).

Jurisdiction to Issue Investigative Subpoenas: The plain language of 46-4-301 vests every District Court Judge with the power to issue investigative subpoenas with no jurisdictional limitation. There simply is no requirement, explicit or implicit, that the subpoena be issued by the sitting judge of the district where the crime allegedly occurred. The venue statutes have no application to the jurisdictions of any District Court to issue such subpoenas, which jurisdiction is coextensive with the state boundaries. St. v. Holmes, 212 M 526, 687 P2d 662, 41 St. Rep. 1535 (1984).

Same Defendant — Similar Facts — Change of Venue Required: Paisley appealed to the District Court a conviction of a misdemeanor sexual assault. The case was to be tried de novo in the District Court. Earlier, in St. v. Paisley, 204 M 191, 663 P2d 322, 40 St. Rep. 763 (1983), the Supreme Court had approved an order granting a change of venue in companion cases on felony charges. In the interests of consistency, the Supreme Court issued a Writ of Supervisory Control ordering the District Court to grant a change of venue. State ex rel. Paisley v. District Court, 673 P2d 815, 40 St. Rep. 1852 (1983).

Constitutionality: The right to be tried in the county where the offense was "committed" was not violated because "committed" does not mean the point at which all the elements of the crime have occurred. St. v. Bretz, 166 M 444, 534 P2d 496 (1975).

More Than One County With Proper Venue: The rule that an action remains in the county in which it was brought when it and the one to which transfer is sought both have proper venue applies in criminal cases. St. v. Bretz, 166 M 444, 534 P2d 496 (1975).

PROPER VENUE

Criminal Endangerment — Sufficient Proof of Mental State and Jurisdiction: Cybulski contended that the state failed to prove criminal endangerment because there was insufficient proof that Cybulski acted knowingly or that the alleged offense occurred in Custer County. The Supreme Court disagreed with both arguments. Under 45-2-103, the existence of a mental state may be inferred from the acts of the accused and the facts and circumstances connected with the offense. Here, Cybulski drove at a high rate of speed for nearly 50 miles on the wrong side of the interstate while intoxicated. A rational trier of fact could conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that Cybulski either was aware of her conduct and the risk it was creating or was unaware solely because of her intoxicated condition, so the element of knowingly was proven. Under 46-3-112, if two or more acts are requisite to the commission of an offense, the charge may be filed in any county in which any of the acts occurred. Cybulski admitted that she drove on the wrong side of the interstate in Custer County and made no objection to charges being filed in Custer County, so venue in Custer County was proper. St. v. Cybulski, 2009 MT 70, 349 M 429, 204 P3d 7 (2009).

Venue for Failure to File Tax Returns: Tax returns are required to be filed with the Department of Revenue. The Department is required to be located in Helena, Montana. Section 46-3-101 (renumbered as this section) provides that in all criminal prosecutions, trial shall be in the county where the offense was committed. The offense charged here was failure to properly file tax returns, so that venue was properly with Lewis and Clark County where Helena is located. St. v. Poncelet, 187 M 528, 610 P2d 698 (1980).

Proof of Proper Venue Beyond a Reasonable Doubt: Venue in a criminal case must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. When the defendant was charged with preparation of false evidence for submitting fraudulent petitions for workers' compensation settlements, sufficient evidence was presented from which the jury could determine that the State proved venue in Cascade County. Both petitions for settlement contained defendant's signature followed by his Great Falls address, and the settlement checks were sent to the defendant in Great Falls. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Venue Jurisdictional Fact to Be Proved at Trial: Venue is a jurisdictional fact that must be proved at the trial the same as any other material fact in a criminal prosecution. Positive testimony that the violation occurred at a specific place is not required; it is sufficient if it can be concluded from the evidence as a whole that the act was committed in the county where the indictment is found. Here, there was no testimony specifically directed to the venue issue, but testimony taken for other purposes indicated that the defendant had the stolen property in his possession in Yellowstone County. St. v. Jackson, 180 M 195, 589 P2d 1009 (1979).

Multiple Offenses Committed in Different Counties: The action against the defendant, who was charged with 52 offenses committed in several counties, was properly venued in the county where the information was filed, even though elements of some of the offenses may have occurred in another county. St. v. Bretz, 166 M 444, 534 P2d 496 (1975).

Sufficiency of Information: An information stating generally that a crime was committed in a county, but containing no other allegation as to venue, was sufficient. St. v. Tully, 31 M 365, 78 P 760 (1904).

IMPROPER VENUE

Similar Offenses in Different Counties — Not to Be Combined in Same Trial: Defendants were charged with theft of coins from a juke box in Roosevelt County and also with the same offense in Blaine County. Defendants were originally charged with misdemeanor theft in Blaine County and later charged with felony theft in an amended information combining the offense in Roosevelt County. Defendants objected, claiming the offenses were unrelated and that venue for the Roosevelt County theft did not properly lie in Blaine County. The general venue rule is that in criminal actions venue is proper only in the jurisdiction where the crime occurred. The State claimed that the offense fit into the "common scheme" exception, where the acts requisite to the commission of a crime, occurring in more than one jurisdiction, establish proper venue in any one of the affected counties. The court held that the offenses were linked by similarity and nothing else. The court held that two separate and distinct offenses had occurred in two different jurisdictions. Under Montana law, the crimes must be separately charged and tried in the counties where they occurred. St. v. Adams, 190 M 233, 620 P2d 856, 37 St. Rep. 2053 (1980).

CHANGE REQUIRED

Local Prejudice as Grounds for Change of Venue: An accused is entitled to a change of venue when it appears there are reasonable grounds to believe that prejudice actually exists and that by reason of the prejudice there is a reasonable apprehension that the accused cannot receive a fair and impartial trial. The District Judge should exercise his discretion in determining that the actual prejudice is sufficiently pervasive to warrant a change of venue, and his ruling will not be disturbed absent a showing of abuse of discretion. St. v. Austad, 197 M 70, 641 P2d 1373, 39 St. Rep. 356 (1982).

Publicity — Applicable Standard: The rule that a change of venue for prejudice requires a showing of existing prejudice substantial enough to make a fair trial impossible is unworkable and is discarded in favor of the rule, adopted prospectively only, that one is entitled to a venue change when it appears there are reasonable grounds to believe the alleged prejudice actually exists and there is a reasonable apprehension that accused will not receive a fair trial. St. v. Link, 194 M 556, 640 P2d 366, 38 St. Rep. 982 (1981).

Improper Denial of Motion for Change of Venue — Vacation of Conviction: The court erred in denying the defendant's motion for change of venue when no proof was adduced at the trial of any unlawful act of the defendant in the county of trial which would constitute an element of the alleged crime. This was fatal to the state's case as venue must be proved as a jurisdictional fact, and the conviction was vacated. St. v. Preite, 172 M 318, 564 P2d 598 (1977), distinguished in St. v. Thompson, 1999 MT 108, 294 M 321, 981 P2d 778, 56 St. Rep. 444 (1999).

CHANGE NOT REQUIRED

Balanced Reporting Including Widow's Grief, Prosecution's Statements During Investigation and Pretrial, and DNA Testing: The test for change of venue due to prejudicial pretrial publicity is whether the publicity was inflammatory and whether it actually did inflame the prejudice of the community to the extent that a reasonable possibility exists that the defendant may not receive a fair trial because of a widespread community belief that the defendant is guilty. Informatory news articles did not contain editorializing or a calculated attempt to convince the public of the suspect's guilt. The articles included a few reports about the homicide widow's grief and the prosecution's statements that concerned investigations or that were made during pretrial proceedings. Balanced reporting of DNA evidence in the state's first DNA case could not be called inflammatory. Therefore, the change of venue motion was properly denied. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Content and Effect of Pretrial Publicity — Review in Federal Habeas Corpus Proceeding: In assessing whether pretrial publicity precludes a fair trial, a court must consider the content of the publicity and its effect on the jury. A single misstatement of facts in a newspaper article 6 months prior to trial did not constitute inflammatory or impassioned press coverage. Where each person on the jury either had not read the newspaper article or could not recall the details of the article, the impact of the pretrial publicity was insufficient. Bashor v. Risley, 539 F. Supp. 259, 39 St. Rep. 960 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Publicity — Necessary Findings: A finding that publicity incident to a trial was sufficient to warrant a venue change, without a finding of existing prejudice and an assessment of the effect of the publicity, constituted an abuse of discretion. Prejudice per se cannot be found from publicity. The order for a venue change would be reversed. St. v. Link, 194 M 556, 640 P2d 366, 38 St. Rep. 982 (1981).

Venue — Effect of Publicity: A motion for change of venue based on pretrial publicity must be supported by evidence of the frequency and inflammatory nature of the publicity. It must be such as to excite undue prejudice, rendering it impossible for the accused to have a jury free from prejudice. The motion here was not supported by evidence and was denied. St. v. Sunday, 187 M 292, 609 P2d 1188 (1980).

Failure to File Tax Return — Venue: Venue of a criminal action charging intentional failure to file a properly completed Montana individual income tax return would lie in either Lewis and Clark County or the county in which defendants reside. But, since the complaint was filed in the former and no legal justification or prejudice was shown to support transfer, the Supreme Court reversed the District Court's change of venue from Lewis and Clark County. Dept. of Revenue v. Lane, 187 M 230, 609 P2d 300 (1980), following St. v. Bretz, 169 M 505, 548 P2d 949 (1976).

Change of Venue Properly Denied: News articles concerning the crime were published approximately 6 months prior to trial; nothing indicated that any of the jurors had even read the articles, and there was no showing that any juror was tainted or predisposed by the appearance of these articles. Therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying a change of place of trial. St. v. Kirkaldie, 179 M 283, 587 P2d 1298 (1978).

Effect of Amended Charges: The court erred in granting a motion for change of venue when the information was amended to allege witness tampering in a county in which the action was not brought. The charges cannot stand independent of the original charges and venue remains in the county where the action was brought. St. v. Bretz, 169 M 505, 548 P2d 949 (1976).

Law Review Articles

Venue—Perjury: Jurisdiction over a perjury charge is in the county where the perjury (in this instance, giving a false affidavit) originated. (St. v. Rother, 130 M 357, 303 P2d 393 (1956).) Hilley, 18 Mont. L. Rev. 225 (1957).

46-3-112. Requisite act in multiple counties.

Commission Comments

Source: A.L.I., section 242.

This provision allows the trial to take place in the most convenient county where an element of the offense occurred. It does not matter if the final consummation of the offense occurred in another county. The only elements of the crime which are of interest are those acts constituting or requisite to the consummation of the offense; the trial of the case may be held in any county in which such acts occur. [Annotator's note: The 1981 amendment allows trial in any county in which any offense occurred when two or more acts are committed in furtherance of a common scheme.]

Compiler's Comments

2003 Amendment: Chapter 344 inserted (3) providing that if an element of an offense under 45-5-220, 45-5-625, 45-8-212, or 45-8-213 involves an electronic communication, the charge may be filed in the county in or from which the electronic communication was sent or in the county in which the electronic communication was received or to which it was sent. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 177 in (1) and (2), at beginning, inserted exception clause; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendment: In (1), near end, substituted "charge may be filed" for "trial may be"; inserted (2) concerning act occurring in more than one county; and made minor changes in style.

1981 Amendment: Substituted "When" for "Where" at the beginning of the section; inserted "or when two or more acts or offenses are committed in furtherance of a common scheme" after "any offense"; and inserted "or offenses" after "acts" at the end of the section.

Case Notes

Illegal Outfitting Chargeable in County Where Some Outfitting Acts Occur: Ruiz was charged in a fish and game sting operation with outfitting without a license after meeting officers in Missoula County and taking them to Flathead Lake to hunt. The charge was filed in Missoula County, and Ruiz contended that because the actual hunting activity took place in a different county, the charge was filed in an improper venue. The Supreme Court noted that the definition of an outfitter includes a person who provides a personal service for a person to hunt and who accompanies that person, either part or all of the way, on a hunting expedition. Ruiz met the officers in Missoula County and accompanied them on their hunting expedition, so the outfitting violation occurred at least in part in Missoula County. Therefore, charging the crime in Missoula County was a proper venue. St. v. Ruiz, 2004 MT 135, 321 M 357, 91 P3d 565 (2004).

Proper Venue for Prosecution of Common Scheme to Manufacture Methamphetamine in Several Counties — Possession Charge Dismissed for Improper Venue: Following arrest in Sanders County, Galpin was charged in Ravalli County with possession of methamphetamine in Sanders County, operating a methamphetamine lab in Ravalli County, possessing methamphetamine precursors in Ravalli and Missoula Counties, and criminal endangerment in Ravalli County. Citing venue grounds, Galpin questioned the evidence on the endangerment charge and moved to dismiss the possession charge and the Missoula County precursor charge because there was no evidence that the crimes were committed in Ravalli County where the charges were filed. The Supreme Court agreed that possession has but one requisite act, which is possession of the drug itself, and because neither the state's information nor trial testimony established that Galpin possessed methamphetamine anywhere but Sanders County, Ravalli County was not the proper venue for the possession charge, so it was dismissed. However, in pursuit of the common scheme to manufacture methamphetamine, Galpin kept precursors in storage facilities in both Ravalli and Missoula Counties and knowingly or purposely prepared, processed, or manufactured the drug as he traveled between Ravalli and Missoula Counties, so venue was proper in Ravalli County for the precursor charges. Ravalli County was also a proper venue for the criminal endangerment charges based on witness testimony that Galpin manufactured methamphetamine on at least three occasions at the witness's home in Ravalli County when children were present. St. v. Galpin, 2003 MT 324, 318 M 318, 80 P3d 1207 (2003).

Proper Venue of Custodial Interference Proceeding: Price was charged with custodial interference after failing to return his daughter to her mother. Price moved to dismiss the charge for improper venue, arguing that Lake County, where he had withheld the child, rather than Missoula County, where both parties resided and where dissolution proceedings were taking place, was the proper venue. Venue is a jurisdictional fact that must be proved at trial as any other material element. Deprivation of custodial rights is a requisite element of the offense of custodial interference, so the state must establish that the defendant: (1) knowing that there was no legal right to do so, took, enticed, or withheld a child; and (2) deprived the legal custodian of custody. When establishing the commission of an offense requires proving two or more acts, the charges may be filed in any county in which any of the acts occurred. In this case, at least one of the elements of custodial interference occurred in Missoula, so Missoula County was a proper venue for prosecution of the offense, and the District Court properly denied the motion to dismiss for improper venue. St. v. Price, 2002 MT 229, 311 M 439, 57 P3d 42 (2002), followed in St. v. Young, 2007 MT 323, 340 M 153, 174 P3d 460 (2007).

Proper Venue for Filing of Stalking Charges: Cooney contended that alleged acts of stalking committed against Busby occurred in Missoula and in Colorado where Busby was living when the charges were brought. However, the state introduced numerous letters sent to Busby's parents' home in Powell County, as well as an offensive telephone message left there, to prove that the acts necessary to establish stalking occurred in Powell County. It was not error for the District Court to determine that proper venue was in Powell County. St. v. Cooney, 271 M 42, 894 P2d 303, 52 St. Rep. 320 (1995).

Similar Offenses in Different Counties — Not to Be Combined in Same Trial: Defendants were charged with theft of coins from a juke box in Roosevelt County and also with the same offense in Blaine County. Defendants were originally charged with misdemeanor theft in Blaine County and later charged with felony theft in an amended information combining the offense in Roosevelt County. Defendants objected, claiming the offenses were unrelated and that venue for the Roosevelt County theft did not properly lie in Blaine County. The general venue rule is that in criminal actions venue is proper only in the jurisdiction where the crime occurred. The State claimed that the offense fit into the "common scheme" exception, where the acts requisite to the commission of a crime, occurring in more than one jurisdiction, establish proper venue in any one of the affected counties. The court held that the offenses were linked by similarity and nothing else. The court held that two separate and distinct offenses had occurred in two different jurisdictions. Under Montana law, the crimes must be separately charged and must be tried in the counties where they occurred. St. v. Adams, 190 M 233, 620 P2d 856, 37 St. Rep. 2053 (1980).

Failure to File Tax Return — Venue: Venue of a criminal action charging intentional failure to file a properly completed Montana individual income tax return would lie in either Lewis and Clark County or the county in which defendants reside. But, since the complaint was filed in the former and no legal justification or prejudice was shown to support transfer, the Supreme Court reversed the District Court's change of venue from Lewis and Clark County. Dept. of Revenue v. Lane, 187 M 230, 609 P2d 300 (1980), following St. v. Bretz, 169 M 505, 548 P2d 949 (1976).

Amendment of Charges to Add Interrelated Acts Committed in Different County: When the defendants, while in Missoula County jail awaiting trial on charges pending in Powell County, were charged in counts added to the information already filed in Powell County with conspiracy and solicitation to commit perjury, tampering with witnesses, and fabrication of physical evidence, all in connection with the previously filed charges, the additional crimes charged were interrelated with and dependent upon the pendency of the other charges. Thus, one of the acts necessary to their commission occurred in Powell County, and it was error for the District Court there to order venue on the additional counts changed to Missoula County. St. v. Bretz, 169 M 505, 548 P2d 949 (1976).

False Report Mailed to Another County: When the defendants, president and cashier of a bank, prepared an alleged false report to the Superintendent of Banks in one county and transmitted it by mail to the Superintendent of Banks in another county, the District Court of the former county had jurisdiction. St. v. Cassill, 70 M 433, 227 P 49 (1924).

The term "instrument of conveyance" was used in this section to cover all modes of transportation. This language avoids the need of listing all types of conveyances as used in the older section and avoids the possibility of an omission. The language creates a distinction between an offense committed against the vehicle itself and against a passenger on the vehicle.

1991 Amendment: Inserted (1) concerning inability to determine county of offense; and substituted (2) concerning offense against public or private conveyance for former text that read: "(2) If an offense is committed in, on, or against any instrument of conveyance passing within this state and it cannot readily be determined in which county the offense was committed, the offender may be tried in any county through which such instrument of conveyance has passed or in the county where the travel terminates".

Case Notes

Travel in and Through County in Private Conveyance Adequate to Establish Venue — Boat as Private Conveyance: Diesen's boat collided with Hallock's boat in Fort Peck Lake, in either Valley County or Garfield County. Diesen was convicted in Valley County Justice's Court of boating under the influence, and he appealed. In District Court, Diesen moved for dismissal, alleging that the venue was improper because the state had failed to prove that any element of the offense had occurred in Valley County. The District Court applied this section in concluding that Diesen's boat was a private conveyance and held that because the state proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the boat traveled in and through Valley County on its way to Fort Peck Marina, the Valley County Justice's Court was an appropriate venue. The Supreme Court affirmed denial of Diesen's motion to dismiss. St. v. Diesen, 2000 MT 1, 297 M 459, 992 P2d 1287, 57 St. Rep. 1 (2000).

CHAPTER 4
INVESTIGATIVE PROCEDURES

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

1991 Chapter Comments: The statutes governing the investigation of death included provisions for the conduct of an autopsy (1987 MCA 46-4-101 through 46-4-104) and the conduct of a coroner's inquest (1987 MCA 46-4-201 through 46-4-207). Research revealed that only five states addressed these investigative procedures in their criminal codes. None of the states that have adopted criminal procedure rules have retained these investigative procedures in rule form.

The Commission neither felt the need for nor addressed any amendments to the code provisions governing autopsies. Certainly, an autopsy is a valuable tool, but it does not seem related to criminal procedure. Although an autopsy may be required by either the County Attorney or the Attorney General, the conduct of an autopsy is generally controlled by the County Coroner. The Commission suggested that the autopsy provisions be removed to Title 7, MCA, which contains provisions governing the County Coroner's office.

The Coroner's inquest is a juried inquiry into the cause of any suspicious death. Although an inquest is not commonly called for, the procedure has proved to be a useful investigative tool under certain circumstances. The inquest provisions have been retained in the statutes, but some changes have been made to reflect the manner in which inquests are conducted. The Coroner's register requirement that appeared at 1987 MCA 46-4-207 has not been retained.

Neither the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure nor the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure have provisions for these investigative procedures.

Chapter Case Notes

Differences Between Suspects in Photographs — Lineup Not Impermissibly Suggestive: A witness identified Baldwin in a photographic lineup, but Baldwin contended that the lineup was impermissibly suggestive because of numerous differences among the subjects in the photographs. The Supreme Court was not persuaded. Mere variations in appearance among photographs presented to a witness do not automatically invalidate an identification. St. v. Baldwin, 2003 MT 346, 318 M 489, 81 P3d 488 (2003), following U.S. v. Robertson, 606 F2d 853 (9th Cir. 1979).

One-on-One Showup Identification Impermissibly Suggestive — Witness Testimony Permissible Under Totality of Circumstances: Bingman sought to exclude the testimony of witnesses in a felony DUI trial on grounds that the witnesses' observation of Bingman through a two-way window at the police department was impermissibly suggestive, resulting in an unreliable identification. The suggestive nature of one-on-one showup identifications has been previously recognized. In St. v. Clark, 2000 MT 40, 298 M 300, 997 P2d 107 (2000), the Supreme Court set out a two-part test for determining whether evidence gained from such an identification is permissible. The state conceded that the identification procedure was impermissibly suggestive, satisfying the first part of the Clark test. The second part of the test requires a determination of whether, under the totality of the circumstances, the identification gave rise to a substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification. In this case, despite the impermissibly suggestive nature of the showup identification procedure, the certainty with which the witnesses identified Bingman outweighed the likelihood of misidentification, so the District Court did not err in allowing the witnesses' testimony. St. v. Bingman, 2002 MT 350, 313 M 376, 61 P3d 153 (2002).

Identification Procedure Impermissibly Suggestive — Motion In Limine to Suppress Witness's In-Court Identification Properly Denied — No Substantial Likelihood of Irreparable Misidentification: A witness stood by defendant's car for several minutes after an accident observing him for injuries and then left to get help when she saw that he appeared drunk and that there was a pistol on the car seat. When the witness returned and police arrived, the defendant and pistol were gone. After many procedural delays and the suppression of evidence of defendant's driver's license taken from the car, the County Attorney's office sent a letter to the witness along with two photographs of defendant in jailhouse attire. The state affirmatively identified the person in the photos as defendant and asked the witness to notify the County Attorney's office if the photos didn't depict the person whom she saw in the car. Defendant's motion in limine to prohibit the witness's identification testimony was denied by the District Court. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that although the identification procedure was impermissibly suggestive, considering the totality of the circumstances, it did not create a substantial likelihood of misidentification and the motion was properly denied. St. v. Clark, 2000 MT 40, 298 M 300, 997 P2d 107, 57 St. Rep. 185 (2000).

Illegal Activities of Informant Not Considered Outrageous Government Conduct: Briner cited the doctrine of outrageous government conduct, as recognized in U.S. v. Stenberg, 803 F2d 422 (9th Cir. 1986), when contending that the government's failure to monitor and control the activities of an informant upon whose testimony Briner was convicted violated a sense of justice and barred his conviction. However, there was no evidence that: (1) the government participated in or was aware of the informant's illegal activities; (2) the government engaged in brutality to or coercion of the informant to convince him to inform; (3) Briner was entrapped; or (4) there was any connection between local law enforcement and the informant's illegal activities. As established in U.S. v. Simpson, 813 F2d 1462 (9th Cir. 1987), the government is not held accountable for unrelated criminal activity of an informant, especially when law enforcement was unaware of such activity. Consequently, the doctrine of outrageous government conduct did not apply. St. v. Briner, 253 M 158, 831 P2d 1365, 49 St. Rep. 402 (1992).

Evaluation of Likelihood of Misidentification: D.K. was forcibly raped at knife point in her home in Butte. After the rape, D.K. was shown photographic lineups, one of which contained a 1977 photo of defendant and the other a current picture of defendant. D.K. could not identify her attacker but showed interest in the photos of defendant. Defendant's photos were the only ones bearing the words "Police Dep't. Butte, Montana". At a physical lineup, D.K. immediately identified defendant as her attacker. The trial court granted defendant's motion to exclude the photo identification but denied motions to suppress evidence of the physical lineup or to prevent any in-court identification. On appeal, defendant contended that the photo lineups were impermissibly suggestive and tainted any later identification. The Supreme Court followed the two-pronged test of determining if the identification procedure was impermissibly suggestive and, if so, whether under the totality of the circumstances the procedure had a tendency to give rise to a likelihood of misidentification (St. v. Lara, 179 M 201, 587 P2d 930 (1978)). The court used the five factors set out in Neil v. Biggers, 409 US 188, 34 L Ed 2d 401, 93 S Ct 375 (1970), to evaluate the likelihood of misidentification. Considering the totality of the circumstances, the court did not find that the photo lineups gave rise to an "irreparable misidentification". St. v. Bauer, 210 M 298, 683 P2d 946, 41 St. Rep. 1066 (1984). The five-part Neil test was applied in St. v. Schoffner, 248 M 260, 811 P2d 548, 48 St. Rep. 424 (1991), St. v. Clark, 2000 MT 40, 298 M 300, 997 P2d 107, 57 St. Rep. 185 (2000), and St. v. Baldwin, 2003 MT 346, 318 M 489, 81 P3d 488 (2003). See also St. v. Hedrick, 229 M 145, 745 P2d 355, 44 St. Rep. 1849 (1987).

Photographic Lineup — When Not Overly Suggestive — No Right to Have Counsel Present: A defendant appealed from a robbery conviction. He alleged that a motion to suppress evidence relating to pretrial photographic lineup procedures should have been sustained. The motion was based on contentions that the victim's ability to identify him was tainted by the fact the victim had seen him in police custody shortly after the robbery and that the victim may have seen another photograph of him which had been in the custody of a police officer. The defendant also challenged the suggestiveness of the lineup because his attorney was not present. If the photographic identification process was so suggestive as to present a "substantial likelihood of misidentification", an in-court identification of the defendant would not be permitted. Under the circumstances of this particular case, there was not a substantial chance of misidentification. Further, the reviewing court followed a U.S. Supreme Court decision and stated that the confrontation clause is not violated by a photoarray identification process, and therefore the right to counsel does not attach. Accordingly, the motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Dahl, 190 M 207, 620 P2d 361, 37 St. Rep. 1852 (1980).

1991 Amendment: Inserted (1) relating to jurisdiction of Coroner of county where dead human body is found; in (2), at end of first sentence, substituted "the coroner of the county where the acts or events causing death occurred has jurisdiction" for "the coroner of either county shall have jurisdiction" and in second sentence substituted "If a coroner that has jurisdiction of a death fails to act, the state medical examiner has jurisdiction" for "If a conflict of jurisdiction should arise or should said coroners fail to act, the coroner of the county where the death occurred shall have the primary jurisdiction"; inserted (3) relating to jurisdiction of Coroner in county in which he serves and relating to travel to another county; and made minor changes in style.

Coordination: Section 265(3), Ch. 800, L. 1991, provided: "If Senate Bill No. 331 is passed and approved and if it includes a section that amends 46-4-101, then the sections of [this act] that amends 46-4-101 is void." Senate Bill No. 331 amended 46-4-101 and was enacted as Ch. 660, L. 1991.

46-4-103. Autopsy — when conducted, scope.

Commission Comments

Source: New.

This section, in conjunction with [46-4-102 (now repealed)], gives the coroner wide discretion to perform or provide for autopsies to be performed. This is consistent with the primary function of the office. This section specifically authorizes autopsies without the holding of inquests. Records and reports of autopsies made under this act shall be received as evidence in any court or other proceeding, except that statements by conclusions on extraneous matters are not intended to be made admissible. The person preparing a report hereunder to be given in evidence may be subpoenaed as a witness in any civil or criminal case by any party. Copies of the report, when duly attested by the coroner shall be received in any proceeding as the original and are to be part of the public record.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 345 inserted (5) requiring autopsies pursuant to 72-17-216 and 72-17-218 on decedent whose death is under investigation and who made anatomical gift. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 20, Ch. 345, L. 2007, provided: "[This act] applies to an anatomical gift or amendment to, revocation of, or refusal to make an anatomical gift made before October 1, 2007."

1991 Amendment: In (1), in first sentence, inserted "performed on any dead human body for which the death requires an inquiry" and inserted "or associate medical examiner", inserted third sentence relating to no need for family consent of an ordered autopsy, and in last sentence inserted "county attorney, or attorney general"; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) A full record of the facts found shall be made on a form provided by the division of forensic science in triplicate, the coroner and medical examiner retaining one copy and delivering the other to the county attorney"; in (3), after "investigation", inserted "or inquiry"; inserted (4) relating to appropriate facilities if a morgue is not provided; and made minor changes in style.

Coordination: Section 265(4), Ch. 800, L. 1991, provided: "If Senate Bill No. 331 is passed and approved and if it includes a section that amends 46-4-103, then the section of [this act] that amends 46-4-103 is void." Senate Bill No. 331 amended 46-4-103 and was enacted as Ch. 660, L. 1991.

Source: New.

The purpose of this provision is to eliminate the coroner's inquest except when the county attorney requests one to be held. The county attorney should request inquests to be held when he believes them necessary in:

(a) All violent deaths, whether apparently homicidal, suicidal, or accidental.

(b) Deaths not caused by readily recognizable disease, disability or infirmity, where there is a reasonable possibility of criminal action.

(c) Deaths under suspicious circumstances.

(d) Deaths from causes which might constitute a threat to public health.

(e) Deaths of inmates of public institutions not hospitalized therein for disease.

(f) Deaths from occupational disease or hazards.

The preliminary determination of whether a crime has been committed is primarily a police function. It is generally recognized that a coroner seldom has the training to investigate properly and that in most instances an inquisition is a clumsy means of investigation. Therefore, the power of a coroner to investigate and to hold inquests has been restricted.

One of the primary purposes of an inquest is to "clear the air" in the case of a controversial death, and to require a secret inquest would defeat this objective.

that discovery of constitutionally protected material, such as medical records, requires a showing of a compelling state interest."

1991 Amendment: In three places substituted references to prosecutor for references to Attorney General or County Attorney; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Revealing Limited Medical Information During Police Interview Not Considered Waiver of Constitutional Right to Confidentiality in Medical Records — Voluntary Medical Information Outside Scope of Fruit of Poisonous Tree Doctrine — Adequate Probable Cause for Investigative Subpoena of Medical Records: Bilant was involved in a three-car accident and was subsequently arrested for DUI and a seat belt violation. During an interview following the arrest, Bilant revealed to an officer that he had taken pain medication on the day of the accident. The officer called Bilant's health care provider for confirmation, and the provider confirmed that Bilant had a prescription for a drug similar to the pain medication that he mentioned. The officer then procured an investigative subpoena regarding documentation on all prescriptions issued to Bilant, including any advisory warnings, and the provider sent Bilant's entire medical file. Bilant contended that the state violated both his constitutional right to privacy and the statutory protections of 50-16-535. The state maintained that Bilant waived his claim of confidentiality in his medical information when he voluntarily revealed his use of pain medication to the officer. The Supreme Court agreed with Bilant. Medical records are quintessentially private and deserve the utmost constitutional protection. None of the statutory prerequisites for disclosure of the medical records were met. In deciding to reveal limited medical information in a police interview, Bilant did not forfeit his constitutional right to subsequently claim confidentiality in his medical records. The officer conducted an illegal search in seeking the constitutionally protected private medical information without probable cause and the benefit of an investigative subpoena under this section, and the information gleaned from the telephone call should have been suppressed. Bilant then contended that the use of the illegally obtained information formed an improper basis for the investigative subpoena and that the results of the subpoena should also have been suppressed pursuant to the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine, which forbids the use of evidence that comes to light as the result of an initially illegal act. However, on this point, the Supreme Court disagreed with Bilant. One exception to the doctrine is that the derivative evidence is admissible if it is obtained from an independent source. Here, Bilant himself provided the source by giving voluntary medical information from other than the illegal telephone inquiry. The Supreme Court recognized that an investigative subpoena seeking constitutionally protected medical information requires greater justification for state access than the administration of justice rationale used to obtain public information under this section, so in reviewing the probable cause basis for constitutionally protected material, the court excised the illegal evidence from the application and reviewed the remaining information de novo to determine whether probable cause existed for issuing the subpoena. In this case, even when the information subject to suppression was excised, the remaining evidence established probable cause that a DUI was committed and underscored a compelling state interest in medical records related to prescription medicines in order to confirm Bilant's initial admission to the officer. Thus, the subpoena was issued in accordance with the statutory requirements for constitutionally protected medical records, and Bilant's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Bilant, 2001 MT 249, 307 M 113, 36 P3d 883 (2001). See also St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919 (1996), and St. v. Nelson, 283 M 231, 941 P2d 441 (1997).

Investigative Subpoena — Discovery of Medical Records: The District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to exclude evidence of blood tests taken at the hospital after a car accident. The state's application for an investigative subpoena demonstrated that it had probable cause to believe an offense had been committed and that the defendant's medical records contained evidence of the offense. St. v. Ingraham, 1998 MT 156, 290 M 18, 966 P2d 103, 55 St. Rep. 611 (1998).

Administration of Justice Standard Unconstitutional as Applied to Constitutionally Protected Medical Records — Compelling State Interest Required: The defendant was treated for a broken jaw following an automobile accident. Concerned with the defendant's lack of pain, the treating physician ordered a blood alcohol test, the results of which were later discovered by an investigating officer through an investigative subpoena and used to convict the defendant of driving under the influence. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the defendant's conviction but ruled that as applied to the discovery of constitutionally protected material such as medical records, the state law that allows the issuance of an investigative subpoena "if the administration of justice so requires" is unconstitutional. Medical records may be discovered through an investigative subpoena only upon a showing of compelling state interest under Art.

II, sec. 10, Mont. Const. St. v. Nelson, 283 M 231, 941 P2d 441, 54 St. Rep. 576 (1997), followed in St. v. Ingraham, 1998 MT 156, 290 M 18, 966 P2d 103, 55 St. Rep. 611 (1998), and distinguished in St. v. Dolan, 283 M 245, 940 P2d 436, 54 St. Rep. 583 (1997).

Exclusionary Rule Not Extended to Investigative Subpoenas: The defendant argued that the officer obtaining the investigative subpoena had misread a warranty deed and alleged that the defendant had paid the sellers of his residence $10,000 in addition to his downpayment, when in reality the document stated that consideration of only $10 had been paid. The Supreme Court stated that the erroneous conclusions contained within the application did not invalidate the remaining information and declined to extend the exclusionary rule to investigative subpoenas. St. v. Baldwin, 242 M 176, 789 P2d 1215, 47 St. Rep. 614 (1990).

Jurisdiction to Issue Investigative Subpoenas: The plain language of 46-4-301 vests every District Court Judge with the power to issue investigative subpoenas with no jurisdictional limitation. There simply is no requirement, explicit or implicit, that the subpoena be issued by the sitting judge of the district where the crime allegedly occurred. The venue statutes have no application to the jurisdictions of any District Court to issue such subpoenas, which jurisdiction is coextensive with the state boundaries. St. v. Holmes, 212 M 526, 687 P2d 662, 41 St. Rep. 1535 (1984).

Availability of Investigative Subpoena: A subpoena must be issued by a court and is not available to the Attorney General or other prosecuting attorneys independent of a court or grand jury. Under former law, a subpoena was not available in cases not filed. State ex rel. Woodahl v. District Court, 166 M 31, 530 P2d 780 (1975).

CHAPTER 5
SEARCH AND SEIZURE

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

1991 Chapter Comments: The law of search and seizure has proved to be a dynamic part of American jurisprudence. The law requires a valid search warrant before a search and seizure may occur. There are exceptions to that rule, however, and those exceptions are continually being revised. The Commission recognized that any attempt to define the exceptions to the warrant requirement might stifle this evolutionary process. The statute, therefore, states only a basic warrant requirement and exceptions to that requirement. No attempt to define or list all of the exceptions has been made.

Following the basic warrant requirement, the statutes concern the issuance and execution of a warrant and the disposition of any property seized. The majority of the statutes in this area preserve the 1987 code. When appropriate, the statute is compared with the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure.

GENERAL

Field Sobriety Test Not a Search: Purdie was stopped as part of routine traffic control as he passed a vehicular accident. The police officer who stopped him smelled alcohol. When Purdie left the accident scene driving erratically, the police officer stopped him again and asked him to get out of the car and perform some field sobriety tests. He showed a lack of coordination during the tests. Purdie argued that the test results were the fruits of an illegal warrantless search. The Supreme Court disagreed. Field sobriety tests are not searches protected by the constitution. St. v. Purdie, 209 M 352, 680 P2d 576, 41 St. Rep. 754 (1984).

Standing by Overnight Guest to Contest Search of Dwelling: The defendant appealed his denial of standing to contest a search of a dwelling that resulted in evidence against him. The defendant was an overnight guest in the dwelling searched, and that fact coupled with his lack of ownership interest in the dwelling is a factor to consider in determining standing, but it is not the controlling factor. Another factor to consider is whether the defendant had a reasonable expectation of freedom from government intrusion. Here, the dominion over the dwelling exercised by the defendant as the sole occupant at the time of search and the fact that evidence was seized in areas where he slept and stored his belongings were sufficient to grant standing to the defendant. St. v. Isom, 196 M 330, 641 P2d 417, 39 St. Rep. 137 (1982).

Arrest and Search Warrants — Probable Cause Requirements: For the issuance of a proper warrant, only a probability of criminal conduct must be shown. A County Attorney and a Sheriff's deputy, both of whom had been on the scene of an abduction, gave sworn testimony to the Justice of the Peace. The County Attorney's signed affidavit became part of an arrest warrant and a search warrant. Although the combination of the sworn testimony and the affidavit established probable cause, there was also additional testimony that placed the defendant at the scene of the abduction where the victim's watch was found in a pool of blood before warrants were sought. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980).

Specificity of Search Warrant — Required Information — Limits of Coverage: For the search of a vehicle, all that is needed to meet the requirements of specificity is that the officer with reasonable effort can ascertain the automobile intended to be searched, and its owner, if possible.

The affidavit for the search warrant here listed five of seven criteria needed for identification of a motor vehicle (i.e., owner, make, model, year, color, motor number, and license number), and that was sufficiently specific. Under the search warrant "any other contraband" not specifically described could be seized as long as a reasonable relationship was demonstrated between the authorized search and seizure of the items not specifically described therein. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980).

REASONABLE SEARCH AND SEIZURE

Reasonable Cause for Warrantless Probationary Search — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Smith's live-in girlfriend was arrested on a probation violation for failing to report her change in residence and subsequently tested positive for drugs, which provided reasonable cause for her probation officer to conduct a warrantless search of her new residence—Smith's trailer. The search revealed weapons, drug paraphernalia, items used to manufacture and distribute drugs, and some of the girlfriend's personal items. The officer then decided to search a bus parked near the trailer, and while waiting for a warrant, Smith arrived. Based on the items found in the trailer and an officer's knowledge that Smith's driver's license was suspended, Smith was arrested and found to be in possession of a large amount of cash, drugs, and paraphernalia. More drugs and chemical precursors of methamphetamine were subsequently found in Smith's vehicle and in the bus. Smith moved to suppress all evidence obtained in the searches on grounds that the initial search was unlawful because it was not justified as a probation search or by any other exception to the warrant requirements, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Because the initial search was a probationary search of the residence of the woman living with Smith and was justified by reasonable cause and because Smith did not challenge the legality of the searches of his person and vehicles, the District Court did not err in determining that the searches were lawful and in denying Smith's motion to suppress the evidence. St. v. Smith, 2008 MT 7, 341 M 82, 176 P3d 258 (2008).

Frisk Incident to Investigatory Stop: A peace officer may frisk an individual for weapons incident to making an investigatory stop. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990), following Terry v. Ohio, 392 US 1, 20 L Ed 2d 889, 88 S Ct 1868 (1968).

Delayed Seizure of Articles in Plain View: A seizure that is proper under the "plain view" exception may be delayed, so long as the delay is reasonable. St. v. Romero, 224 M 431, 730 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 2309 (1986).

Warrantless Administrative Search Under Federal Law and "Plain View" Seizure Upheld: Where the defendant moved to suppress evidence of his possession and intent to sell hashish, arguing that the warrantless search under federal law by an agriculture inspector of a package addressed to him and seizure of the package violated his constitutional rights, the District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to suppress. The search was conducted under the Federal Plant Pest Act, 7 U.S.C. sections 147a -167, and the Hawaiian and territorial quarantine rules, 7 C.F.R. section 318. Under the administrative search principles articulated in Camara v. Municipal Court, 387 US 523, 18 L Ed 2d 930, 87 S Ct 1727 (1967), and See v. City of Seattle, 387 US 541, 18 L Ed 2d 943, 87 S Ct 1737 (1967), a government official is entitled to conduct administrative searches without a warrant when, as in this case, the evidence could otherwise be speedily removed. Nor, under Camara and U.S. v. Davis, 482 F2d 893 (9th Cir. 1973), must probable cause be shown for this type of search. The package and its contents were then lawfully seized under the "plain view" rule announced in Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 US 443, 29 L Ed 2d 564, 91 S Ct 2022 (1971), and modified in Texas v. Brown, 460 US 730, 75 L Ed 2d 502, 103 S Ct 1535 (1983). The defendant's United States Constitution fourth amendment rights were therefore not violated. St. v. Kelly, 205 M 417, 668 P2d 1032, 40 St. Rep. 1400 (1983).

Warrantless Testing and Reopening of Evidence After Lawful Search and Seizure Upheld: Where an agriculture inspector in Hawaii lawfully opened a package in Hawaii, had its contents chemically tested in Hawaii, and shipped the package to Bozeman, Montana, where police officers opened the package without a warrant and made a controlled delivery to and arrested the defendant, the District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to suppress the evidence in the package. Once the agriculture inspector in Hawaii had recognized and seized the package under federal law, the defendant had no further reasonable expectation of privacy in the seized package. Under the rationale of U.S. v. Andrews, 618 F2d 646 (10th Cir. 1980) and U.S. v. Ford, 525 F2d 1308 (10th Cir. 1975), no privacy interest of the defendant was violated by transmission of the package for testing in Hawaii and shipment and opening of the package in Montana. Because government dominion over the package "continued unbroken" for all reasonable purposes, from its seizure in Hawaii to its delivery in Montana, the package could be opened without a warrant. St. v. Kelly, 205 M 417, 668 P2d 1032, 40 St. Rep. 1400 (1983).

Seizure of Evidence in Auto After Arrest on a "Particularized Suspicion": Seizure of evidence that was in plain view in defendant's car as he was arrested after a "particularized suspicion", meeting the test adopted in St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293 (1981), was valid because the arrest was a lawful arrest. St. v. Schatz, 194 M 59, 634 P2d 1193, 38 St. Rep. 1687 (1981).

UNREASONABLE SEARCH AND SEIZURE

Suspicion Insufficient: An arrest or search and seizure made without a warrant is illegal and therefore unreasonable when it is made upon mere suspicion or belief unsupported by facts, circumstances, or credible information calculated to produce such belief. State ex rel. Wong You v. District Court, 106 M 347, 78 P2d 353 (1938).

Search of Person Unlawfully Arrested: The constitutional provision against unreasonable search and seizure applies to the person and his baggage and personal belongings and to the search of a person unlawfully arrested and the seizure of his personal belongings. St. v. Mullaney, 92 M 553, 16 P2d 407 (1932).

When Unreasonable: Searches and seizures that are not lawful and are not conducted as the law prescribes are unreasonable. St. v. Mullaney, 92 M 553, 16 P2d 407 (1932); State ex rel. King v. District Court, 70 M 191, 224 P 862 (1924). See also State ex rel. Sadler v. District Court, 70 M 378, 225 P 1000 (1924).

No Consent: The admission of evidence that shoes taken from the defendant without his consent corresponded with tracks found near the scene of the killing did not deprive the defendant of the rights guaranteed to him by the Montana Constitution. St. v. Fuller, 34 M 12, 85 P 369 (1906).

46-5-101. Searches and seizures — when authorized.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute replaces the general rule authorizing searches and seizures previously codified as 1987 MCA 46-5-101. That section, like the code in many states, provided for a general warrant requirement and allowed for only a few exceptions. The exceptions provided for in Montana's 1987 code were: (1) search incident to arrest; (2) search with consent; and (3) search within the scope of a lawful inspection. Many other exceptions recognized in Montana were not codified; these include the plain view search, the auto search, and the inventory search.

As previously indicated, this statute continues the general warrant requirement and recognizes that exceptions to the warrant requirement do exist. While the statute differs from the 1987 code, it is not anticipated that this change will result in any changes in practice or in law.

The Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure do not provide for searches and seizures. The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure are reflected in this statute in that the federal rules do not attempt to identify the exceptions to the general warrant requirement. See Rule 41, Fed. R. Crim. P.

Source: New.

This is new and has no counterpart in present Montana sections or codes of other states. It is intended to state the law as to when searches and seizures are authorized and codifies the present law as laid down by state and federal decisions. It is the law in Montana and under the federal decisions that a search and seizure may be made without a warrant as an incident to a lawful arrest or where the individual freely and intelligently gives his unequivocal and specific consent to search, uncontaminated by any express or implied duress. State v. Tomich, 332 F.2d 987 (9th Cir.) Also see: State v. Nelson, 130 Mont. 466, 304 P.2d 1110.

Subsection (4) is not meant to broaden any right to inspection, but only to provide when search and seizure may be made under constitutionally authorized inspections. Therefore, reasonable regulatory sections which are designed to protect the public welfare are not within the protection of unreasonable search and seizures (e.g., right of livestock inspectors, building inspectors, et al.).

GENERAL

Admissible Evidence in Drug Case Obtained Through Informant — Actual Informant Testimony Allowed: A confidential informant wearing a wire purchased drugs from Schwartz, but no search warrant was issued for the electronic monitoring. The state indicated that it would call the informant to testify but would not introduce the results of the electronic monitoring. Schwartz moved to suppress all evidence seized as the result of a search conducted by the informant. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The evidence derived through the informant and not through contemporaneous electric monitoring was admissible. Thus, the District Court was correct in declining to suppress actual testimony by the confidential informant, including identification of Schwartz as the seller and identification of the actual drugs purchased. St. v. Schwartz, 2009 MT 234, 351 M 384, 212 P3d 1060 (2009). See also St. v. Hanley, 186 M 410, 608 P2d 104 (1980), and St. v. Bassett, 189 M 28, 614 P2d 1054 (1980).

No Privacy Expectation for Defendant With Respect to Rental Car When Rental Agreement Terminated: Payne, who was driving a rental car, was stopped for speeding and subsequently arrested for driving under the influence. During the stop, based on observations, the officer asked Payne if he was carrying drugs or large amounts of cash, and Payne responded that he was not. Payne also stated that he was traveling from Pittsburgh to Seattle to visit his children and flying back. The officer was suspicious because Payne was driving thousands of miles to visit but flying back after only a few hours. Payne was transported to the Sheriff's office, the vehicle was towed, and the rental company was notified. The rental company immediately terminated its contract with Payne under terms of the agreement and requested that Payne's personal items be removed from the car so that the company could have someone retrieve the vehicle. Payne subsequently consented to a search of the car, but officers obtained a warrant covering Payne's property that was found in the car. When removing Payne's property, the officer found some drugs and paraphernalia in plain view and removed a toolbox from the trunk. The toolbox contained $129,970. A petition for forfeiture was filed for the funds in the toolbox, and Payne argued that the petition should be dismissed, claiming that the search of the vehicle was illegal. The Supreme Court held that Payne did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the contents in the vehicle once the rental company had justifiably terminated the agreement based upon Payne's arrest. The Supreme Court also held that no constitutional protections extended to the items in plain sight in the vehicle and that once Payne was lawfully stopped, the officer's contact with the rental company did not constitute an illegal pretext for securing the company's permission to remove Payne's property from the car. The Supreme Court also held that the rental company's knowing and voluntary request for the removal of Payne's property from the car constituted a recognized exception to the warrant requirement of this section. St. v. $129,970.00 in U.S. Currency, 2007 MT 148, 337 M 475, 161 P3d 816 (2007).

Analysis of Federal Knock and Announce Statute — Involvement of Federal Postal Inspector: A postal inspector suspected that a package addressed to Ochadleus contained drugs. The inspector took the package to the Billings DEA office, and a drug-sniffing dog alerted to the package. The inspector obtained a search warrant, and the package was found to contain marijuana. The inspector then obtained a warrant to search the intended destination of the package. The package was delivered by the inspector later that day, and shortly thereafter, state officers executed the search warrant and arrested Ochadleus for possession with intent to distribute. Ochadleus contended that the state officers violated the federal knock and announce statute, 18 U.S.C. 3109, noting that the officers failed to knock. The Supreme Court disagreed. The statute does not directly apply to state law enforcement officers, but rather applies when federal officers are a significant part of a search conducted pursuant to a state warrant, as in this case involving a federal postal inspector and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration. Additionally, the statute does not contain an express requirement that officers actually knock on the door, but rather requires that officers give notice of their authority and purpose. Here, Ochadleus's roommate saw the officers through the window in the door and then backed away. It was reasonable for the officers to assume that the action of backing away was a refusal to admit them, and it would have been futile for the officers to knock before entering. Thus, the federal statute was not violated, the forced entry was lawful, and Ochadleus's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Ochadleus, 2005 MT 88, 326 M 441, 110 P3d 448 (2005).

Knock and Announce Rule — Exigent Circumstances Exception — Futility Exception — Warrant Requirements: Without knocking and announcing its presence, a SWAT team broke down the doors of a rental home, discovered a methamphetamine lab, and arrested the occupants, including Anyan. Anyan contended that the entry was illegal and that evidence seized should be suppressed. Following a guilty plea, Anyan appealed on grounds of the illegality of the no-knock entry. Absent state statutory or case law, the Supreme Court examined extensive federal precedent, concluding that pursuant to the right of privacy and the right to be free from illegal search and seizure, an officer serving a search warrant must comply with the knock and announce requirement unless there are exigent circumstances that would present a threat of physical violence or the likelihood that evidence would be destroyed. Mere suspicion or evidence that firearms are present in the residence or that a particular resident is armed is not sufficient to create an exigency; rather, there must be specific information to lead the officer to a reasonable conclusion that the presence of firearms raises a concern for officer safety. Another exception to the knock and announce requirement, known as the futility exception, arises when police have a reasonable suspicion that the occupants know of the police presence and purpose prior to entry and that knocking and announcing would be futile. In addition, the decision to make a no-knock entry should ordinarily be made by a neutral and detached magistrate as part of the application for a search warrant, along with any foreknown exigent circumstances justifying a no-knock entry, but an investigating officer may make the decision if unexpected exigent circumstances arise at the scene. The knock and announce rule is flexible, and courts must determine whether an unannounced entry was reasonable under the particular circumstances of each case, including the time that an officer must wait prior to forced entry. However, unless exigent circumstances exist, the failure of officers to knock and announce their presence renders evidence procured during execution of the search warrant inadmissible. Thus, the officers' no-knock entry into Anyan's house violated federal and state constitutional rights to be free from unreasonable search and seizure, and failure of the District Court to suppress the evidence seized during the search was reversible error. St. v. Anyan, 2004 MT 395, 325 M 245, 104 P3d 511 (2004), followed in St. v. Ochadleus, 2005 MT 88, 326 M 441, 110 P3d 448 (2005), in which the Supreme Court reiterated that no-knock entry into a residence is the exception and not the rule. The Anyan futility exception was also applied in St. v. Hill, 2008 MT 260, 345 M 95, 189 P3d 1201 (2008), where officers responding to a domestic disturbance call did not knock but announced their presence through the open door of a trailer and observed defendant moving aggressively toward the back of the trailer, but defendant ignored their order to stop. The officers had a reasonable suspicion that the trailer occupants knew of their presence and purpose prior to entry. A woman screaming in the trailer indicated an ongoing domestic disturbance, and continuing to wait at the open door after defendant failed to respond would have been superfluous, futile, and dangerous.

Requisite Objective Data and Resulting Suspicion for Lawful Stop and Frisk in Motel Room: Officers were lawfully searching Roehr's motel room when Dawson knocked on the door. An officer opened the door, and Dawson entered, asking for Roehr. The officer told Dawson that he was going to conduct a pat-down search for weapons and asked Dawson if he possessed any weapons, drugs, or needles. Dawson said that he had no weapons. The officer repeated the question. Dawson motioned toward his coat pocket and said that he had some "smoke" in there. The "smoke" turned out to be methamphetamine and drug paraphernalia. Dawson sought to suppress the evidence, contending that the search was illegal because the officer had no articulable, reasonable suspicion that Dawson had engaged in criminal activity. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that Roehr was a known criminal and that his room had been under surveillance for suspected drug activity. The officer had probable cause to believe that Roehr was conducting transactions involving dangerous drugs and stolen property in the room. When Dawson appeared, asking for Roehr, the officer had a particularized suspicion, based on the totality of the circumstances, to believe that Dawson had committed or was about to commit an offense. Thus, sufficient cause existed to detain Dawson. Further, in the officer's experience, people involved in drug offenses frequently carry weapons. The officer had no prior dealings with Dawson to help him determine whether Dawson was armed and did not know whether Dawson presented a danger to the officers conducting the search of the room, so reasonable cause existed to suspect that Dawson was armed and dangerous. Therefore, the officer possessed the requisite objective data and resulting suspicion to lawfully stop and frisk Dawson, and denial of the motion to suppress the fruits of the search was not error. St. v. Dawson, 1999 MT 171, 295 M 212, 983 P2d 916, 56 St. Rep. 668 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Anderson, 1999 MT 60, 293 M 490, 977 P2d 983, 56 St. Rep. 252 (1999).

Field Sobriety Tests Constitute Search — Particularized Suspicion Needed: Field sobriety tests are not merely observations of a person's physical behavior but constitute a search under the fourth amendment to the United States Constitution and Art. II, sec. 11, Mont. Const., because an individual's constitutionally protected privacy interests are implicated in both the process of conducting the tests and in the information disclosed by the tests. An officer observes certain aspects of an individual's physical and psychological condition that would not otherwise be observable. A compelling state interest is needed to invade privacy interest. Montana has a compelling state interest in removing drunk drivers from the road. The officer's observation of such traits as the manner of walking to and from the squad car, height and weight, speech, appearance, and smell is distinguished and does not constitute a search because an individual has no reasonable expectation of privacy as to the traits. An investigatory stop and field sobriety tests are constitutional if based upon particularized suspicion. The particularized suspicion for the investigatory stop may also serve as the particularized suspicion for the field sobriety tests if the basis for the stop leads the officer to believe that the driver is intoxicated. Part or all of the grounds for the particularized suspicion for the field sobriety tests may arise after the investigatory stop when the officer, in the present case, observed defendant drive from a bar at night with her headlights off, he activated his overhead lights, she did not respond, he activated his siren, she stopped in half a block, he smelled alcohol on her breath and saw bloodshot eyes, she had difficulty in producing her license, and he asked her to perform three field sobriety tests. Administration of the tests was a constitutionally permissible search arising from a particularized suspicion that was based on the officer's observations after the investigatory stop. The lower court properly found that the officer had reasonable grounds to believe that defendant was driving under the influence. Hulse v. St., 1998 MT 108, 289 M 1, 961 P2d 75, 55 St. Rep. 415 (1998), followed in St. v. Steinmetz, 1998 MT 114, 288 M 527, 961 P2d 95, 55 St. Rep. 450 (1998), and Bramble v. St., 1999 MT 132, 294 M 501, 982 P2d 464, 56 St. Rep. 532 (1999).

Frisk and Search Incidental to Termination of Employment: An employment dispute, including threats by an employee against company management, led to a termination meeting. Because of the nature of the dispute, one of the managers requested the presence of a Sheriff at the meeting "to keep the peace". The Sheriff asked that the request and reasons for asking assistance be made in writing. The manager provided a written request, giving details of the threats. The Sheriff and two deputies were present and frisked the employee upon his arrival. The frisk and search lasted less than 2 minutes. On appeal, the employee contended that the company requested the Sheriff's presence at the meeting and that the ensuing frisk was an invasion of the employee's right of privacy, citing Johnson v. Supersave Mkt., Inc., 211 M 465, 686 P2d 209 (1984), for the premise that a person's right to liberty is legally protected from invasion and that emotional distress proximately caused thereby constitutes recoverable damages for invasion of privacy. The District Court properly held that the officer's search was not a substantial invasion of a legally protected interest, that the employee had provided no authority to support an invasion of privacy tort theory, and that the search was part of and could not be separated from the termination. There was no evidence that the employer participated in the decision to frisk and search, and an agency relationship was not established. Koepplin v. Zortman Min., Inc., 267 M 53, 881 P2d 1306, 51 St. Rep. 880 (1994).

Issuing Magistrate Involved in Police Investigation — Subsequent Search Warrant Improper: Following a burglary and upon receiving a report of an empty safe being found in the water, the Sheriff, a deputy, and the Justice of the Peace traveled to the site, discussing the evidence and the investigation. Two days later, after additional evidence was gathered, the Justice of the Peace issued a search warrant to search Wilson's truck. Upon conviction, Wilson challenged the impartiality of the Justice of the Peace to issue a warrant. Once the magistrate became an active participant in the police investigation, his impartiality ceased and he could no longer make a neutral and detached evaluation of the evidence to determine whether probable cause existed and thus could no longer protect Wilson's right to be free from a search not based on probable cause. Because the warrant was invalid, the subsequent search was illegal and evidence from the search was suppressed. St. v. Wilson, 266 M 146, 879 P2d 683, 51 St. Rep. 697 (1994).

Seizure of Clothing as Material Evidence of Crime: Defendant was lawfully taken into custody on charges of robbery, and the police followed their standard practice of taking detainees' clothing. It was not error for the police to take defendant's shoe and match it with a print found at the crime scene when there was probable cause to believe defendant's clothing would provide material evidence of the crime for which he was arrested. St. v. Jellison, 236 M 300, 769 P2d 711, 46 St. Rep. 376 (1989).

Drugs Found in Search for Marital Property — No Expectation of Privacy: When search of a storage shed pursuant to a court order to retrieve marital property revealed illegal drugs, the search was not for contraband or any illegally possessed property and defendant could not claim a legitimate expectation of privacy, especially since he disclaimed any interest in the shed's contents. St. v. Clausen, 228 M 20, 740 P2d 679, 44 St. Rep. 1308 (1987).

Investigatory Stop of Vehicle by Officer Armed With Shotgun — Justified and Appropriate in Circumstances: Although a deputy stopping a vehicle was armed with a shotgun held in port position and later testified that the defendants were not free to leave, the manner in which the deputy stopped the defendants' vehicle was justified and appropriate in the circumstances and did not amount to an arrest. The criteria set forth in St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293, 38 St. Rep. 1078 (1981), for an investigatory stop were satisfied when the deputy was sufficiently qualified although his length of employment, experience, and training were not great and when the facts he possessed made his suspicions particularized to a specific activity in a specific vehicle. St. v. Morsette, 201 M 233, 654 P2d 503, 39 St. Rep. 2078 (1982).

Juveniles — Suppression of Statements and Evidence: In the trial of a juvenile for shooting a police officer, a motion for suppression of evidence, obtained under authority of a lawful inspection and statements voluntarily made, was erroneously granted. However, statements made after a waiver of counsel, which were void because of lack of counsel for the underaged defendant, were properly suppressed. St. v. District Court, 176 M 257, 577 P2d 849 (1978).

Liability of Police Officer: The action of a police officer proceeding on the basis of his reasonable, good faith understanding of the law cannot be tortious. Strung v. Anderson, 529 P2d 1380, 32 St. Rep. 144 (1975) (not reported in Montana Reports), followed in Dorwart v. Caraway, 1998 MT 191, 290 M 196, 966 P2d 1121, 55 St. Rep. 777 (1998).

Permissible Purposes: The process of search and seizure may be invoked only in furtherance of public prosecution. State ex rel. King v. District Court, 70 M 191, 224 P 862 (1924).

PRIVATE CITIZEN SEARCHES

No Right to Object to Search of Another's Home and Seizure of Another's Property: No illegal search or seizure was made when a private citizen, after allegedly promising a Deputy Sheriff to do so, went to the home of the woman who hired petitioner to kill her husband and obtained a gun (evidence of the alleged crime) from her. Petitioner's lawyer was not negligent for not moving to suppress introduction of the pistol as evidence at the time of the trial and not making it a subject for appeal. In re Gillham, 218 M 187, 707 P2d 1100, 42 St. Rep. 1508 (1985).

Looking Through Crack in Door of Defendant's Locked Shed: Kloberdanz told the Sheriff that he believed that Henderson was storing a stolen red Peterbilt truck in a shed on his property. Kloberdanz told the Sheriff that he had received a letter from his friend Herrick reporting the theft of his truck from Colorado over Memorial Day weekend. The letter contained a detailed description and sketch of the truck. Two of Kloberdanz's coworkers had mentioned that they had seen a new red Peterbilt in Henderson's shed while picking up some equipment at Henderson's property. Kloberdanz took advantage of an opportunity to go to the Henderson property to pick up equipment for his employer and while there looked through a crack in the door of the locked shed. He told the Sheriff that he had seen a truck that matched the description and sketch of the truck stolen from Herrick. The information Kloberdanz obtained by looking through the crack in the door of the locked shed was obtained in violation of Montana law. U.S. v. Henderson, 721 F2d 662 (9th Cir. 1983).

Integrity of Judicial System: The Montana Constitution provides that "the right of individual privacy is essential to the well-being of a free society and shall not be infringed without the showing of a compelling state interest". The judicial system must not become an accomplice to constitutional violations by admitting illegally obtained evidence. Therefore, evidence obtained by a private citizen in violation of the state constitutional right to privacy is subject to the exclusionary rule and may not be admitted into evidence in a criminal trial in Montana. St. v. Van Haele, 199 M 522, 649 P2d 1311, 39 St. Rep. 1586 (1982).

Manager Search of Rented Storage Unit: After renter of storage unit entered his unit, manager of the storage unit rental business wanted to know how much longer he would be on the premises and wondered what renter was doing, as the unit's door was closed and there were no windows or lights in the unit. She opened the door after a knock and calling out to renter produced no result. Renter was sitting on the floor pointing a gun at the manager and had two suitcases behind him in the dim interior of the unit. Manager left. Pursuant to a suggestion of the business' home office, the manager removed the hinge pins on the door, cut off the padlock, entered, opened a suitcase, found a number of bottles of pills, and called the police. Based on the manager's information the police obtained a search warrant, found over 100 bottles of pills in the suitcases and a purse, and renter was arrested, charged, and convicted of criminal possession of dangerous drugs with intent to sell them. On appeal it was found that the evidence was obtained in violation of renter's state constitutional right to privacy and should have been excluded. The conviction was reversed because it was not supported by the remaining evidence or the law. St. v. Van Haele, 199 M 522, 649 P2d 1311, 39 St. Rep. 1586 (1982).

Entry to Defendant's Porch: There was testimony that two men entered the defendant's porch while the defendant was not at home. The same two men returned and talked to the defendant. The two men returned for a third time with a Deputy Sheriff. After obtaining a search warrant, the Deputy Sheriff searched the defendant's premises. After certain stolen items were found, the defendant was arrested and later convicted of theft. The court rejected the defendant's argument that the two men conducted an unlawful search the first time they entered his porch in violation of the defendant's right of privacy. St. v. Brown, 199 M 472, 649 P2d 1306, 39 St. Rep. 1531 (1982).

Landlord Search of Apartment: The defendant, who had signed a lease allowing his landlord the right to enter the defendant's apartment, borrowed a vacuum cleaner from the landlord, who, upon entering the defendant's room to retrieve the vacuum, saw light coming from a closet and inadvertently discovered marijuana and drug paraphernalia. The District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to suppress the evidence taken after a search warrant was obtained. The landlord was justified in entering the room to show it to prospective lessees or to retrieve the vacuum. Once the landlord was in the apartment, he was justified in inspecting the closet to see if the cause of the light constituted a fire hazard. The landlord could, under the circumstances, permit the police officer to observe the items in the closet, and the officer's observation could be used as a basis for the warrant. St. v. Sayers, 199 M 228, 648 P2d 291, 39 St. Rep. 1309 (1982).

Citizen Search Without Probable Cause Unlawful Warrantless Search: In appeal by the state from a motion suppressing all evidence resulting from an unreasonable search and seizure, the Supreme Court affirmed. A warrantless search is per se unreasonable unless it falls within one of the defined exceptions. Before the warrantless search, neither private citizen searcher could have obtained a valid search warrant because he was not possessed, through his own knowledge or through demonstrably reliable informants, of facts sufficient to establish probable cause, an essential ground for the issuance of a warrant. Since the warrantless search here was per se unreasonable, it was unconstitutional under our federal and state constitutions and therefore unlawful. St. v. Hyem, 193 M 51, 630 P2d 202, 38 St. Rep. 891 (1981).

Warrantless Citizen Search of House — Defendants' Right of Privacy Violated: A warrantless citizen search of house violated defendants' right of privacy without the showing of a compelling state interest. Since the citizens were acting in their individual capacities and not for the state, state action was not involved, and the searchers could never be in a position of showing a compelling state interest, which is the only exception to the restriction against the invasion of individual privacy. Citizens gained entry by pretending to be interested in purchasing the house. Although defendants were aware that their rented house was for sale and being shown to prospective buyers in their absence, defendants did not consent to the search under their bed which turned up stolen skis and thereby waive their right of privacy. St. v. Hyem, 193 M 51, 630 P2d 202, 38 St. Rep. 891 (1981).

Search and Seizure Law — Application to Private Individuals of Montana: Although under the United States Constitution illegally obtained evidence is admissible when seized by a nongovernmental agent not acting in concert with any governmental agency, the Montana Constitution, through sections 10 and 11 of Article II, affords an individual greater explicit protection than do cases interpreting the United States Constitution. The search and seizure provisions of Montana law apply to private individuals as well as law enforcement officers. Therefore, evidence obtained through an illegal invasion of privacy by an individual is not to be admitted. St. v. Helfrich, 183 M 484, 600 P2d 816 (1979).

Exclusionary Rule Applies: The exclusionary rule for suppression of evidence must also apply to searches by private citizens such as security guards, private detectives, political investigators, or any citizen who conducts an unreasonable search or illegal intrusion into the privacy of another. St. v. Coburn, 165 M 488, 530 P2d 442 (1974).

Employer Searching Employee: The motion to suppress evidence was properly granted when the employer removed marijuana from the defendant's coat in a search without a warrant. St. v. Coburn, 165 M 488, 530 P2d 442 (1974).

SEARCH INCIDENT TO ARREST

Particularized Suspicion to Support Canine Sniff of Vehicle and Probable Cause for Warrant to Search Vehicle: Following arrest on outstanding warrants, a dog alerted on Stombaugh's vehicle, a warrant was obtained, and a drug search was conducted. Stombaugh contended that fruits of the search should have been suppressed because officers lacked particularized suspicion to conduct the canine sniff and lacked probable cause to obtain a warrant to search the vehicle. The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed. Based on the facts that Stombaugh's family reported to police regarding Stombaugh's drug use and notified officers that Stombaugh would be visiting the family's home, Stombaugh's admission of pending drug charges in Washington and police confirmation of the pending felony drug charges, Stombaugh's urgency in seeking removal of the vehicle out of the county and an unusual desire to pay more than the vehicle was worth to do so, and discovery of a white pill on the vehicle dashboard and Stombaugh's evasiveness about the pill, the District Court did not err in holding that officers had particularized suspicion to conduct the canine sniff of the vehicle. In addition to the factors considered for particularized suspicion (except the white pill), the warrant application also described the alert of the drug dog on the vehicle, Stombaugh's admission that the vehicle contained drug paraphernalia, and the officers' experience and qualifications with regard to drug crime investigation. Under the totality of the circumstances, the District Court correctly concluded that probable cause existed for issuance of the search warrant. St. v. Stombaugh, 2007 MT 105, 337 M 147, 157 P3d 1137 (2007).

Invalid Warrantless Search of Defendant's Hands Absent Exigent Circumstances: Officers responding to a break-in found blood on doorknobs, light switches, broken glass, and other objects in the house and garage. Matching the description of the suspect, Hardaway was picked up near the scene and found to have blood on his hands. Hardaway was arrested for burglary, and during postarrest processing, blood was swabbed from his hands without permission or a warrant. The blood sample matched the blood evidence found at the scene. Hardaway moved to suppress blood swab evidence obtained from his hands after arrest, but the motion was denied. The District Court reasoned that the swabbing either was not a search, pursuant to St. v. Holzapfel, 230 M 105, 748 P2d 953 (1988), or was justified as a search incident to arrest, pursuant to St. v. Ulrich, 187 M 347, 609 P2d 1218 (1980). Hardaway appealed on grounds that the swabbing was clearly a search that was required to be justified by both probable cause and exigent circumstances and that no exigent circumstances existed because he was in custody at the time and a warrant could have been obtained. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed. The court adopted the analysis of what constitutes a search set out in Cupp v. Murphy, 412 US 291 (1973), holding that Hardaway had a reasonable expectation of privacy as to his person and personal security (overruling Holzapfel) and that the swabbing constituted a search subject to federal and Montana constitutional protections. Although his hands and the blood on them were exposed to the public for viewing, it was not the viewing that constituted a search, but rather the swabbing. Further, even though the swabbing could be considered a search incident to arrest pursuant to federal law and the bright-line rule in U.S. v. Robinson, 414 US 218 (1973), that requires no further justification than a lawful arrest for the search exception to apply, the Supreme Court opted to grant greater individual privacy rights protection to Hardaway based on the Montana Constitution, consistent with the prior holding in St. v. Sawyer, 174 M 512, 571 P2d 1131 (1977). The court noted its consistent holdings that a warrantless search incident to an arrest must be commensurate with its underlying purpose of preventing an arrestee from using any weapons, escaping, or destroying incriminating evanescent evidence in the arrestee's possession, considered inherently anticipated exigent circumstances under 46-5-102(1) through (3); however, to the extent that a warrantless search incident to a lawful arrest is conducted pursuant to 46-5-102(4), which deals with discovering and seizing any persons, instruments, articles, or things that may have been used in the commission of or that may constitute evidence of the offense, specific and articulable exigent circumstances are also required to justify and render the search lawful (distinguishing and partially overruling Ulrich). Here, there were simply no exigent circumstances requiring a warrantless search. Hardaway was at the station house, under the full control of the police, with no present means of destroying the blood evidence. Hardaway could have consented to the swab or waited in discomfort until a warrant was obtained, but either way the evidence was going nowhere. Therefore, the swabbing of Hardaway's hands was not a valid search incident to arrest. St. v. Hardaway, 2001 MT 252, 307 M 139, 36 P3d 900 (2001), distinguished in St. v. Madplume, 2007 MT 11, 335 M 290, 150 P3d 956 (2007).

Shining of Ultraviolet Light Not Considered Search: Agents dusted money used in a drug deal with invisible detection powder that showed up only under an ultraviolet light. After defendant's arrest, his hands and wallet were inspected under ultraviolet light for traces of the dust and the positive results admitted into evidence. The Supreme Court adopted the rationale in Commonwealth v. DeWitt, 314 A2d 27 (Pa. Super. 1973), in holding that the shining of the ultraviolet light did not constitute a search so as to implicate privacy rights under either the U.S. or Montana Constitution. The court found persuasive the fact that defendant was validly arrested, that the wallet was properly seized, and that the light only afforded an opportunity to learn if defendant may have touched the drug money. St. v. Holzapfel, 230 M 105, 748 P2d 953, 45 St. Rep. 53 (1988).

Valid Search of Wallet After Arrest: The District Court properly allowed into evidence the results of a postarrest, nonconsensual, warrantless search of defendant's wallet. The Supreme Court adopted the reasoning in U.S. v. Passaro, 624 F2d 938 (9th Cir. 1980), that a wallet is an element of clothing "which is, for a reasonable time following a legal arrest, taken out of the realm of protection from police interest". The search also satisfied the privacy guaranties of the Montana Constitution because the arrest reduced the arrestee's expectation of privacy. St. v. Holzapfel, 230 M 105, 748 P2d 953, 45 St. Rep. 53 (1988).

Delayed Seizure of Articles in Plain View: A seizure that is proper under the "plain view" exception may be delayed, so long as the delay is reasonable. St. v. Romero, 224 M 431, 730 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 2309 (1986).

Proper Seizure of Keys in Ignition at Time of Arrest: Defendant was charged with and convicted of criminal possession of dangerous drugs with intent to sell. Defendant contended his automobile keys were illegally seized and admitted into evidence. Defendant was properly arrested. The keys were in the auto ignition at the time of arrest. The arresting officer took possession of the auto and drove it to the courthouse. He then turned the keys over to the property officer. A warrant was obtained for the search of the auto. In the course of executing that warrant, the keys were used to unlock the trunk and a suitcase in the trunk that contained 30 pounds of marijuana. Defendant asserted that a warrant describing the keys should have been obtained. The Supreme Court held that the keys themselves merely provided the state with access to the trunk and suitcase. Only after their use did it become apparent that the keys were significant as evidence because one of them opened the suitcase. The keys were properly seized incident to a lawful arrest and as such were properly admissible as evidence. St. v. Canon, 212 M 157, 687 P2d 705, 41 St. Rep. 1659 (1984).

Inventory Search Incident to a Lawful Arrest: Armstrong was arrested for shoplifting. Shoplifting is a misdemeanor for which bail bond schedules are established in Yellowstone County. The arresting officer however refused to accept the scheduled bond because he knew that Armstrong was a major suspect in the Lords homicide. During an inventory search of Armstrong after his arrest, a $100 bill was found which connected Armstrong to the Lords homicide. Armstrong argues that the police should have released him on bail and therefore the inventory search was illegal and the evidence should be suppressed. The court said that under the circumstances the police not only had the right to refuse the bail bond, but they had a duty to detain him. The arrest was lawful and the inventory search was incident to a lawful arrest. Since the $100 bill was lawfully seized, it is admissible in the homicide trial. St. v. Armstrong, 189 M 407, 616 P2d 341 (1980).

Neutron Activation Test for Gunpowder Residues: The defendant was arrested at the police station without a warrant, and the police administered a neutron activation test to determine if there were gunpowder residues on the defendant's hands. The defendant sought to suppress the results of the test on the grounds that his right to be secure against unreasonable searches and seizures was violated. The Supreme Court held that a search incident to a lawful arrest is an exception to the warrant requirement of the 4th amendment. The administration of a neutron activation test following the defendant's arrest was within the permissible scope of a search incident to a lawful arrest. Once the search incident to arrest is found to be reasonable the State has no further burden to show that the evidence is destructible. St. v. Ulrich, 187 M 347, 609 P2d 1218 (1980).

Complaint Conclusory and Complainant Not Examined: An arrest warrant was invalid and the subsequent search and seizure unlawful when the complaint of the Deputy County Attorney, under oath, disclosed nothing more than conclusion, the complainant was not examined under oath, and an undercover agent could not say that he had purchased from the defendant. State ex rel. Wicks v. District Court, 159 M 434, 498 P2d 1202 (1972), distinguished in State ex rel. Douglas v. District Court, 161 M 525, 507 P2d 1055 (1973), and followed in Sacco v. High Country Independent Press, Inc., 271 M 209, 896 P2d 411, 52 St. Rep. 407 (1995).

CONSENT TO SEARCH AND SEIZURE

Inevitable Discovery of Laptop Computer Evidence — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Lacey shared a residence with Dozier, although the property was owned by Dozier. Dozier discovered incriminating evidence on Lacey's laptop computer, which was in the common area of the residence and which Dozier was allowed to access. Officers came to the residence and Dozier allowed them to seize the computer. Lacey later asserted that the officers lacked probable cause to seize Lacey's personal property without Lacey's consent. Because Lacey had a possessory interest in the property, Dozier did not have the right or authority to consent to seizure of the computer. However, because the computer was searched pursuant to a federal search warrant rather than on Dozier's consent, Dozier's consent was immaterial. Rather, even if probable cause did not exist for seizure of the laptop, the evidence later discovered pursuant to the federal warrant was admissible under the inevitable discovery exception to the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine, and Lacey's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Lacey, 2009 MT 62, 349 M 371, 204 P3d 1192 (2009). See also St. v. Notti, 2003 MT 296, 318 M 146, 79 P3d 289 (2003), and St. v. Dasen, 2007 MT 87, 337 M 74, 155 P3d 1282 (2007).

Failure to Give Miranda Warning Before Consensual Search of Vehicle Held to Be of No Legal Consequence: Clark was stopped by highway patrol officer Gleich after Gleich received a report from his brother, a Deputy Sheriff, that the two persons in the car had just been involved in a domestic disturbance and that neither of them possessed a valid driver's license. After the stop, Clark consented to a search of the vehicle. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's decision that because Miranda warnings are, under the U.S. Constitution, to precede custodial interrogations and not searches, the lack of a Miranda warning before a consensual search of Clark's vehicle was of no legal consequence. The Supreme Court noted that the U.S. Supreme Court held in U.S. v. Patane, 542 US 630 (2004), that there is no requirement that a Miranda warning be given before a request is made for consent to a search. St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 419, 347 M 354, 198 P3d 809 (2008).

Voluntariness of Consent to Search — Totality of Circumstances: In determining whether consent to search was made voluntarily and was uncontaminated by coercion or duress, the Supreme Court considers the totality of the circumstances. In this case, Copelton was sitting in a car driven by Garcia, and when asked by officers if they could search the vehicle, Garcia shrugged his shoulders and gestured with his hands in an affirmative manner. The search revealed drugs, and Copelton was arrested for felony possession with intent to distribute. On appeal, Copelton asserted that his motion to suppress the fruits of the search should have been granted because Garcia did not knowingly and voluntarily consent to the warrantless search. A native of Mexico, Garcia had limited education with no instruction regarding the American legal system and a limited understanding of English. Copelton also noted that the officers did not inform Garcia of the right to refuse consent to the search and questioned whether a mere shrug of the shoulders was enough to indicate consent. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court affirmed. Garcia testified that he had prior experiences with law enforcement officers, including prior vehicle searches, that he clearly understood what the officer was asking when the officer requested to search the vehicle, and that he consented to the search because he had nothing to hide. Thus, Garcia's limited foreign education and limited ability to speak and understand English did not impede his ability to knowingly and voluntarily consent to the search. Further, lack of knowledge of the right to refuse consent is not determinative that consent was not voluntary in and of itself, and nonverbal consent can be effective when conduct indicates unequivocal consent. Under the totality of the circumstances, Copelton's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Copelton, 2006 MT 182, 333 M 91, 140 P3d 1074 (2006), following St. v. Snell, 2004 MT 269, 323 M 157, 99 P3d 191 (2004).

No Capacity or Actual Authority of Youth to Consent to Search of Parent's Home: While conducting a search for Lowe, officers learned that Lowe was staying at Schwarz's home and drove to Schwarz's residence to initiate an arrest. Schwarz was not home, but Schwarz's 13-year-old daughter answered the door and consented to a search of the residence. Without attempting to contact Schwarz, the officers entered the home without a warrant and discovered drugs. When Schwarz arrived home, she was arrested for possession of dangerous drugs. Following conviction, Schwarz appealed on grounds that the search was illegal because the minor daughter did not have authority to consent to a search of the home. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed, adopting a per se rule that a youth under the age of 16 years has neither the capacity nor the actual authority to relinquish a parent's privacy rights and consent to a search of the parent's home. St. v. Schwarz, 2006 MT 120, 332 M 243, 136 P3d 989 (2006). See also St. v. Melees, 2000 MT 6, 298 M 15, 994 P2d 683 (2000).

No Expectation of Privacy for Trespasser — Entry Lawful and Warrantless Search Reasonable: Gilmore kept some belongings in a locked bedroom in Kathie Gilmore's house, and Kathie had no key to the room. Based on a tip from a confidential informant that marijuana plants had been observed in the window of the residence, officers requested and were given permission by Kathie to search the house without a warrant. Although she gave conflicting statements, Kathie stated that some of Gilmore's belongings were in the locked bedroom but he paid no rent, that Gilmore had previously assaulted her and that she was afraid of him, that she did not want him living in the house and had asked him to leave, and that she had no key to the room and advised the officers to kick down the door. Upon entering, the officers observed Gilmore asleep on the couch and drug paraphernalia in plain view. The officers then obtained a warrant and seized drugs and paraphernalia. Gilmore moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the search was unlawful because Kathie did not have authority to authorize entry into the locked bedroom and that Gilmore had an expectation of privacy in the bedroom. The District Court found that in this case, the officers were acting under the appropriate authority of Kathie to consent to the search and denied the motion to suppress. The Supreme Court held that as a trespasser, Gilmore had no expectation of privacy in the bedroom. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Gilmore, 2004 MT 363, 324 M 488, 104 P3d 1051 (2004). See also St. v. McLees, 2000 MT 6, 298 M 15, 994 P2d 683 (2000).

Valid Consensual Search — Totality of Circumstances: A minimum number of police officers went to Beaupre's residence, requested and were granted permission to enter the residence, inquired whether they could search the residence and were verbally authorized to do so, corroborated the oral permission with Beaupre's husband's written consent, and then discovered evidence of a drug lab upon searching the residence. The District Court held that the search was consensual, but on appeal, Beaupre contended that the search was not valid because the Beaupres were coerced into consenting. The Supreme Court concluded that under the totality of the circumstances, the search was consensual, and the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Beaupre, 2004 MT 300, 323 M 413, 102 P3d 504 (2004). See also St. v. Olson, 2002 MT 211, 311 M 270, 55 P3d 935 (2002).

Particularized Suspicion Sufficient Justification for Request for Consent to Search Vehicle — No Illegal Detention — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Snell was stopped for speeding and was also cited for failure to carry proof of insurance. While writing out the citation in the patrol car, the officer asked Snell if he could search the vehicle, and Snell consented. The officer discovered drugs, and Snell was charged with possession and intent to distribute marijuana. Snell moved to suppress the evidence. Snell conceded that he had voluntarily consented to the search, and the state conceded that the officer did not have probable cause. The motion to suppress was denied, and Snell appealed. The Supreme Court considered both the consent and illegal detention issues. First, the court reasoned that the officer had particularized suspicion to stop the vehicle and that Montana law does not require additional justification for requesting consent, so Snell's voluntary consent was sufficient to justify the warrantless search of the vehicle (see St. v. Parker, 1998 MT 6, 287 M 151, 953 P2d 692 (1998)). Second, the court concluded that because the officer did not coerce or restrain Snell, order him to stay, or prevent Snell from exiting the patrol car, a reasonable person would have felt free to leave the patrol car upon completion of the traffic stop, so the poststop interaction between Snell and the officer was a voluntary exchange rather than an illegal detention or unlawful seizure (see St. v. Merrill, 2004 MT 169, 322 M 47, 93 P3d 1227 (2004), and St. v. Hill, 2004 MT 184, 322 M 165, 94 P3d 752 (2004)). Snell's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Snell, 2004 MT 269, 323 M 157, 99 P3d 191 (2004). See also St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 419, 347 M 354, 198 P3d 809 (2008).

Invalid Third-Party Consent to Warrantless Search of Private Residence — Consenting Party to Have Actual Authority to Consent to Search: A warrantless search conducted inside a home is per se unreasonable, subject to only a few exceptions, one of which is when the search is conducted pursuant to consent that is freely and voluntarily given. The state may justify a warrantless search by showing that permission was obtained from defendant or from a third party who possessed common authority over or other sufficient relationship to the premises or effect sought to be inspected, but the state has the burden of showing that consent was voluntary. However, for third-party consent to be valid, the consenting party must have actual authority to consent, as opposed to apparent authority. In the present case, McLees lived with his father, Scott, in an apartment owned by his grandfather, Earl, and investigating officers obtained Earl's voluntary consent before searching the residence. The District Court held that Earl had common authority to consent to the search and denied McLees' motion to suppress incriminating evidence found in the search. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under U.S. v. Matlock, 415 US 164, 39 L Ed 2d 249, 94 S Ct 988 (1974), common authority may not be implied from the mere property interest of a third party in the property to be searched. Rather, the authority that justifies third-party consent rests on the mutual use of the property by persons having joint access or control for most purposes. Here, the record was insufficient to show that Earl had common authority over McLees' apartment. Earl never went to the apartment unless Scott was there. Earl did not have free access to and was not a cohabitant of the apartment and did not share in its use. The fact that Earl owned the property was not dispositive when McLees had a reasonable expectation of privacy by living there. Earl therefore did not have a sufficient relationship with the apartment that would give him actual authority to consent to a warrantless search. While declining to address whether the seized evidence was admissible under the independent source rule or the inevitable discovery rule, the Supreme Court held that it was inadmissible under the third-party consent rule and reversed for further proceedings. St. v. McLees, 2000 MT 6, 298 M 15, 994 P2d 683, 57 St. Rep. 25 (2000), following St. v. Sorenson, 180 M 269, 590 P2d 136 (1979), St. v. Lopez, 896 P2d 889 (Hawaii 1995), and St. v. Hubbel, 286 M 200, 951 P2d 971, 54 St. Rep. 1373 (1997), distinguishing Ill. v. Rodriguez, 497 US 177, 111 L Ed 2d 148, 110 S Ct 2793 (1990), and followed, with regard to third-party authority to consent to search, in St. v. Gilmore, 2004 MT 363, 324 M 488, 104 P3d 1051 (2004).

No Warrantless Search When Defendant Showed Hiding Place of Drugs: After police discovered that an undelivered UPS package contained marijuana, they delivered the package to Arthun's home and it was accepted by his wife. Police later observed Arthun at his home but did not see the package disposed of. Still later, police discussed the situation with Arthun and he led them to another building and showed the police where the package containing marijuana was hidden. Arthun's motion to suppress was denied by the District Court, and the denial was affirmed by the Supreme Court. Citing St. v. Graves, 191 M 81, 622 P2d 203 (1981), the Supreme Court held that discovery of the UPS box did not constitute a "search" in violation of the fourth amendment. The Supreme Court noted that after having been given his Miranda warnings, Arthun voluntarily led officers to the building and showed them where the box was hidden and that under these circumstances, the disclosure of the drugs was voluntary. St. v. Arthun, 274 M 82, 906 P2d 216, 52 St. Rep. 1133 (1995).

Test of Voluntariness:

Under the totality of the circumstances in this case, the evidence shows that defendant's consent to the search of her business premises was obtained voluntarily. The facts that she is of foreign descent, is small in stature, and was handcuffed and in the custody of seven police officers when she gave consent do not negate the voluntariness of her consent. Defendant is an American citizen who had owned several businesses in this country. She had worked in the past with law enforcement personnel as an interpreter. While custody is a factor in the totality of the circumstances test, it does not necessarily negate consent. St. v. Kim, 239 M 189, 779 P2d 512, 46 St. Rep. 1610 (1989).

Voluntariness is to be determined from the totality of the circumstances, and consent was voluntary under the circumstances of this case. St. v. Stemple, 198 M 409, 646 P2d 539, 39 St. Rep. 1085 (1982); State ex rel. Kotwicki v. District Court, 166 M 335, 532 P2d 694 (1975), followed in St. v. Kim, 239 M 189, 779 P2d 512, 46 St. Rep. 1610 (1989), and St. v. Herrera, 1998 MT 173, 289 M 499, 962 P2d 1180, 55 St. Rep. 703 (1998).

Defendant voluntarily went to the Billings Police Department in connection with a homicide investigation. It later came out that defendant had serious mental and drug abuse problems. Defendant was interrogated by two police officers. He was kept incommunicado in a small room for several hours, the officers used the "mean cop-nice cop" interrogation technique, and the officers lied to defendant about how much was known of his involvement in the crime (guilt assumption technique). The officers told defendant his problems might be mental or medical rather than criminal. Defendant then gave written consent to search his house and van. The police then brought in a psychiatrist who administered sodium amytal to defendant. The next day defendant was convinced by the psychiatrist to confess. The District Court suppressed evidence found during the search, ruling that the consent was involuntarily given. The question of voluntariness largely depends upon the facts of each case, no single fact being dispositive. The determination of voluntariness, rather, depends upon the "totality of the circumstances". The issue of voluntariness is a factual one addressed to the discretion of the trial court and will not be disturbed if supported by substantial credible evidence. The totality of the circumstances in the present case includes not only the police techniques employed, which were particularly coercive, but also the testimony presented by experts that defendant was a paranoid schizophrenic with severe drug problems. There can be no doubt that substantial evidence exists to support the suppression finding. St. v. Allies, 190 M 475, 621 P2d 1080, 37 St. Rep. 2089 (1980).

Reasonableness of Warrantless Search — Specific Consent Required: In order to overcome the presumption against waiver of the constitutional right prohibiting warrantless searches and seizures, the state must show that defendant gave unequivocal, specific consent to entry, uncontaminated by duress or coercion. St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988), citing St. v. Brough, 171 M 182, 556 P2d 1239 (1976).

Insufficient Findings by Trial Court — Remand: In considering a motion to suppress evidence discovered during a search of the defendant's motel room, the trial judge made inadequate findings of fact; therefore, the matter was remanded for a second evidentiary hearing. The trial judge made no finding of whether the defendant knowingly exposed his motel room to the police officer; whether the officer intruded beyond any invitation extended by the defendant; whether, if the officer did intrude, the intrusion had any effect on what the officer was able to observe in the motel room; or what the officer could observe from his position at the doorway of the motel room. St. v. Wilson, 218 M 359, 708 P2d 270, 42 St. Rep. 1647 (1985).

Abandonment As Waiver of Right to Object: The Dumas Hotel in Butte was robbed. The police were notified, and an investigation was begun. Police officers observed LaMere's residence for 3 days, observing no activity. They contacted the landlord, who invited an officer to enter the apartment. The apartment appeared abandoned. Later that day the landlord signed a consent to search. During the search, police found what appeared to be a map of the Dumas Hotel and a piece of pantyhose that was apparently part of a mask. LaMere contended that the entry to the apartment was illegal because no exigent circumstances existed which excused the lack of a warrant. He also contended that the requirement of filing an inventory and delivering a copy to the person from whose premises property was taken was not complied with. The Supreme Court held that because LaMere had abandoned the apartment he had disclaimed any right to object to the place being searched. On abandonment the landlord was in possession and had authority to consent to the search. There is no statutory requirement that items seized under a consent search be inventoried and reported to a magistrate. St. v. Madera, 206 M 140, 670 P2d 552, 40 St. Rep. 1558 (1983).

Consent — Defendant's Knowledge of Right to Refuse: Following Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 US 218, 36 L Ed 2d 854, 93 S Ct 2041 (1973), the Montana Supreme Court rejected defendant's claim that his consent to the search of his truck was not voluntary because he had not been informed of his right to refuse. The court ruled that the Montana Constitution did not require application of a stricter standard than the totality of circumstances test used in Schneckloth. St. v. Stemple, 198 M 409, 646 P2d 539, 39 St. Rep. 1085 (1982).

No Warrantless Search Where Defendant Hands Over Murder Weapon: Where defendant was asked by police officers if a knife was involved in an altercation in which police officers were informed that defendant participated, and defendant answered "yes" and handed the knife to the police, no search by the police was involved and thus no warrantless search and seizure without consent was involved which would justify suppression of the knife. St. v. Graves, 191 M 81, 622 P2d 203, 38 St. Rep. 9 (1981), followed in St. v. Arthun, 274 M 82, 906 P2d 216, 52 St. Rep. 1133 (1995).

Consent to Monitor Telephone Conversation: In holding that the recording of a telephone conversation between an informant and defendant was not a violation of this section, the Supreme Court, following St. v. Hanley, 186 M 410, 608 P2d 104, 37 St. Rep. 427 (1980), held that a court order is not necessary to monitor a telephone conversation if one of the parties to the telephone conversation consents. The Supreme Court distinguished St. v. Brackman, 178 M 105, 582 P2d 1216, 35 St. Rep. 1103 (1978), because in Brackman it held there was an invasion of privacy because persons engaged in conversation in an open parking lot have a reasonable expectation of privacy, whereas with a telephone conversation no such expectation exists. St. v. Coleman, 189 M 492, 616 P2d 1090, 37 St. Rep. 1661 (1980), followed in (No Entrapment) St. v. Canon, 212 M 157, 687 P2d 705, 41 St. Rep. 1659 (1984).

Standing to Suppress Evidence — Person Living in Searched Apartment Rented by Another: The defendant had a legitimate expectation of privacy in the apartment searched. He shared it with his girlfriend and except with respect to her had complete dominion and control over the apartment and could exclude others from it. The defendant had standing to contest the legality of a search and seizure within the apartment. St. v. Allen, 188 M 135, 612 P2d 199 (1980).

Warrantless Entry and Arrest Valid — Subsequent Search Invalid: While the officers' initial entry into the apartment and the subsequent arrest and seizure of marijuana on the table were valid, the so-called "consent" search of the rest of the apartment was unlawful. One renter's consent was fraudulently secured and otherwise invalid under 41-5-303 (renumbered 41-5-331). St. v. Allen, 188 M 135, 612 P2d 199 (1980).

Blood Alcohol Test Found Voluntary: The admissibility of the results of the blood alcohol test in this case is not based on implied consent to the withdrawal of the defendant's blood under 61-8-402. Instead, it is founded on the actual consent of the defendant, which he admits. The issue turns on whether the defendant's consent was voluntary or was coerced by psychological means. The court held that there was substantial evidence that the defendant's consent was free and voluntary and that the lower court committed no error in denying the defendant's motion to suppress the results of the blood alcohol test. St. v. Kirkaldie, 179 M 283, 587 P2d 1298 (1978).

Probationer Search Clause: Execution of a probationer search clause by law enforcement personnel, being instrumental in achieving the objectives of probation, is a proper condition of probation. St. v. Means, 177 M 193, 581 P2d 406 (1978).

Search Without Voluntary Consent or Warrant: When the defendant was held incommunicado until he consented to a search and probable cause did not exist, a search of a car trunk was unlawful and marijuana seized was properly suppressed. St. v. Brough, 171 M 182, 556 P2d 1239 (1976).

Invalid Consent: When the Sheriff confiscated the defendant's truck without his knowledge after arrest and later obtained the defendant's signature on a consent form which did not purport to be retroactive, while the defendant was held in jail in the absence of counsel, material taken from the truck was illegally obtained and inadmissible. St. v. Keller, 170 M 372, 553 P2d 1013 (1976).

Requirements — Burden of Proof:

Equivocal conduct by a defendant is not a sufficient basis for an inference that he consents to a search because the consent to a search must be freely given and unequivocal and specific consent must be shown by clear positive evidence. St. v. LaFlamme, 170 M 202, 551 P2d 1011 (1976).

A search and seizure may be made without a search warrant if the individual freely and intelligently gives his unequivocal and specific consent to the search, uncontaminated by any duress or coercion, express or implied. The State has the burden of proving that such consent was given. St. v. Tomich, 332 F2d 987 (9th Cir. 1964).

Consent Valid When Defendant Arrested Previously: The defendant's consent to the search of his car was voluntary even though he had spent the night in jail and was still in custody because the defendant had previously been arrested and knew his rights. State ex rel. Kotwicki v. District Court, 166 M 335, 532 P2d 694 (1975).

Consent Following Miranda Warnings: When the appellant, convicted of robbery, had been given three Miranda warnings during the course of the investigation, evidence obtained from the appellant's apartment after he gave consent to the police to go there was not the product of an unlawful search and seizure. St. v. Braden, 154 M 90, 460 P2d 85 (1969).

Waiver of Right to Object:

When the defendant had taken the Sheriff to his house and turned over the alleged murder weapon to the Sheriff, there was no illegal search and seizure since the defendant voluntarily consented to turning over the rifle. St. v. Williams, 153 M 262, 455 P2d 634 (1969).

Any right which the defendant may have had to complain of a seizure at the time of his arrest was waived when he voluntarily surrendered the evidence to police officers upon request. St. v. Nelson, 130 M 466, 304 P2d 1110 (1956).

One consenting to a search of his premises without a warrant cannot complain that it was illegal. State ex rel. Muzzy v. Uotila, 71 M 351, 229 P 724 (1924).

SEARCH AND SEIZURE ON AUTHORITY OF WARRANT

Totality of Circumstances, Including Odor of Marijuana, Sufficient Probable Cause to Support Search Warrant: The Department of Public Health and Human Services received a call alleging that Morse was selling drugs in the presence of her juvenile daughter, and the local drug task force received two additional calls alleging that Morse was distributing drugs from her apartment. When police visited Morse's apartment, there were four other people there, all of whom had prior drug-related arrests, including Morse. The officers smelled marijuana and observed an empty electric digital scale in the living room. Morse refused a search of the apartment, so officers obtained a search warrant. In executing the warrant, the officers found drugs and paraphernalia. At trial, Morse moved to suppress the evidence based on lack of probable cause for the warrant. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court reviewed the totality of the circumstances and affirmed. The smell of marijuana did not in itself establish probable cause, nor did the telephone calls. However, when considered with Morse's drug history, the criminal backgrounds of the other four people, and the presence of the scale, the search warrant application established probable cause, and the motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Morse, 2006 MT 54, 331 M 300, 132 P3d 528 (2006).

Authorization to Search Garage No Justification of Search of House, Even if Items in Garage Are Portable to House: A search warrant application that supported search of defendant's unattached garage did not justify a search of the house, and the fact that the suspected crime was operation of a meth lab and that materials for operating such a lab could be searched for under the search warrant and are easily portable and thus could be moved between a house and a garage did not justify the search of the house. St. v. Graham, 2004 MT 385, 325 M 110, 103 P3d 1073 (2004).

Search of Defendant's Truck Invalid: The Beaverhead County Sheriff's Office was contacted and informed that Lott was going to receive a shipment of drugs in the mail. The officers obtained a warrant to search Lott's house and his three vehicles on the basis that the vehicles might be used to distribute the drugs. When the package arrived, Lott was at work and asked a coworker to deliver the package to him at work. When Lott left work, he was stopped, his truck was searched, and the drugs were found. The Supreme Court held that the search of the truck was invalid because the warrant did not contain any specific facts demonstrating probable cause that the drugs would be located in the vehicle. The Supreme Court also held that the search of the truck did not come under the automobile exception to the warrant requirement based on probable cause and exigent circumstances because of the lack of exigent circumstances. St. v. Lott, 272 M 195, 900 P2d 306, 52 St. Rep. 696 (1995).

Substantial Preliminary Showing of False Affidavit: The defendant satisfied the test adopted by the Supreme Court in St. v. Sykes, 194 M 14, 663 P2d 691, 40 St. Rep. 690 (1983), for challenging the validity of an affidavit used by law enforcement officers to obtain a search warrant. The defendant made a substantial preliminary showing that the state's affidavit was based on deliberate falsehood or reckless disregard for the truth. Thus, the trial judge did not err in considering evidence on this issue at the probable cause hearing. St. v. Wilson, 218 M 359, 708 P2d 270, 42 St. Rep. 1647 (1985). The Sykes standard was modified, inasmuch as a defendant need no longer prove that the person providing false information did so knowingly, intentionally, or with a reckless disregard for the truth before the false statements may be excised from the application or affidavit, in St. v. Worrall, 1999 MT 55, 293 M 439, 976 P2d 968, 56 St. Rep. 225 (1999).

Plain View Doctrine — Seizure of "Suspicious Objects": In executing a search warrant for drugs and a fugitive, law officers seized drug records. Defendant's motion to suppress the drug records was based in part on the claim that the records did not fall within the plain view doctrine because the law officers read the records. A law officer testified at the suppression hearing that the papers were strewn about the room and thus were inadvertently observed and were determined to be related to the items specified in the warrant and to have obvious evidentiary value without being touched, picked up, or rifled through in any way. He further testified that drug records are frequently found during searches for narcotics. In view of these circumstances and because a suspicion that the objects viewed are evidence or instrumentalities of a crime is sufficient to satisfy the requirement that the incriminating nature of the articles be apparent, the Supreme Court ruled that it was proper to admit the records. St. v. O'Neill, 208 M 386, 679 P2d 760, 41 St. Rep. 420 (1984).

Arrest Based on Void Warrant Not Lawful: Marijuana seized under the authority of a void search warrant could not have been seized as an incident of a lawful arrest since the marijuana served as the ground for arrest and was discovered by means of a void process and illegal entry. St. v. Langan, 151 M 558, 445 P2d 565 (1968).

WARRANTLESS INSPECTION

Warrantless Entry Justified Under Exigent Circumstances Exception — Evidence Admissible Under Plain View Doctrine: Officer Cameron investigated a report that Kenfield was on the way to a remote small town to purchase alcohol for minors. The officer arrived at Kenfield's residence and heard loud music and smelled marijuana. Cameron was out of radio range. No one answered when Cameron knocked at the door and announced himself, but Cameron heard running feet. Concerned with the minors' well-being, Cameron entered the residence and saw drug paraphernalia and residue on the kitchen sink. Cameron then called dispatch from the residence and requested backup, and officers subsequently seized drugs and other contraband. Kenfield was arrested for drug production or manufacture, distribution of drugs to minors, and sexual abuse of children. Kenfield moved to suppress the fruits of the warrantless search, but the motion was denied, and Kenfield appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The odor of marijuana, coupled with the facts that the occupants attempted to avoid contact with Cameron and that Kenfield was believed to have been on the way to purchasing alcohol for minors, was sufficient for Cameron to form a reasonable belief that Kenfield had committed or was committing an offense. Additionally, the remoteness of the area, the time of the incident, the failure of Cameron's radio communication, Cameron's concern for the minors, the lack of response to the knock and announce, and the possibility that relevant evidence would be destroyed constituted exigent circumstances warranting immediate entry into the residence. Therefore, warrantless entry into Kenfield's home was justified, as was the seizure of drug evidence in plain view. St. v. Kenfield, 2009 MT 242, 351 M 409, 213 P3d 461 (2009), following St. v. Wakeford, 1998 MT 16, 287 M 220, 953 P2d 1065 (1998), distinguishing St. v. McBride, 1999 MT 127, 294 M 461, 982 P2d 453 (1999).

Disclaimer of Authority to Grant Permission to Search Vehicle Constituting Waiver of Right to Privacy: After stopping Hurlbert for speeding, officers noticed additional behavior that led them to believe that Hurlbert might be engaged in illegal activity. The officers asked Hurlbert for permission to search the vehicle, but Hurlbert declined because the vehicle belonged to his wife. The officers then called the wife, who gave permission to search the vehicle, although Hurlbert initially declined permission for a warrantless search of his personal items in the vehicle. No contraband was found in the vehicle, but while the search was underway, Hurlbert spontaneously admitted that there was drug paraphernalia in his personal possessions in the vehicle. Hurlbert then consented to a search of his possessions, and a search of his backpack indeed revealed drugs and paraphernalia. Hurlbert contended on appeal that because he lawfully possessed the vehicle at the time of the stop, he had a reasonable expectation of privacy in it and was entitled to protection from unlawful searches and seizures. Hurlbert also maintained that his wife's consent to search the vehicle was not valid because she was not in possession of the vehicle at the time of the search and she was coerced into consenting to the search. The Supreme Court affirmed. Hurlbert could not demonstrate that he was prejudiced in any way from the search of the vehicle, because the search revealed nothing unlawful. Additionally, when Hurlbert disclaimed that he had any authority to grant permission to search the vehicle, he thereby conceded that he did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the vehicle and waived the right to object to a search of the vehicle. St. v. Hurlbert, 2009 MT 221, 351 M 316, 211 P3d 869 (2009).

Search of Residence on Permission of Minor Child Violative of Parent's Right to Privacy — Evidence Properly Suppressed — Exception: Police were dispatched to a residence in response to a report of a sexual assault on a young woman, who was discovered to be a minor. Following questioning in the living room, the girl led the police to her bedroom, where an alleged assault by her father had occurred. Because police believed that the minor had lawfully granted permission to search the residence, they seized items from the bedroom, including the sheets, comforter, and blanket from the bed and the victim's pajamas. They also had the victim change clothes so they could take possession of the underwear that the victim was wearing at the time of the alleged assault. The girl later signed a form granting permission to search the residence. The father's DNA was found on the bedding and he was charged with felony sexual assault. The father argued that the search and seizure were unconstitutional because they were conducted without his consent or a search warrant. The state contended that in a case such as this where the child granting entrance to the home was the possible victim of a sexual assault, a warrant was unnecessary. The District Court, citing St. v. Schwarz, 2006 MT 120, 332 M 243, 136 P3d 989 (2006), held that because the minor did not have actual authority to consent to a search, police were obligated to obtain consent from the parent or a search warrant prior to seizing items from the bedroom. Because neither consent nor warrant was obtained, the court suppressed all evidence seized from the house. The state appealed. The Supreme Court cited St. v. Goetz, 2008 MT 296, 345 M 421, 191 P3d 489 (2008), for the factors used to determine whether a state action constitutes an unreasonable or unlawful search or seizure: (1) whether the person challenging the state's action has an actual subjective expectation of privacy; (2) whether society is willing to recognize that subjective expectation as objectively reasonable; and (3) the nature of the state's intrusion. The court also noted that warrantless searches conducted inside a home are per se unreasonable, subject only to a few specifically established and well-delineated exceptions, none of which were present here. The court affirmed the holding in Schwarz, holding that the child did not have authority to consent to the search of her parent's home. The focus was on the violation of the privacy rights of the parent in control of the home, not the general privacy rights of the child, except where, as with the underwear the victim was wearing during the alleged assault, society would recognize as reasonable a person's privacy interest in the intimate apparel that she was wearing at the time. Therefore, the evidence seized from the residence must be suppressed because it was the product of an illegal search and seizure, with the exception of the daughter's underwear, because the father did not have an actual subjective expectation of privacy in the underwear that his daughter was wearing at the time the alleged assault occurred that society would find objectively reasonable. The District Court did not err in granting the motion to suppress all the evidence, with the exception of the underwear. The case was remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Ellis, 2009 MT 192, 351 M 95, 210 P3d 144 (2009).

Failure to Demonstrate Exigent Circumstances Justifying Warrantless Entry Into Residence for DUI Evidence — Reversed: Saale was involved in a one-car rollover after leaving a bar. Witnesses who helped Saale from the vehicle observed that Saale appeared to be highly intoxicated but not seriously injured. Saale's husband then arrived and took Saale home. Officers went to the home, but the husband refused to allow anyone into the home and refused to bring Saale outside. Officers had been advised by the County Attorney's office that they could enter the home without a warrant because of exigent circumstances of Saale's possible intoxication and trying to elude officers and because Saale might be severely injured from the accident. Therefore, officers handcuffed the husband and removed him from the area, entered the home, and removed Saale back to the scene of the accident, where Saale sat in the patrol car for 45 minutes. Saale subsequently failed a portable breath test and was arrested for DUI second offense. Saale moved to suppress evidence from the warrantless search. The District Court held that the exigent circumstances warrant exception gave officers the right to enter the home and to take Saale back to the accident scene, to question Saale about the accident and potential injuries, and to protect against the destruction of Saale's blood alcohol level as evidence of DUI, so the dismissal motion was denied. Saale appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Entry into the home without consent was reasonable only if the exigent circumstances were legitimate, but in this case officers had neither a lawful nor practical exigency justifying warrantless invasion of the home to obtain evidence. The argument for preservation of DUI evidence was negated by the fact that no physical evidence had been taken from Saale at the time of entry, so there was no evidence to destroy, and by the fact that Saale sat in the patrol car for 45 minutes before a breath test was even taken. The argument that possible injury constituted an exigent circumstance was belied by the fact that witnesses informed the officers that Saale did not appear to be injured and by the fact that if injuries had been obvious to officers when Saale was removed from the home, Saale would have been taken to the hospital rather than to the accident scene to sit idly and unattended in the patrol car while officers investigated the accident. Absent proof of exigent circumstances, warrantless entry into Saale's home was unreasonable and constituted reversible error. St. v. Saale, 2009 MT 95, 350 M 64, 204 P3d 1220 (2009), following St. v. Peplow, 2001 MT 253, 307 M 172, 36 P3d 922 (2001), and distinguishing St. v. Deshner, 158 M 188, 489 P2d 1290 (1971), and St. v. Wakeford, 1998 MT 16, 287 M 220, 953 P2d 1065 (1998).

Sufficient Probabilities Supporting Particularized Suspicion to Justify Investigative Stop — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: McMaster was stopped for investigation after an officer observed apparent traffic violations and erratic driving. The officer was called to make the stop following a police officer's observations of McMaster's possible drug trafficking activities at the Conrad Town Pump. McMaster moved to suppress the fruits of the search on grounds that the officer lacked particularized suspicion to make the investigative stop. The motion was denied, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The determination whether particularized suspicion supports an investigative stop does not deal with hard certainties, but rather with probabilities. In this case, McMaster was known by officers to be involved in drug deals, and his furtive conduct at the Town Pump led officers to believe that a possible drug deal was in progress. McMaster was identified as the probable driver of the vehicle through a personalized license plate and by physical description. This evidence, coupled with McMaster's apparent traffic violations and erratic driving, constituted sufficient particularized suspicion that McMaster was involved in criminal activity to justify the investigative stop. St. v. McMaster, 2008 MT 294, 345 M 408, 191 P3d 443 (2008). See also St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293 (1981).

Exigent Circumstances Sufficient to Justify Warrantless Search to Avoid Possible Destruction of Drug Evidence: Law enforcement officers were tipped off that defendant was transporting one-half pound of methamphetamine into the state and tracked defendant to another person's apartment in Corvallis. Officers began surveillance of the apartment and observed two individuals who appeared to be watching the officers. Within a minute, two persons left the apartment, and the officers concluded that their presence was known to persons in the apartment. Shortly thereafter, the officers received a call from an officer in Butte informing them that defendant had called an informant in Butte and told the informant that defendant knew he was being watched and asked the informant to come to Corvallis to help get rid of the drugs. The officers then discussed the possibility that defendant could destroy the drugs before a valid search warrant could be issued in 4 to 7 hours and decided to call for backup and enter the apartment. Upon entering, the officers found defendant and a woman present. Defendant had no drugs on his person, but had $1,500 in his wallet and appeared to be under the influence of methamphetamine. When the warrant eventually arrived, officers found 3½ grams of methamphetamine packaged for sale. Defendant was charged with felony conspiracy to commit criminal distribution of dangerous drugs, felony criminal possession with intent to distribute, felony criminal endangerment, and misdemeanor criminal possession of drug paraphernalia. Defendant pleaded not guilty to all charges and moved to suppress the fruits of the warrantless search. The motion was denied, and defendant was convicted on one confessed count of intent to distribute. On appeal, defendant contended that the warrantless search was unlawful, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The facts that the officers had already witnessed one suspect flee the scene, knew that defendant was aware of the officers' presence, and knew that a third party had been contacted to help defendant get rid of the drugs, combined with the knowledge that procurement of a search warrant would take 4 to 7 hours, established the presence of exigent circumstances sufficient to justify warrantless entry into the apartment to avoid destruction of the alleged one-half pound of methamphetamine. St. v. Ruggirello, 2008 MT 8, 341 M 88, 176 P3d 252 (2008), applying the exigent circumstances test set out in St. v. Stone, 2004 MT 151, 321 M 489, 92 P3d 1178 (2004).

Reasonable Cause for Warrantless Probationary Search — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Smith's live-in girlfriend was arrested on a probation violation for failing to report her change in residence and subsequently tested positive for drugs, which provided reasonable cause for her probation officer to conduct a warrantless search of her new residence—Smith's trailer. The search revealed weapons, drug paraphernalia, items used to manufacture and distribute drugs, and some of the girlfriend's personal items. The officer then decided to search a bus parked near the trailer, and while waiting for a warrant, Smith arrived. Based on the items found in the trailer and an officer's knowledge that Smith's driver's license was suspended, Smith was arrested and found to be in possession of a large amount of cash, drugs, and paraphernalia. More drugs and chemical precursors of methamphetamine were subsequently found in Smith's vehicle and in the bus. Smith moved to suppress all evidence obtained in the searches on grounds that the initial search was unlawful because it was not justified as a probation search or by any other exception to the warrant requirements, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Because the initial search was a probationary search of the residence of the woman living with Smith and was justified by reasonable cause and because Smith did not challenge the legality of the searches of his person and vehicles, the District Court did not err in determining that the searches were lawful and in denying Smith's motion to suppress the evidence. St. v. Smith, 2008 MT 7, 341 M 82, 176 P3d 258 (2008).

Suspect Interrogated in Home Without Miranda Warning — Motion to Suppress Improperly Denied: Following a lead of methamphetamine use at Munson's home, detectives went to the home and, without giving Munson a Miranda warning, questioned Munson for 1 ¾ hours before Munson confessed to possessing methamphetamine paraphernalia. Munson was arrested for criminal possession of dangerous drugs and paraphernalia, and at trial, Munson moved to suppress the evidence and statements made to the officers, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The officers created a custodial atmosphere, and Munson's freedom of action was significantly restricted. Under the totality of the circumstances, a reasonable person in Munson's position would not have felt free to terminate the interview and leave or to ask the officers to leave, so for purposes of Miranda, Munson was in custody and subjected to an interrogation. Therefore, failure of the officers to give Munson a Miranda warning rendered Munson's statements inadmissible. Because Munson's consent to a search was not given freely and without duress or coercion, all evidence seized under the guise of consent was also inadmissible. St. v. Munson, 2007 MT 222, 339 M 68, 169 P3d 364 (2007), following St. v. Osteen, 216 M 258, 700 P2d 188 (1985), and St. v. Rushton, 264 M 248, 870 P2d 1355 (1994).

Warrantless Search of Duffle Bag in Area of Drug Lab Based on Exigent Circumstances: While detoxifying property where a drug lab was found, officers discovered a locked duffle bag sitting on or near contaminated bedding and heard sounds of sloshing liquid and clanging glass or metal within the bag. The officers were concerned with a possible chemical reaction and explosion, so they removed the bag from the premises, laid it on a tarp, and notified the safety officer of the suspect liquids. The safety officer believed that obtaining a search warrant to open the bag would take at least 45 minutes, which posed a potential threat to the safety of the officers and the property and persons in the immediate area, so the bag was opened immediately without a warrant, and drug lab materials were found and removed. Defendant asserted that the search was unlawful on grounds that the officers had no right to even pick up the bag without a warrant because if they suspected that it contained methamphetamine lab materials, then they should have known that disturbing the bag could unleash hazardous fumes and explosive chemicals. The state contended that exigent circumstances existed because the officers were necessarily required to immediately determine if dangerous chemicals were present. The Supreme Court noted that exigent circumstances for conducting a warrantless search exist when it is not practical to secure a warrant. Citing U.S. v. Lloyd, 396 F3d 948 (8th Cir. 2005), the court held that the "dangers created by methamphetamine labs can justify an immediate search because of exigent circumstances due to the volatile nature of such labs". In this case, the existence of exigent circumstances allowed the immediate warrantless search of the duffle bag. St. v. Gomez, 2007 MT 111, 337 M 219, 158 P3d 442 (2007).

No Expectation of Privacy for Trespasser — Entry Lawful and Warrantless Search Reasonable: Gilmore kept some belongings in a locked bedroom in Kathie Gilmore's house, and Kathie had no key to the room. Based on a tip from a confidential informant that marijuana plants had been observed in the window of the residence, officers requested and were given permission by Kathie to search the house without a warrant. Although she gave conflicting statements, Kathie stated that some of Gilmore's belongings were in the locked bedroom but he paid no rent, that Gilmore had previously assaulted her and that she was afraid of him, that she did not want him living in the house and had asked him to leave, and that she had no key to the room and advised the officers to kick down the door. Upon entering, the officers observed Gilmore asleep on the couch and drug paraphernalia in plain view. The officers then obtained a warrant and seized drugs and paraphernalia. Gilmore moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the search was unlawful because Kathie did not have authority to authorize entry into the locked bedroom and that Gilmore had an expectation of privacy in the bedroom. The District Court found that in this case, the officers were acting under the appropriate authority of Kathie to consent to the search and denied the motion to suppress. The Supreme Court held that as a trespasser, Gilmore had no expectation of privacy in the bedroom. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Gilmore, 2004 MT 363, 324 M 488, 104 P3d 1051 (2004). See also St. v. McLees, 2000 MT 6, 298 M 15, 994 P2d 683 (2000).

No Privacy Interest in Rental Car by Unauthorized Driver Who Disavows Ownership of Contents: Hill was stopped for speeding and ticketed. After the stop was completed, the officer engaged Hill in small talk, inquiring where Hill was going and where his traveling clothes were. Hill replied that it was a quick trip, so no extra clothes were needed. Although no bags or clothes were in sight, the officer asked if Hill was carrying anything illegal. Hill said no, and the officer asked if Hill would consent to a search of the vehicle, to which Hill initially consented. In going over the terms of the consent form, Hill related that the car had been rented by a friend and that a search of the trunk was probably not a good idea because Hill did not know what the friend might have placed there. The officer then checked on the origin of the car and discovered that it had been acquired through a rental agency, but that the car was 2 days late in being returned, and that Hill was not an authorized driver. The agency asked that the car be impounded and gave permission for a search. The officers found two bags in the trunk, but Hill disclaimed ownership of the bags. A search of the bags revealed drugs and Hill's cell phone charger. Hill was then charged with drug crimes and later moved to suppress the evidence, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Hill had no reasonable expectation of privacy in the car's contents because he was not an authorized driver, had no relation to the car's owner or renter, and voluntarily disclaimed knowledge and ownership of anything in the car. Hill could not expect privacy in a car he illegally possessed, and once Hill waived control over the bags, he implicitly granted permission for the bags to be accessed. The search of the trunk was reasonable because permission was granted by the car owner, and the trunk contents were effectively surrendered by Hill, making the car owner's permission to search the vehicle sufficient to permit a full search of items found in the car. St. v. Hill, 2004 MT 184, 322 M 165, 94 P3d 752 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Elison, 2000 MT 288, 302 M 228, 14 P3d 456 (2000), and St. v. Tackitt, 2003 MT 81, 315 M 59, 67 P3d 295 (2003).

Lack of Exigent Circumstances Justifying Warrantless Search of Fanny Pack — Motion to Suppress Evidence Properly Granted: After Lanegan was arrested for obstructing a peace officer and handcuffed, the officer proceeded to conduct a warrantless search of Lanegan's fanny pack and discovered drugs and drug paraphernalia. Lanegan was then charged with drug crimes. Lanegan moved to suppress the evidence, and the motion was granted. The state appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. A search incident to arrest may be conducted under the conditions in 46-5-102, but in this case, none of the conditions were present. The search would not have protected the officer or prevented Lanegan's escape because Lanegan was already handcuffed, nor would the search have resulted in discovery of anything that could have been used in or fruits of the crime of obstructing a peace officer. Warrantless searches are per se unreasonable, but one exception is when there are exigent circumstances that would cause a reasonable person to believe that prompt action is necessary to prevent physical harm, destruction of relevant evidence, escape, or some other consequence improperly frustrating legitimate law enforcement efforts. However, the search in this case did not rise to the level of exigent circumstances to allow a warrantless search, and the motion to suppress was properly granted. St. v. Lanegan, 2004 MT 134, 321 M 349, 91 P3d 578 (2004).

Reasonable Cause for Investigative Stop and Pat-Down Search — Motion to Suppress Evidence Properly Denied: An officer discovered a youth behind a car about 11 p.m., apparently working on the vehicle's license plate. The officer suspected that the youth was removing the plate, but when asked, the youth claimed to be installing it. The officer recognized the youth from prior law enforcement contacts and knew that the youth did not live at the residence or own a car. Based on these circumstances, the officer conducted a pat-down search and discovered a marijuana pipe. At about that time, the youth's girlfriend came out of the residence and told the officer that she had requested that the youth put the license plate on the vehicle. The youth later moved to suppress the drug paraphernalia on grounds that the officer did not have a particularized suspicion to make the investigative stop, exceeded the scope of the investigative stop, and did not have probable cause to conduct a frisk. The Supreme Court affirmed denial of the motion to suppress. Applying the two-part test from St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293 (1981), the court held that the officer had sufficient objective data to form a particularized suspicion that the youth was engaged in wrongdoing to justify the investigative stop. Then, once the officer recognized the youth, suspicions were heightened, so the pat-down search remained within the context of the initial stop, and the officer did not exceed the scope of the stop. Finally, because of the officer's prior dealings with the youth and knowing that the youth did not live at the residence or own a car, the officer had reasonable cause: (1) to believe that the youth was committing an offense and might be armed; (2) for concern for the officer's safety; and (3) to conduct a frisk. The officer did not have to accept the youth's seemingly innocent explanation of why he was working behind the car late at night. In re D.R.B., 2004 MT 90, 320 M 516, 88 P3d 808 (2004). See also St. v. Collard, 286 M 185, 951 P2d 56 (1997), and St. v. Dawson, 1999 MT 171, 295 M 212, 983 P2d 916 (1999).

Probable Cause for Search Warrant for Vehicle Based on Warrantless Canine Search of Exterior of Vehicle, Outstanding Drug Warrant, and Officer's Experience: Officers went to Hart's home to execute an outstanding warrant for felony sale of dangerous drugs and noticed Hart driving away in his van in the opposite direction. The officers initiated a traffic stop and noticed furtive movements from Hart as he moved quickly toward the floorboard, indicating that he was attempting to retrieve a weapon or hide something in the van. Hart refused a request to search the van, but the officers had a particularized suspicion that Hart was in possession of drugs. The officers conducted a canine search of the exterior of the van, and the dog alerted to the presence of drugs. The officers then acquired a warrant to search the van and discovered methamphetamine and marijuana. On appeal, Hart contended that there was insufficient probable cause for a search warrant. The Supreme Court disagreed. Evaluated in light of an officer's knowledge and all relevant circumstances, probable cause to search exists if the facts and circumstances within the officer's personal knowledge are sufficient to warrant a reasonable person to believe that a suspect has committed an offense. In this case, there was sufficient probable cause based on the fact that the officers were attempting to execute an outstanding drug warrant, the officer's experience in using drug-detecting canines, the dog's positive alert, and Hart's furtive movements at the time of the stop. St. v. Hart, 2004 MT 51, 320 M 154, 85 P3d 1275 (2004).

Warrantless Search of Vehicle Exterior by Drug-Sniffing Dog — Expectation of Privacy in Vehicle Parked in Public Area — Particularized Suspicion Required: Following an anonymous tip that Tackitt was involved in drug trafficking and that he had a quantity of marijuana in the trunk of his car, a drug task force officer conducted an exterior canine search of Tackitt's car when it was parked outside Tackitt's residence. The dog alerted to the presence of drugs in the vehicle. The officer checked Tackitt's criminal record and verified some of the public information received in the tip and then obtained a warrant to search the vehicle and Tackitt's residence. The vehicle search revealed no evidence, but during the search of the residence, officers found drugs and paraphernalia. Tackitt moved to suppress on grounds that use of the dog violated the right to privacy. The District Court denied the motion, holding that Tackitt had no reasonable expectation of privacy in the odors emanating from his vehicle while it was parked in an area open to the public or, alternatively, that if particularized suspicion was required for use of the dog, the search in this case was supported by proper particularized suspicion. Tackitt appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Pursuant to St. v. Elison, 2000 MT 288, 302 M 228, 14 P3d 456 (2000), Tackitt had an expectation of privacy in the trunk of the vehicle, and the canine sniff did constitute a search. However, the expectation was in no way dependent on where the vehicle was parked, nor did the expectation necessitate a search warrant for the use of the canine to survey the exterior of the vehicle. Federal law allows the use of drug-detecting dogs to sniff closed containers in public areas when police have a particularized suspicion to believe that a crime involving drugs is taking place. Under the greater protection afforded individual privacy under the Montana Constitution, the balance between governmental interests and individual interests is best struck by requiring particularized suspicion as a prerequisite for the use of a drug-sniffing dog. Particularized suspicion must be based on objective data from which an experienced police officer can make the inference that a person is engaged in wrongdoing, and an anonymous tip lacking appropriate corroboration simply cannot qualify as objective data to support a particularized suspicion any more than it can support probable cause. Therefore, because the District Court improperly concluded that there was a particularized suspicion for use of the dog to survey the exterior of Tackitt's vehicle and because the application for the search warrant failed to establish probable cause for the issuance of the warrant, the District Court's denial of the motion to suppress was reversible error. (Note: this holding is limited to the use of drug-sniffing dogs during police investigations and does not apply to the human detection of the odor of drugs.) St. v. Tackitt, 2003 MT 81, 315 M 59, 67 P3d 295 (2003), distinguishing St. v. Scheetz, 286 M 41, 950 P2d 722 (1997), and followed in St. v. Hart, 2004 MT 51, 320 M 154, 85 P3d 1275 (2004).

Writs of Execution Used to Enter, Search, and Seize — Damages for Violation of Constitutional Rights — Immunity of Peace Officers: Two brothers sued the Sheriff and two deputies for violating their Montana constitutional rights to privacy, due process, and freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures. Neither writs of execution issued to enforce default judgments against one brother nor the postjudgment statutes under which they were issued expressly directed or authorized local peace officers to enter the other brother's house and search for and seize property of the brother against whom the writs were issued and who lived in the house. Therefore, 2-9-103 did not give the peace officers immunity from suit on the basis that they acted "under the authority of law". However, to the extent that any claim for damages for violation of due process is based on failure to provide the brother against whom the writs were issued with notice of property that is exempt from execution and a timely hearing, the claim results from the execution statutes' constitutional inadequacy, and recovery for those procedural inadequacies is barred by the provision in 2-9-103 for immunity for an action under authority of a law subsequently found unconstitutional. The District Court's dismissal, based on statutory immunity, of the brothers' other claims was reversed. Dorwart v. Caraway, 2002 MT 240, 312 M 1, 58 P3d 128 (2002).

Involuntary Written Consent to Search — Suppression of Illegally Seized Evidence Under Exclusionary Rule: Olson was arrested when officers entered her home pursuant to a warrant for Olson's failure to appear at a Justice's Court hearing. While the arrest was taking place in the kitchen, an officer looked into the living room and observed drug paraphernalia. Officers then searched other rooms of the house and found drugs and paraphernalia in each room. An officer requested that Olson sign a form consenting to a further search of the residence, and Olson agreed. A further search revealed more drugs and paraphernalia. Olson later made a taped statement in jail. The District Court denied Olson's motion to suppress on grounds that the written consent was voluntary. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. Although the knowing and voluntary consent by a citizen to a search is a recognized exception to warrant requirements, consent is not voluntary when it is given only after law enforcement officers have already conducted an illegal search because the consent flows directly from the unlawful intrusion. Further, the taped statement should have also been suppressed under the exclusionary rule, because the incriminating statement was gathered as a result of the unlawful search. St. v. Olson, 2002 MT 211, 311 M 270, 55 P3d 935 (2002).

Warrantless Search of Home Subsequent to Lawful Arrest Unjustified Under Plain View Doctrine and Protective Sweep: Olson was arrested when officers entered her home pursuant to a warrant for Olson's failure to appear at a Justice's Court hearing. While the arrest was taking place in the kitchen, an officer looked into the living room and observed drug paraphernalia. Officers then searched other rooms of the house and found drugs and paraphernalia in each room. Olson moved to suppress the evidence and subsequent statement on grounds that the warrantless search was unreasonable. The District Court denied the motion pursuant to the plain view doctrine and concluded that the search was justified as a precautionary sweep. The Supreme Court reversed. Under Chimel v. Calif., 395 US 752 (1969), there is no comparable justification for routinely searching any room other than that in which the arrest occurs. Further, under Md. v. Buie, 494 US 325 (1990), a protective sweep is justified when there are articulable facts that, taken together with the rational inferences from those facts, would warrant a reasonably prudent officer in believing that the area to be swept harbors an individual posing a danger to those on the arrest scene. In this case, the arresting officers were informed that there was no one else in the house at the time of the arrest and had no indication to believe otherwise. Neither the plain view doctrine nor a protective sweep justified a further search of the residence without a warrant. St. v. Olson, 2002 MT 211, 311 M 270, 55 P3d 935 (2002).

Absence of Exigent Circumstances — Warrantless Search Unjustified: Logan was one of two passengers in a vehicle that was stopped for failure to have the rear license plate illuminated. The officer recognized the driver, who had a history of carrying weapons and of violence toward police officers, and called for backup. The officer then approached the vehicle but did not smell or observe any illegal drugs or drug paraphernalia or observe any behavior that led the officer to believe that anyone in the vehicle was under the influence of drugs. After obtaining identification from the driver and passengers, the officer ran a check for outstanding warrants on all the parties and learned that all three persons had past drug arrests and that an extreme officer caution alert was in effect for the driver. The officer then called for another officer who had a drug-sniffing dog. The dog alerted to the passenger-side door of the car, and the officer removed a purse from the back seat containing drug paraphernalia and a paper bindle. The dog entered the vehicle and indicated additional drugs. Logan was subsequently arrested for possession of dangerous drugs but moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the officer did not have a particularized suspicion of the presence of drugs to support a canine sniff search of the vehicle. The Supreme Court agreed. In St. v. Elison, 2000 MT 288, 302 M 228, 14 P3d 456 (2000), the Supreme Court held that there is no automobile exception to constitutional search warrant requirements and that the mobility of a vehicle, without more, is not sufficient to justify a warrantless search. In addition to particularized suspicion, a warrantless search of a vehicle requires probable cause and a generally applicable exception to the warrant requirement, such as plain view search, a search incident to arrest, or exigent circumstances, which was the only applicable exception at issue here. The District Court held that the exigent circumstance in this case was that allowing Logan to reenter the vehicle to retrieve the purse would have provided the opportunity to destroy the evidence. However, the officer testified that there was nothing that prevented obtaining a search warrant, and that testimony itself belied the fact that exigent circumstances existed. Because the state failed to meet the heavy burden of proving exigent circumstances, the District Court erred in denying Logan's motion to suppress, so the case was reversed. St. v. Logan, 2002 MT 206, 311 M 239, 53 P3d 1285 (2002).

Reasonable Cause for Search of Probationer — Motion to Suppress Evidence of Search Properly Denied: As a condition of a suspended sentence for conviction of felony sale of drugs, Roper consented to warrantless searches of his person, vehicle, or residence. Roper was subsequently granted a conditional discharge from state supervision of his probation because he was serving a concurrent probation as a result of a federal criminal conviction. However, despite the conditional discharge, the state reserved the right to warrantless searches and drug checks during the term of the state probationary sentence, and Roper was relieved only of the requirement to report to the state probation officer monthly. After a few months, the state probation officer became concerned that Roper was both using and selling drugs when two clients reported Roper's continued involvement with drugs. An informant told investigators that Roper stored drugs in a black leather pouch. Based on the gathered information and the close proximity of Roper's workplace to a school, the probation officer believed that reasonable cause existed to search Roper and, with other police officers, went to Roper's workplace and observed him outside involved in what appeared to be a drug transaction. They searched Roper but found no drugs in his possession. The officers went into the workplace and conducted a urinalysis on Roper, which tested positive. While there, the officers noticed a black leather pouch next to Roper's work gloves, seized it, and discovered methamphetamine. Roper was arrested, and the officers went to his house where additional drug evidence was discovered and seized. Roper moved to suppress all the evidence found at both his workplace and residence, contending that the probation officer did not have the right to perform any type of warrantless search and that the evidence seized at the residence was the result of the illegal search of the workplace. The motion was denied, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The probation officer's authority to conduct warrantless searches was extended by the waiver of privacy to which Roper agreed as a condition of probation. The officers were lawfully at Roper's workplace because they had authority to request a urinalysis and to search Roper's person, and the seizure of the black pouch was proper based on the plain view doctrine and information that the pouch was where Roper kept drugs. Further, because the evidence at the workplace was lawfully gathered, the District Court did not err when it denied the motion to suppress evidence gathered during the subsequent search of Roper's home. St. v. Roper, 2001 MT 96, 305 M 212, 26 P3d 741 (2001).

Exigency Requirements for Warrantless Search of Vehicle Clarified — Automobile Exception to Search Warrant Requirement Inapplicable: In order to justify the warrantless search of an automobile, the state must show exigent circumstances under which it was not practical to obtain a warrant. Taking the opportunity to clarify the source of the exigency requirement, the Supreme Court noted that Montana's unique constitutional language affords citizens a greater right to privacy and broader protection than the federal constitution in cases involving searches of private property, and as a result, the category of warrantless searches that may be conducted under the Montana Constitution is narrower than the category of warrantless searches that may be conducted under the federal constitution. The Montana Constitution provides greater protection from warrantless search of automobiles, and such searches are restricted to the purpose of safeguarding articles within plain view of the officer. In this case, Elison had items stowed out of view behind the seat of his car, creating an actual and reasonable expectation of privacy, and the state needed a compelling interest beyond the mere existence of probable cause to search the car without a warrant. The warrantless search of an automobile also requires the existence of a generally applicable exception to the warrant requirement, such as a plain view search, a search incident to arrest, or exigent circumstances. Here, the District Court found exigent circumstances, including the mobility of the vehicle, the possibility that a confederate could move the vehicle, and the fact that it would have been difficult to obtain a warrant at the time that the stop was made at 12:05 a.m. The Supreme Court disagreed and held that the state failed to carry the heavy burden of proving exigent circumstances. Mere mobility of a vehicle, without more, is insufficient to justify a warrantless search. The possibility that a confederate could move the vehicle did not apply because Elison was alone and without means to contact a confederate. The validity of a warrantless search also does not turn solely on the time of day that the search is conducted. Although Montana magistrates may prefer not to be disturbed late at night, Montana's constitutional protections apply at all times and do not simply fade away with the setting sun. Absent exigency, the search of Elison's vehicle was unlawful, and Elison's motion to suppress the fruits of the warrantless search was improperly denied. The case was reversed. St. v. Elison, 2000 MT 288, 302 M 228, 14 P3d 456, 57 St. Rep. 1206 (2000).

Officer's Knowledge of Vehicle Owner's Revoked License Sufficient Basis for Suspicion of Criminal Activity to Warrant Stopping Vehicle: Deputy Keintz observed a vehicle displaying a distinctive personalized license plate being driven by a female south of Missoula. The officer recognized the license plate, recalled the prior arrest and license suspension of the vehicle owner, and initiated a traffic stop. Halvorson was the owner and driver of the vehicle and was ticketed for driving with a suspended license. On appeal, Halvorson contended that the officer did not have sufficient information to form a particularized suspicion that the occupant of the vehicle was or had been engaged in criminal activity to justify stopping the vehicle. Applying the criteria in St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293 (1981), the Supreme Court followed St. v. Pike, 551 NW 2d 919 (Minn. 1996), in holding that an officer's knowledge that the owner of a vehicle has a revoked driver's license is enough to form the basis of a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity when the officer observes the vehicle being driven, as long as the officer remains unaware of any facts that would render unreasonable an assumption that the owner is driving the vehicle. St. v. Halvorson, 2000 MT 56, 299 M 1, 997 P2d 751, 57 St. Rep. 270 (2000), followed in Billings v. Costa, 2006 MT 181, 333 M 84, 140 P3d 1070 (2006). Costa was followed in St. v. Neil, 2009 MT 128, 350 M 268, 207 P3d 296 (2009).

Warrantless Strip Search of Prison Visitor Permissible if Supported by Reasonable Suspicion: Deserly traveled to the state prison to visit her husband who was an inmate, but upon attempting to enter, her underwire bra set off the metal detector. She was informed that she could consent to a strip search and that if she refused, she would be denied contact visitation but would be allowed noncontact visitation. Deserly was a former jailer and knew what a strip search entailed, but nevertheless consented to the search. Later, Deserly sued the Department of Corrections, seeking unspecified damages for emotional distress allegedly caused when the prison officers required her to submit to the strip search, complaining that her privacy was invaded and that she was humiliated and visually raped as a result of the search. The District Court found that the search was justified and that no privacy invasion occurred and summarily dismissed the case. Deserly conceded on appeal that because the state has an interest in the security of its penal institutions, searches of inmate visitors are justifiable only on satisfying a reasonable suspicion standard, but maintained that the legitimate penalogical need to conduct the search could have been satisfied by more narrow means than a strip search. The Supreme Court acknowledged that one of the clearest forms of degradation in Western society is to strip a person of the person's clothes and that a strip search, regardless of how professionally and courteously conducted, is an embarrassing and humiliating experience. Further, a prison visitor retains the constitutional right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. However, a prisoner does not have a due process right to unfettered visitation, nor does a citizen have a right to unfettered visitation of a prisoner that rises to a constitutional dimension. Moreover, in seeking entry into a controlled prison environment, a visitor simultaneously acknowledges a lesser expectation of privacy because of the insistence on access. Because prisons are dangerous places for employees, visitors, and inmates, the basic constitutional issue becomes one of balancing the legitimate governmental interest in and need for searching inmate and prison visitors against the intrusions into personal rights and residual privacy interests that such searches entail. Although prison visitors can be subjected to some searches, such as pat-downs or metal detector sweeps, merely as a condition of visitation, more intrusive searches, such as strip searches, are permissible as exceptions to the constitutional warrant requirements only if the search is supported by reasonable suspicion. Thus, the ultimate question was not simply whether there was some alternative means of conducting the search, but whether prison officials acted reasonably and used the least intrusive means under the circumstances. In Deserly's case, the strip search was supported by reasonable suspicion and was conducted in a manner that took into account Deserly's privacy interest and yet fulfilled the Department's penalogical need to ensure that Deserly was not carrying metal contraband in some article of her clothing. Deserly v. Dept. of Corrections, 2000 MT 42, 298 M 328, 995 P2d 972, 57 St. Rep. 199 (2000), following St. v. Bassett, 1999 MT 109, 294 M 327, 982 P2d 410, 56 St. Rep. 447 (1999), and distinguishing Hunter v. Auger, 672 F2d 668 (8th Cir. 1982), and Thorne v. Jones, 765 F2d 1270 (5th Cir. 1985).

Invalid Third-Party Consent to Warrantless Search of Private Residence — Consenting Party to Have Actual Authority to Consent to Search: A warrantless search conducted inside a home is per se unreasonable, subject to only a few exceptions, one of which is when the search is conducted pursuant to consent that is freely and voluntarily given. The state may justify a warrantless search by showing that permission was obtained from defendant or from a third party who possessed common authority over or other sufficient relationship to the premises or effect sought to be inspected, but the state has the burden of showing that consent was voluntary. However, for third-party consent to be valid, the consenting party must have actual authority to consent, as opposed to apparent authority. In the present case, McLees lived with his father, Scott, in an apartment owned by his grandfather, Earl, and investigating officers obtained Earl's voluntary consent before searching the residence. The District Court held that Earl had common authority to consent to the search and denied McLees' motion to suppress incriminating evidence found in the search. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under U.S. v. Matlock, 415 US 164, 39 L Ed 2d 249, 94 S Ct 988 (1974), common authority may not be implied from the mere property interest of a third party in the property to be searched. Rather, the authority that justifies third-party consent rests on the mutual use of the property by persons having joint access or control for most purposes. Here, the record was insufficient to show that Earl had common authority over McLees' apartment. Earl never went to the apartment unless Scott was there. Earl did not have free access to and was not a cohabitant of the apartment and did not share in its use. The fact that Earl owned the property was not dispositive when McLees had a reasonable expectation of privacy by living there. Earl therefore did not have a sufficient relationship with the apartment that would give him actual authority to consent to a warrantless search. While declining to address whether the seized evidence was admissible under the independent source rule or the inevitable discovery rule, the Supreme Court held that it was inadmissible under the third-party consent rule and reversed for further proceedings. St. v. McLees, 2000 MT 6, 298 M 15, 994 P2d 683, 57 St. Rep. 25 (2000), following St. v. Sorenson, 180 M 269, 590 P2d 136 (1979), St. v. Lopez, 896 P2d 889 (Hawaii 1995), and St. v. Hubbel, 286 M 200, 951 P2d 971, 54 St. Rep. 1373 (1997), distinguishing Ill. v. Rodriguez, 497 US 177, 111 L Ed 2d 148, 110 S Ct 2793 (1990), and followed, with regard to third-party authority to consent to search, in St. v. Gilmore, 2004 MT 363, 324 M 488, 104 P3d 1051 (2004), and St. v. Lacey, 2009 MT 62, 349 M 371, 204 P3d 1192 (2009).

No Evidence of Criminal Activity, Exigent Circumstances, or Emergency — Warrantless Entry Into Home in Search of Runaway Unjustified: While searching for a runaway teenager, police went to McBride's house, where the runaway was reportedly staying. Upon arrival, there was no sign of ongoing criminal activity. The officer was denied entry upon request, but entered anyway. McBride was arrested on an outstanding warrant, and evidence was seized. McBride moved to suppress the evidence, but the motion was denied. Although the facts and circumstances imparted to the officer were from a reliable source, they were insufficient to justify in a reasonable person a belief that McBride had committed any offense. Further, no exigent or emergency circumstances existed to support a compelling need for official action without first securing a warrant; therefore, warrantless entry into McBride's home was wrong. The Supreme Court reversed the order of the trial court denying the motion to suppress the evidence and remanded. St. v. McBride, 1999 MT 127, 294 M 461, 982 P2d 453, 56 St. Rep. 512 (1999), following St. v. Dow, 256 M 126, 844 P2d 780, 49 St. Rep. 1168 (1992), and St. v. Wakeford, 1998 MT 16, 287 M 220, 953 P2d 1065, 55 St. Rep. 56 (1998).

Lawful Entry Into Home by Firefighter — Reasonable Expectation of Privacy Retained — Plain View Exception Inapplicable: A firefighter legally in Bassett's home performing mopup after a fire discovered apparent marijuana growing in a closet. The plants, visible because the closet door had burned away, were subsequently seized by a Deputy Sheriff without a warrant. When told that the plants had been discovered, Bassett waived Miranda rights and admitted growing marijuana but later moved to suppress the statement because it was the direct product of an unconstitutional search. The District Court admitted evidence from the search under the plain view exception and denied suppression of Bassett's confession. The court further held that Bassett no longer held a reasonable expectation of privacy in his closet because he did nothing to restrict entry into the home and because society would not view entry into a burned residence that was largely destroyed and open to the elements as an invasion of privacy. To determine the threshold question of whether the search was an unlawful intrusion into Bassett's privacy, the Supreme Court applied the criteria in St. v. Hubbel, 286 M 200, 951 P2d 971, 54 St. Rep. 1373 (1997): (1) whether Bassett had an actual expectation of privacy; (2) whether society would recognize that expectation as objectively reasonable; and (3) the nature of the state's intrusion. Citing Mich. v. Tyler, 436 US 499, 56 L Ed 2d 486, 98 S Ct 1942 (1978), the court noted that a person retains a reasonable privacy interest in that person's home even when it has been damaged by fire. The court also followed U.S. v. Hoffman, 607 F2d 280 (9th Cir. 1979), for the proposition that the privacy expectation remains even when firefighters discover contraband. Although a firefighter is obviously justified and in fact expected by Montanans to enter a home to extinguish a fire, this does not mean that Montanans reasonably expect that the private sanctity of their homes will then be open to other government officials to search for evidence of unrelated criminal activity simply because the firefighter was already legitimately on the premises. The firefighter and the Deputy Sheriff each had separate reasons for entering the home. Therefore, two entirely separate justifications for each entry were required. There was no exigent circumstance, such as an immediate emergency, that justified the Deputy Sheriff's warrantless entry, nor did the plain view exception apply because the officer was not legally in the home when the evidence was seen. Further, Bassett did not need to take any affirmative steps to demonstrate that he retained his privacy interest. The warrantless search was unjustified, and Bassett's incriminating statement was the direct product of an illegal search and thus inadmissible by virtue of the exclusionary rule. St. v. Bassett, 1999 MT 109, 294 M 327, 982 P2d 410, 56 St. Rep. 447 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Bell, 737 P2d 254 (Wash. 1987), and St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 913 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996), and followed in Deserly v. Dept. of Corrections, 2000 MT 42, 298 M 328, 995 P2d 972, 57 St. Rep. 199 (2000). However, see St. v. Lewis, 2007 MT 295, 340 M 10, 171 P3d 731 (2007), in which the plain view doctrine did apply to the seizure and admissibility of potential evidence of arson seen by a Deputy Sheriff who initially entered a burning residence for fire suppression and who subsequently reentered the residence to secure the evidence.

Knowledge of Possible Burglary and Armed Threat to Officer by Shop Owner as Justifying Entering Shop and Conducting Sweep Search: At 3:30 a.m., a police officer noticed a pickup with its dome light on and a door open parked next to a pawn shop. A man whom the officer knew was under supervision of a probation officer walked out of the shop with several fishing gear items and told the officer that he was doing his laundry. Another officer arrived. The man appeared worried and near tears and told the officers that he worked at the shop and that he and the shop owner were doing inventory. An officer went to the door, loudly identified himself as a police officer, and entered the shop. The officer was justified in believing that a felony had been or was being committed and was therefore justified in entering the shop. When he entered the shop and the owner pointed a gun at him, shouted at the officer for several minutes, and told him to leave and when the officer talked him into putting the gun down, the officer was further justified in conducting a plain view protective sweep of the shop to look for other persons and weapons. Therefore, it was not error to deny a motion to suppress evidence found on a counter and on the shop owner's person and used to convict him of drug charges. St. v. Keating, 1998 MT 109, 288 M 447, 958 P2d 690, 55 St. Rep. 430 (1998).

Freedom From Unreasonable Search and Seizure in Hotel or Motel Room — Exigent Circumstances Exception to Warrant Requirement: The same protection against unreasonable search and seizure that applies to private residences extends to guests in hotel and motel rooms. One exception to the warrant requirement is when exigent circumstances and probable cause are present. The exigent circumstances doctrine provides that a warrantless entry by law enforcement officials may be legal when there is a compelling need for official action and no time to secure a warrant. Exigent circumstances are circumstances that would cause a reasonable person to believe that entry or other relevant prompt action was necessary to prevent physical harm to the officers or other persons, the destruction of relevant evidence, the escape of the suspect, or some other consequence improperly frustrating legitimate law enforcement efforts. The state can meet its heavy burden of showing the existence of exigent circumstances only by demonstrating specific and articulable facts to justify that the circumstances, as they appeared at the time of entry, would lead a reasonable officer to believe that someone in the house or hotel or motel room required immediate assistance. Exigent circumstances existed in the present case when: (1) the police responded to a dispatch that Wakeford was possibly suicidal and might harm himself; (2) after checking with the desk clerk, the officers heard two voices, male and female, arguing as the officers approached Wakeford's room, leading the officers to believe that they were about to confront a potential domestic abuse situation; (3) the officers spoke to Wakeford at the door and were unable to see inside the room or whether Wakeford was holding anything in his hands; (4) Wakeford was sweating and breathing heavily, and his eyes were dilated; and (5) the officers could reasonably believe that their immediate entry into the room was necessary to ensure the safety of the occupants and themselves. Under these circumstances, probable cause existed that Wakeford may have committed domestic abuse, justifying a warrantless search of the room. Evidence seized pursuant to the search was admissible. St. v. Wakeford, 1998 MT 16, 287 M 220, 953 P2d 1065, 55 St. Rep. 56 (1998), followed in St. v. Anderson, 1999 MT 60, 293 M 490, 977 P2d 983, 56 St. Rep. 252 (1999), followed, with regard to applicability of exigent circumstances, in St. v. McBride, 1999 MT 127, 294 M 461, 982 P2d 453, 56 St. Rep. 512 (1999), and followed, with regard to applicability of the exigent circumstances exception, in St. v. Gomez, 2007 MT 111, 337 M 219, 158 P3d 442 (2007). See also U.S. v. Gardner, 627 F2d 906 (9th Cir. 1980), St. v. Dow, 256 M 126, 844 P2d 780 (1992), and U.S. v. Gooch, 6 F3d 673 (9th Cir. 1993).

Constitutionality of Warrantless Police Search of Private Land Up to and Including Threshold of Residence — Concept of Curtilage Inapplicable: Hubbel sought to suppress evidence gathered by police from the common parking area, sidewalk, and porch of Hubbel's residence on grounds that the officers were not on the property legally when they first observed evidence, rendering the search and seizure unlawful. Rather than analyzing the facts in the context of curtilage, the Supreme Court applied St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), in deciding the extent to which Hubbel had a legitimate expectation of privacy on his private property. The police parked in a general parking area used by other visitors, and after observing blood evidence in the driveway, they walked along the sidewalk to the front porch and discovered bullet holes in the front door, as well as other evidence in plain view. The officers did not ignore any posted warnings, hop fences, open gates, or slip through bushes intended to screen the home from view. In fact, the officers did nothing other than what any casual visitor to the Hubbel home would do. Because the intrusion in this case was minimal, the entry onto Hubbel's property leading up to and including the threshold of the residence did not require a warrant. The concept of curtilage did not apply because there was no evidence that the area surrounding the home was put to any special use that would indicate that the surrounding area was intimately connected with the home itself or that Hubbel reasonably expected that the surrounding area should be treated the same as the home itself. St. v. Hubbel, 286 M 200, 951 P2d 971, 54 St. Rep. 1373 (1997).

Retroactive Consent to Warrantless Search Disallowed: Hubbel voluntarily gave retroactive consent to a search of her property 5 months after police searched and seized evidence inside the Hubbel home. However, the requirement of advance justification, by virtue of a warrant or a carefully carved exception, is fundamental and inherent to all search and seizure cases. Applying the rationale in Terry v. Ohio, 392 US 1, 20 L Ed 2d 889, 88 S Ct 1868 (1968), the Supreme Court noted that exigent circumstances for conducting a warrantless search consist of circumstances that involve factors that exist when it is not practicable to secure a warrant, such as a mobile vehicle, the possible destruction of evidence, safety of police officers, or other emergency situations, and must be apparent at the inception of the search. Requiring prior consent is the only view that makes sense in light of the purposes behind the suppression rule, which serves to deter lawless police conduct by excluding illegally obtained evidence. Thus, retroactive consent may not be used to validate a search, and the evidence seized as a result of the unlawful search in this case was inadmissible. St. v. Hubbel, 286 M 200, 951 P2d 971, 54 St. Rep. 1373 (1997).

Plain Feel Doctrine Adopted — Incidental to Investigatory Stop: Collard contended that ski goggles that were felt in his pant leg during a pat search conducted pursuant to an investigatory stop were wrongfully seized because the goggles were not in plain view and their identity was not readily apparent, and therefore the goggles were improperly introduced into evidence. Applying Minn. v. Dickerson, 508 US 366, 124 L Ed 2d 334, 113 S Ct 2130 (1993), the Supreme Court adopted the "plain feel" corollary to the "plain view" doctrine. The plain feel doctrine states that if a police officer lawfully pats down a suspect's outer clothing and feels an object of a contour or mass that makes its identity immediately apparent, there has been no invasion of the suspect's privacy beyond that already authorized by the officer's search for weapons. If the object is contraband, its warrantless seizure is justified by the same practical considerations that inhere in the plain view context. In the present case, the ski goggles had a shape that could be immediately identifiable when touched, and the officer did not need to manipulate the object or touch it more than a few seconds to know what it was. The robbery suspect had reportedly worn ski goggles, and the officer's seizure of Collard's goggles was thus justified. St. v. Collard, 286 M 185, 951 P2d 56, 54 St. Rep. 1366 (1997).

Drugs Discovered in Response to House Fire — "Plain View" Seizure Upheld — "Plain View" Doctrine Clarified: Police officer Denham responded to a house fire and to the belief of bystanders that there were two people inside the home by kicking in the door of the home and crawling under thick smoke to a bedroom, where he discovered marijuana in spaghetti jars. When Loh came home from work, she was informed of the fire, was informed of her rights, and admitted that the marijuana was hers. The District Court denied Loh's motion to suppress the evidence of the marijuana plants. The Supreme Court affirmed and clarified the rules for the application of the "plain view" doctrine in Montana. The Supreme Court noted that many Montana cases have followed Coolidge v. N.H., 403 US 443 (1971), in determining that evidence in plain view be inadvertently discovered and that the seizure of evidence in plain view requires exigent circumstances (as opposed to requiring exigent circumstances for only the entry itself into the home). The Supreme Court noted that these requirements of Coolidge were not continued in the more recent case of Horton v. Calif., 496 US 128 (1990), and that the rationale of Horton was followed by the Ninth Circuit Court in G&G Jewelry, Inc. v. Oakland, 989 F2d 1093 (9th Cir. 1993). For these reasons, the Supreme Court overruled prior "plain view" cases to the extent that those cases were inconsistent with Horton and G&G Jewelry. Citing cases from other jurisdictions involving searches conducted in the course of responses to fire alarms, the Supreme Court then held that the seizure of the marijuana plants was lawful because the officers were lawfully in the house because of fire, the nature of the content of the jars was immediately apparent, and the officers had lawful access to the jars. St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996), followed in St. v. Doyle, 1998 MT 195, 286 M 185, 951 P2d 56, 55 St. Rep. 819 (1998), and St. v. Weaselboy, 1999 MT 274, 296 M 503, 989 P2d 836, 56 St. Rep. 1115 (1999), and distinguished in St. v. Bassett, 1999 MT 109, 294 M 327, 982 P2d 410, 56 St. Rep. 447 (1999).

Automobile Exception to Search Warrant Requirement — Probable Cause and Exigent Circumstances: A warrantless search of an automobile requires: (1) the existence of probable cause to search; and (2) the presence of exigent circumstances that make it impracticable to obtain a warrant under the circumstances. Defendant's daughter-in-law notified police that defendant was transporting a shipment of marijuana in the spare tire of his pickup truck and would arrive that evening. The information was consistent with reports from other informants regarding defendant's drug-related activity and, when coupled with defendant's appearance at the designated time in the described vehicle, established probable cause to stop the vehicle. The fact that there was neither enough time to obtain a warrant nor enough officers available to safely conduct the stakeout constituted appropriate exigent circumstances to conduct the search. The stop and search being legal, defendant's arguments regarding lack of consent and denial of a motion to suppress were immaterial. St. v. Allen, 256 M 47, 844 P2d 105, 49 St. Rep. 1130 (1992), followed in St. v. McCarthy, 258 M 51, 852 P2d 111, 50 St. Rep. 420 (1993), and St. v. Elison, 2000 MT 288, 302 M 228, 14 P3d 456, 57 St. Rep. 1206 (2000). McCarthy was distinguished in St. v. Lott, 272 M 195, 900 P2d 306, 52 St. Rep. 696 (1995). See also Carroll v. U.S., 267 US 132, 69 L Ed 543, 45 S Ct 280 (1924), and Calif. v. Acevedo, 500 US 565, 114 L Ed 2d 619, 111 S Ct 1982 (1991).

Test for Search of Probationer — Knowledge of Drug Sales From Residence — Warrantless Search by Probation Officer Allowed: The test for a search by a probation officer in regard to one of the officer's probationers is reasonable grounds, which is less stringent than probable cause. The probation officer has a continued experience with the probationer, and the officer's expertise would be rendered meaningless by a warrant requirement. The delay and greater evidentiary burden of a warrant would substantially inhibit the effectiveness of probation. In this case, a warrantless search was reasonable when the probation officer was informed by the police that they had made a drug buy at the probationer's residence from a person who lived with the probationer. St. v. Hall, 249 M 366, 816 P2d 438, 48 St. Rep. 774 (1991).

Frisk Incident to Investigatory Stop: A peace officer may frisk an individual for weapons incident to making an investigatory stop. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990), following Terry v. Ohio, 392 US 1, 20 L Ed 2d 889, 88 S Ct 1868 (1968).

Vehicular Stop Based on Information From Flyer or Bulletin: A law enforcement officer may make a vehicular stop if the officer has a reasonable suspicion, grounded in specific and articulable facts, that a person was involved in or is wanted in connection with a completed felony. This suspicion may be based on information obtained from a flyer or bulletin if the bulletin was issued on the basis of articulable facts supporting a reasonable suspicion. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990), followed in St. v. Grimes, 1999 MT 145, 295 M 22, 982 P2d 1037, 56 St. Rep. 571 (1999). See also U.S. v. Hensley, 469 US 221, 83 L Ed 2d 604, 105 S Ct 675 (1985).

Existence of Exigent Circumstances — Warrantless Search: The Supreme Court applied the rule formulated in U.S. v. Kunkler, 679 F2d 187 (9th Cir. 1982), that holds that exigent circumstances exist to justify a warrantless entry, search, or seizure when police officers, acting on probable cause and in good faith, reasonably believe from the totality of circumstances that: (1) evidence of contraband will imminently be destroyed; or (2) the nature of the crime or character of the suspect poses a risk of danger to the arresting officers or third persons. St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988).

Valid Search of Wallet After Arrest: The District Court properly allowed into evidence the results of a postarrest, nonconsensual, warrantless search of defendant's wallet. The Supreme Court adopted the reasoning in U.S. v. Passaro, 624 F2d 938 (9th Cir. 1980), that a wallet is an element of clothing "which is, for a reasonable time following a legal arrest, taken out of the realm of protection from police interest". The search also satisfied the privacy guaranties of the Montana Constitution because the arrest reduced the arrestee's expectation of privacy. St. v. Holzapfel, 230 M 105, 748 P2d 953, 45 St. Rep. 53 (1988).

Delayed Seizure of Articles in Plain View: A seizure that is proper under the "plain view" exception may be delayed, so long as the delay is reasonable. St. v. Romero, 224 M 431, 730 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 2309 (1986).

Warrantless Search of Girlfriend's Dwelling — Defendant's Expectation of Privacy: The defendant escaped from prison and hid in his girlfriend's nearby home. Police officers, who had a valid arrest warrant for the defendant, discovered him when they conducted a warrantless search of the dwelling. On appeal, the Supreme Court ruled that the defendant had a legitimate expectation of privacy in his girlfriend's home and has standing to challenge the constitutionality of the search based on an arrest warrant rather than a search warrant. Admission of the evidence obtained from the search was not harmless error even though the defendant had testified to the circumstances surrounding his escape. St. v. Kao, 215 M 286, 698 P2d 403, 42 St. Rep. 363 (1985).

Warrantless Search — Third-Party Right of Privacy: Police officers may not constitutionally enter the home of a third person in search of an escaped felon for whom they have a valid arrest warrant unless exigent circumstances exist and probable cause leads them to believe the suspect will be found on the premises. The duty of police officers to search for and arrest those who commit crimes must be balanced with the right of innocent citizens to be secure in the privacy of their homes against unreasonable police invasion. St. v. Kao, 215 M 277, 697 P2d 903, 42 St. Rep. 356 (1985).

Stop and Frisk Procedure Applicable to Automobiles: Where, upon investigating a possible burglary, the investigating officer stopped a suspicious looking automobile and noticed what appeared to be stolen property in the back seat of the car, which was driven off at a high rate of speed in the middle of the investigation, the District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to suppress the stolen property recovered from the automobile. The dictum in St. v. Rader, 177 M 252, 581 P2d 437 (1978), that stop and frisk principles do not apply to automobiles must be abandoned in light of the principle most recently announced in U.S. v. Cortez, 449 US 411, 66 L Ed 2d 621, 101 S Ct 690 (1981), that an assessment of whether a crime has been committed must be based upon all relevant circumstances and the evidence evaluated in light of the knowledge of a trained law enforcement officer. When a trained police officer has a particularized suspicion that the occupant of a vehicle is or has been engaged in criminal activity or is a witness thereto, a limited and reasonable investigatory stop and search is justified. St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293, 38 St. Rep. 1078 (1981), followed in In re Blake, 220 M 27, 712 P2d 1338, 43 St. Rep. 143 (1986), St. v. Probable Cause:

In a situation wherein police officers expect to make a warrantless arrest, the arrest must be based on probable cause. When that probable cause is based on a tip springing from an informant's personal observation, the informant's reliability becomes significant. If the reliability of the informant is based on someone else's statements, the police must make some further inquiry of the informant regarding the underlying circumstances of his conclusion that it is probable that an offense is being or has been committed. St. v. Ribera, 183 M 1, 597 P2d 1164 (1979).

A police officer's detection of the odor of marijuana emanating from inside an automobile, absent evidence of visible content, was insufficient probable cause for a warrantless search and subsequent arrest of the occupants on the basis of evidence seized in the search. St. v. Schoendaller, 176 M 376, 578 P2d 730 (1978).

Police detectives did not have probable cause to enter an upstairs room of an inn, arrest defendants for participating in a card game on unlicensed premises, and search the room because of the inability of the informant's tip to satisfy the two-pronged Aguilar test. St. v. Robey, 176 M 298, 577 P2d 1226 (1978).

Police officers who had been given a description of an automobile and its occupants, who were suspected of having recently robbed a pharmacy, had probable cause to believe the vehicle was carrying stolen property, and evidence obtained in a search of the automobile without a warrant was admissible. St. v. Spielmann, 163 M 199, 516 P2d 617 (1973), followed in St. v. Evjen, 234 M 516, 765 P2d 708, 45 St. Rep. 2096 (1988) (distinguishing U.S. v. Parr, 843 F2d 1228 (9th Cir. 1988)), and in St. v. McCarthy, 258 M 51, 852 P2d 111, 50 St. Rep. 420 (1993), and distinguished in St. v. Amor, 164 M 182, 520 P2d 773 (1974).

Automobile Search: The automobile exception to the warrant requirement requires two things: (1) the existence of probable cause to search; and (2) the presence of exigent circumstances, that is, it was not practicable under the circumstances to obtain a warrant. In the instant case there were no exigent circumstances. St. v. Cripps, 177 M 410, 582 P2d 312 (1978).

"Plain View" Doctrine:

A warrantless seizure of evidence under the "plain view" doctrine is justified only if the police officer had a prior justification for an intrusion in the course of which he inadvertently viewed contraband and exigent circumstances existed to render immediate seizure imperative. In this case the officer's valid visual observation merely furnished probable cause for issuance of a warrant; thus, the court was correct in granting a motion to suppress evidence. St. v. Lane, 175 M 225, 573 P2d 198 (1977), overruled in part in St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996).

Contraband found under a seat during an inventory of an automobile held in police custody was not in plain view, thus it was seized in violation of individual privacy and freedom from unreasonable searches. The inventory search was not justified by protection of the contents for the owner's benefit or protection of the police from claims for lost property beyond articles in plain view from outside the vehicle. St. v. Sawyer, 174 M 512, 571 P2d 1131 (1977), distinguished in St. v. Pastos, 269 M 43, 887 P2d 199, 51 St. Rep. 1441 (1994).

Marijuana and hashish found in a search of the defendant's purse were excluded since there was no valid reason for the officer to inspect the contents of defendant's purse and the "plain view" doctrine was not applicable. St. v. Hough, 163 M 47, 516 P2d 613 (1973).

The Sheriff, who was called to search for a prowler, was justified under this section in seizing items in plain view during such search. St. v. Gallagher, 162 M 155, 509 P2d 852 (1973), overruled in part in St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996).

Inadmissible Evidence in Alleged Bomb Threat: The trial court properly declared inadmissible that evidence which was seized in a warrantless search of the defendant's curtilage and secured by a wiretap of the defendant's phone and all testimony relating thereto. The State's reliance on the "plain view" doctrine and the theory that the telephone company personnel were authorized to secure the evidence was unsuccessful. St. v. Lewis, 173 M 1, 565 P2d 642 (1977).

The right to search a person incident to arrest has always been recognized in this country (Weeks v. U.S., 232 U.S. 383). What may be seized incident to an arrest has been set out by both federal and Montana cases. (See U.S. v. Rabinowitz, 339 U.S. 56; Gould v. U.S., 255 U.S. 298; State v. Benson, 91 Mont. 21, and State v. Wong You, 106 Mont. 347.) The above provision merely codifies the present law set forth in these decisions.

GENERAL

Exigent Circumstances in Safety Sweep — Confession Related to Evidence Lawfully Seized Not Subject to Suppression: Officers arrested a suspect at Whisler's motel room, then entered the room in a safety sweep, where drugs were observed in plain view. Whisler was arrested and while at the detention center admitted possessing methamphetamine. Whisler contended that because the drugs were unlawfully seized at the motel room, the methamphetamine evidence should be suppressed as fruits of an unlawful search. However, exigent circumstances existed to warrant the safety sweep of the motel room, so the search was not unlawful, and because Whisler's admission did not stem from an unlawful search, the motion to suppress the methamphetamine evidence was properly denied. St. v. Whisler, 2008 MT 276, 345 M 292, 190 P3d 1098 (2008).

Inevitable Discovery Doctrine Exception to Exclusionary Rule on Inadmissibility of Evidence Obtained as Result of Unlawful Search — Sua Sponte Application by Supreme Court: Dickinson asserted that certain evidence discovered during a warrantless search of his motel room should be suppressed under the exclusionary rule as fruit of the poisonous tree because the discovery was not made during a search incident to arrest and because the search was not a justified protective sweep. The state contended that the search was conducted on grounds of safety and exigent circumstances. Although neither party raised the argument, the Supreme Court decided sua sponte to address the issue under the inevitable discovery doctrine exception to the exclusionary rule, which holds that fruit of the poisonous tree evidence is admissible if it is inevitable that the evidence would have been discovered apart from a defendant's confession. In this case, the officers were legally in the motel room, and there was more than sufficient evidence in plain sight to justify issuance of a warrant. Once the warrant was executed, the remainder of the evidence would have inevitably been discovered and was thus admissible under the inevitable discovery doctrine. St. v. Dickinson, 2008 MT 159, 343 M 301, 184 P3d 305 (2008). The Dickinson inevitable discovery doctrine was also applied in St. v. Hilgendorf, 2009 MT 158, 350 M 412, 208 P3d 401 (2009). See also St. v. Pearson, 217 M 363, 704 P2d 1056 (1985).

Particularized Suspicion Sufficient Justification for Request for Consent to Search Vehicle — No Illegal Detention — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Snell was stopped for speeding and was also cited for failure to carry proof of insurance. While writing out the citation in the patrol car, the officer asked Snell if he could search the vehicle, and Snell consented. The officer discovered drugs, and Snell was charged with possession and intent to distribute marijuana. Snell moved to suppress the evidence. Snell conceded that he had voluntarily consented to the search, and the state conceded that the officer did not have probable cause. The motion to suppress was denied, and Snell appealed. The Supreme Court considered both the consent and illegal detention issues. First, the court reasoned that the officer had particularized suspicion to stop the vehicle and that Montana law does not require additional justification for requesting consent, so Snell's voluntary consent was sufficient to justify the warrantless search of the vehicle (see St. v. Parker, 1998 MT 6, 287 M 151, 953 P2d 692 (1998)). Second, the court concluded that because the officer did not coerce or restrain Snell, order him to stay, or prevent Snell from exiting the patrol car, a reasonable person would have felt free to leave the patrol car upon completion of the traffic stop, so the poststop interaction between Snell and the officer was a voluntary exchange rather than an illegal detention or unlawful seizure (see St. v. Merrill, 2004 MT 169, 322 M 47, 93 P3d 1227 (2004), and St. v. Hill, 2004 MT 184, 322 M 165, 94 P3d 752 (2004)). Snell's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Snell, 2004 MT 269, 323 M 157, 99 P3d 191 (2004). See also St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 419, 347 M 354, 198 P3d 809 (2008).

Lack of Exigent Circumstances Justifying Warrantless Search of Fanny Pack — Motion to Suppress Evidence Properly Granted: After Lanegan was arrested for obstructing a peace officer and handcuffed, the officer proceeded to conduct a warrantless search of Lanegan's fanny pack and discovered drugs and drug paraphernalia. Lanegan was then charged with drug crimes. Lanegan moved to suppress the evidence, and the motion was granted. The state appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. A search incident to arrest may be conducted under the conditions in this section, but in this case, none of the conditions were present. The search would not have protected the officer or prevented Lanegan's escape because Lanegan was already handcuffed, nor would the search have resulted in discovery of anything that could have been used in or fruits of the crime of obstructing a peace officer. Warrantless searches are per se unreasonable, but one exception is when there are exigent circumstances that would cause a reasonable person to believe that prompt action is necessary to prevent physical harm, destruction of relevant evidence, escape, or some other consequence improperly frustrating legitimate law enforcement efforts. However, the search in this case did not rise to the level of exigent circumstances to allow a warrantless search, and the motion to suppress was properly granted. St. v. Lanegan, 2004 MT 134, 321 M 349, 91 P3d 578 (2004).

Search of Clothing and Duffel Bag Near Arrestee Supported by Exigent Circumstances: Pursuant to a lawful warrant, Galpin was arrested while sleeping on a couch in a small house in the early morning hours and was found to be in possession of two bags of methamphetamine. His coat and a duffel bag were 4 to 6 feet away, and officers searched the clothing and bag and discovered keys that were subsequently found to open two storage facilities where additional drug manufacturing equipment was stored. Galpin moved to suppress the evidence, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The search was permissible both as a means of protecting the agents from attack as well as discovering and seizing the fruits of the crime. Additionally, the previous day, in another location, officers had found other equipment for manufacturing methamphetamine owned by Galpin in a similar duffel bag and reasonably suspected that the bag in Galpin's possession contained equipment and potentially toxic and explosive chemicals used in methamphetamine manufacturing, so the precautionary search of the bag was justified. Thus, the search was supported by exigent circumstances, and the denial of the motion to suppress was not in error. St. v. Galpin, 2003 MT 324, 318 M 318, 80 P3d 1207 (2003).

Invalid Warrantless Search of Defendant's Hands Absent Exigent Circumstances: Officers responding to a break-in found blood on doorknobs, light switches, broken glass, and other objects in the house and garage. Matching the description of the suspect, Hardaway was picked up near the scene and found to have blood on his hands. Hardaway was arrested for burglary, and during postarrest processing, blood was swabbed from his hands without permission or a warrant. The blood sample matched the blood evidence found at the scene. Hardaway moved to suppress blood swab evidence obtained from his hands after arrest, but the motion was denied. The District Court reasoned that the swabbing either was not a search, pursuant to St. v. Holzapfel, 230 M 105, 748 P2d 953 (1988), or was justified as a search incident to arrest, pursuant to St. v. Ulrich, 187 M 347, 609 P2d 1218 (1980). Hardaway appealed on grounds that the swabbing was clearly a search that was required to be justified by both probable cause and exigent circumstances and that no exigent circumstances existed because he was in custody at the time and a warrant could have been obtained. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed. The court adopted the analysis of what constitutes a search set out in Cupp v. Murphy, 412 US 291 (1973), holding that Hardaway had a reasonable expectation of privacy as to his person and personal security (overruling Holzapfel) and that the swabbing constituted a search subject to federal and Montana constitutional protections. Although his hands and the blood on them were exposed to the public for viewing, it was not the viewing that constituted a search, but rather the swabbing. Further, even though the swabbing could be considered a search incident to arrest pursuant to federal law and the bright-line rule in U.S. v. Robinson, 414 US 218 (1973), that requires no further justification than a lawful arrest for the search exception to apply, the Supreme Court opted to grant greater individual privacy rights protection to Hardaway based on the Montana Constitution, consistent with the prior holding in St. v. Sawyer, 174 M 512, 571 P2d 1131 (1977). The court noted its consistent holdings that a warrantless search incident to an arrest must be commensurate with its underlying purpose of preventing an arrestee from using any weapons, escaping, or destroying incriminating evanescent evidence in the arrestee's possession, considered inherently anticipated exigent circumstances under subsections (1) through (3) of this section; however, to the extent that a warrantless search incident to a lawful arrest is conducted pursuant to subsection (4) of this section, which deals with discovering and seizing any persons, instruments, articles, or things that may have been used in the commission of or that may constitute evidence of the offense, specific and articulable exigent circumstances are also required to justify and render the search lawful (distinguishing and partially overruling Ulrich). Here, there were simply no exigent circumstances requiring a warrantless search. Hardaway was at the station house, under the full control of the police, with no present means of destroying the blood evidence. Hardaway could have consented to the swab or waited in discomfort until a warrant was obtained, but either way the evidence was going nowhere. Therefore, the swabbing of Hardaway's hands was not a valid search incident to arrest. St. v. Hardaway, 2001 MT 252, 307 M 139, 36 P3d 900 (2001), distinguished in St. v. Madplume, 2007 MT 11, 335 M 290, 150 P3d 956 (2007).

Reasonable Cause for Search of Probationer — Motion to Suppress Evidence of Search Properly Denied: As a condition of a suspended sentence for conviction of felony sale of drugs, Roper consented to warrantless searches of his person, vehicle, or residence. Roper was subsequently granted a conditional discharge from state supervision of his probation because he was serving a concurrent probation as a result of a federal criminal conviction. However, despite the conditional discharge, the state reserved the right to warrantless searches and drug checks during the term of the state probationary sentence, and Roper was relieved only of the requirement to report to the state probation officer monthly. After a few months, the state probation officer became concerned that Roper was both using and selling drugs when two clients reported Roper's continued involvement with drugs. An informant told investigators that Roper stored drugs in a black leather pouch. Based on the gathered information and the close proximity of Roper's workplace to a school, the probation officer believed that reasonable cause existed to search Roper and, with other police officers, went to Roper's workplace and observed him outside involved in what appeared to be a drug transaction. They searched Roper but found no drugs in his possession. The officers went into the workplace and conducted a urinalysis on Roper, which tested positive. While there, the officers noticed a black leather pouch next to Roper's work gloves, seized it, and discovered methamphetamine. Roper was arrested, and the officers went to his house where additional drug evidence was discovered and seized. Roper moved to suppress all the evidence found at both his workplace and residence, contending that the probation officer did not have the right to perform any type of warrantless search and that the evidence seized at the residence was the result of the illegal search of the workplace. The motion was denied, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The probation officer's authority to conduct warrantless searches was extended by the waiver of privacy to which Roper agreed as a condition of probation. The officers were lawfully at Roper's workplace because they had authority to request a urinalysis and to search Roper's person, and the seizure of the black pouch was proper based on the plain view doctrine and information that the pouch was where Roper kept drugs. Further, because the evidence at the workplace was lawfully gathered, the District Court did not err when it denied the motion to suppress evidence gathered during the subsequent search of Roper's home. St. v. Roper, 2001 MT 96, 305 M 212, 26 P3d 741 (2001).

Random Recovery and Examination of Items Not Allowed Pursuant to Stop and Frisk — Premise of Plain Feel Doctrine: Heath was charged with possession of drugs and drug paraphernalia discovered during a warrantless pat-down search for weapons conducted during a stop and frisk. Heath moved for suppression of the evidence on grounds that a small leather coin purse and a 2-inch glass pipe could not reasonably have been mistaken for weapons, but the motion was denied. The state contended that the pat down was permissible and that the drug evidence found during the search was lawfully seized under the plain feel doctrine. Pursuant to St. v. Stubbs, 270 M 364, 892 P2d 547, 52 St. Rep. 232 (1995), the state must satisfy two criteria for a stop and frisk to be valid at its inception: (1) the officer must have objective data from which an experienced officer can make certain inferences; and (2) the officer must have a resulting suspicion that the occupant of a vehicle was engaged in wrongdoing or was a witness to criminal activity. The frisk is to search for potential weapons, and the officer must suspect an object to be a weapon, or if the officer detects other contraband during the pat down for weapons, its incriminating character must be immediately apparent. The District Court determined that the small leather coin purse could not be mistaken for a weapon, but nevertheless concluded that it could have contained a weapon. However, that conclusion exceeded the permissible scope of a pat-down search, and the Supreme Court found no justification in removing the coin purse on the blanket assumption that it could contain a weapon. The court also found no basis for concluding that the glass pipe's incriminating nature was immediately apparent, and thus there was no basis for invoking the plain feel doctrine. An officer cannot randomly recover items from a suspect's clothing and proceed to examine them pursuant to a stop and frisk and then, after the fact, argue that the objects might have contained a weapon or were immediately apparent as contraband. Here, the warrantless search was per se unreasonable, and the state failed to prove that the search came within the reasonable scope of a stop and frisk. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court's denial of Heath's motion to suppress and remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Heath, 2000 MT 94, 299 M 230, 999 P2d 324, 57 St. Rep. 387 (2000), distinguishing St. v. Lamere, 226 M 323, 735 P2d 511 (1987).

Standing of Vehicle Passenger to Challenge Legality of Warrantless Search of Vehicle — Consent to Vehicle Search Extended to Closed Items in Vehicle: Parker was a passenger in a vehicle that was searched after the driver consented to a warrantless search. Parker's fanny pack was opened as part of the search, and suspected drug paraphernalia was found. Parker moved to suppress the evidence. The District Court determined that Parker lacked standing to challenge the search. Applying St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), the Supreme Court disagreed, noting that when the charge against the defendant includes an allegation of a possessory interest in the property that is seized, the defendant has standing to object to the prosecutorial use of that evidence, based on either the unlawful search of the location where it was found or its unlawful seizure. However, the District Court did not err in denying the motion to suppress evidence seized during the search of the vehicle in this case because the officer could have reasonably believed that the driver's consent to search the vehicle extended to closed items in the vehicle. St. v. Parker, 1998 MT 6, 287 M 151, 953 P2d 692, 55 St. Rep. 16 (1998), following Fla. v. Jimeno, 500 US 248, 114 L Ed 2d 297, 111 S Ct 1801 (1991), and St. v. Rushton, 264 M 248, 870 P2d 1355 (1994), and followed in St. v. Wetzel, 2005 MT 154, 327 M 413, 114 P3d 269 (2005).

Evidence Taken From Purse Following Arrest Should Be Suppressed: Graham, a passenger in a car of which the driver was arrested, was arrested for outstanding warrants. The vehicle was to be retrieved by a neighbor, and Graham asked that her purse be left in the vehicle. Police brought the purse to the station where it was searched without a warrant and drugs were found. The District Court denied the motion to suppress the evidence. The Supreme Court held that none of the reasons for a warrantless search within the arrestee's immediate presence, as set forth in this section, are applicable in this case. The District Court erred in denying the motion to suppress. St. v. Graham, 271 M 510, 898 P2d 1206, 52 St. Rep. 541 (1995).

Plain View Doctrine Justifying Seizure of Contraband Pipe During Stop and Frisk Search for Weapons: After Stubbs was stopped on a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity, including speeding, reckless or careless driving, and eluding a peace officer, the officer noticed numerous weapons in the vehicle, providing a reasonable justification for searching Stubbs on the scene. During a pat-down search of Stubbs' clothing, the officer thought that a lump in Stubbs' pocket might be a deadly weapon. After removing the item to make sure that it was not a weapon, the item was in plain view and the incriminating character of the object, a brass pipe, was apparent. Absent any indication that the search was used as a pretext to discover illicit drugs or paraphernalia, the discovery of the pipe was inadvertent and seizure of the contraband was justified. St. v. Stubbs, 270 M 364, 892 P2d 547, 52 St. Rep. 232 (1995), overruled in part in St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996).

Application of Inadvertent Discovery Rule: The cautious actions of law enforcement officials in seeking to protect the validity of a search warrant should not invalidate the inadvertent seizure of evidence or contraband when the officers conducting the search adhere to the intent contained in the warrant. St. v. Hembd, 235 M 361, 767 P2d 864, 46 St. Rep. 55 (1989), following U.S. v. $10,000 in U.S. Currency, 780 F2d 213 (2nd Cir. 1986). St. v. Hembd was overruled in part in St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996).

Elements of Intimidation Present in Threat to Third Party — Probable Cause for Search: Defendant intimidated victims by pointing a gun at them in his car. Defendant also indicated the presence of another weapon in the trunk of the car and indicated his intention to use it to harm a third party. Victims viewed a second gun in the trunk but were not directly threatened with it. The District Court suppressed evidence found in the trunk after finding a sufficient nexus did not exist for probable cause because defendant gave no indication he intended to use the gun in the trunk to intimidate victims and because the second gun was not alleged to be contraband. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that defendant produced a fear in the victims that he intended and had the ability to harm the third party, constituting intimidation, and that viewing of the gun in the trunk established sufficient probability to authorize a search of the trunk. St. v. Hembd, 235 M 361, 767 P2d 864, 46 St. Rep. 55 (1989).

Area Within Immediate Presence or Control of Arrestee: The small confines of a trailer home bedroom and occupant's resistance to arrest dictate that the evidence seized from the bedroom was within the immediate presence or control of the occupant. Arresting officers were authorized to seize a rifle, knife, and other items without a warrant to protect themselves and to preserve evidence. St. v. Hammer, 233 M 101, 759 P2d 979, 45 St. Rep. 1326 (1988).

Officers Not Subject to Harm: Construing "area within such person's immediate presence" to mean the area from within which he might gain possession of a weapon or destructible evidence, the evidence seized from a car in this case was clearly beyond the permissible scope of a search incident to a lawful arrest. Defendants had been removed from their vehicles at gunpoint, told to lie face down on the ground, placed under arrest, given a pat-down search, and handcuffed. There was no conceivable way that any of them could have harmed the officers or gained possession of any evidence inside the car. St. v. Cripps, 177 M 410, 582 P2d 312 (1978).

Search Preceding Arrest: A search incident to a lawful arrest is not rendered illegal simply because it precedes rather than follows the arrest. This rule is subject to three limitations: (1) the officer must have been able to effect a lawful arrest at the time of making the search; (2) the actual arrest must be made substantially contemporaneously with the search; and (3) the search must satisfy the permissible scope and purposes of a search incident to a lawful arrest. St. v. Meadors, 177 M 100, 580 P2d 903 (1978).

Inventory Search — Not Justified: Contraband found under a seat during an inventory of an automobile held in police custody was not in plain view, thus it was seized in violation of individual privacy and freedom from unreasonable searches. The inventory search was not justified by protection of the contents for the owner's benefit or protection of the police from claims for lost property beyond articles in plain view from outside the vehicle. St. v. Sawyer, 174 M 512, 571 P2d 1131 (1977), distinguished in St. v. Pastos, 269 M 43, 887 P2d 199, 51 St. Rep. 1441 (1994).

LAWFUL ARREST

Particularized Suspicion to Support Canine Sniff of Vehicle and Probable Cause for Warrant to Search Vehicle: Following arrest on outstanding warrants, a dog alerted on Stombaugh's vehicle, a warrant was obtained, and a drug search was conducted. Stombaugh contended that fruits of the search should have been suppressed because officers lacked particularized suspicion to conduct the canine sniff and lacked probable cause to obtain a warrant to search the vehicle. The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed. Based on the facts that Stombaugh's family reported to police regarding Stombaugh's drug use and notified officers that Stombaugh would be visiting the family's home, Stombaugh's admission of pending drug charges in Washington and police confirmation of the pending felony drug charges, Stombaugh's urgency in seeking removal of the vehicle out of the county and an unusual desire to pay more than the vehicle was worth to do so, and discovery of a white pill on the vehicle dashboard and Stombaugh's evasiveness about the pill, the District Court did not err in holding that officers had particularized suspicion to conduct the canine sniff of the vehicle. In addition to the factors considered for particularized suspicion (except the white pill), the warrant application also described the alert of the drug dog on the vehicle, Stombaugh's admission that the vehicle contained drug paraphernalia, and the officers' experience and qualifications with regard to drug crime investigation. Under the totality of the circumstances, the District Court correctly concluded that probable cause existed for issuance of the search warrant. St. v. Stombaugh, 2007 MT 105, 337 M 147, 157 P3d 1137 (2007).

Search of Person for Weapons Incident to Lawful Arrest and Prior to Transport Not Unconstitutional — When Showing of Exigent Circumstances Required: While officers were executing a warrant at a Missoula residence, Cooney arrived and requested entry to retrieve his son who was a guest at the residence. Officers requested Cooney's identification before allowing entry and ran a routine check on Cooney for outstanding warrants. The officers discovered an outstanding warrant for Cooney on a traffic offense and placed Cooney under arrest. A pat-down search revealed that Cooney possessed a pipe and a small bag of marijuana. The officers requested a patrol officer to transport Cooney to Municipal Court. Upon transferring custody of Cooney to the patrol officer, the arresting officers indicated that their initial search had not been thorough, so the patrol officer conducted another pat-down search of Cooney before transport to ensure that Cooney had no hidden weapons. The patrol officer felt an object in Cooney's pocket that might have been a weapon, removed the object, and discovered that it was another pipe with methamphetamine residue, so Cooney was also charged with felony possession of methamphetamine. Cooney moved to suppress the methamphetamine pipe on grounds that the patrol officer exceeded the scope of search incident to Cooney's arrest and that the pipe was the fruit of an unconstitutional search and seizure, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although warrantless searches are per se unreasonable under Montana law, one exception to the warrant requirement is a search conducted pursuant to a lawful arrest. The law does not require a showing of exigent circumstances when an officer conducts a warrantless search incident to arrest in order to protect the officer from attack, to prevent the person from escaping, or to discover and seize the fruits of the crime, but a showing of exigent circumstances is required if the search is conducted to discover and seize any persons, instruments, articles, or things that may have been used in the commission of or that may constitute evidence of the offense. In this case, the state justified the search as protecting the officer from attack and was therefore required to demonstrate that the search was commensurate with the purpose of preventing Cooney from using any weapon hidden on his person to attack the officer. In this case, the search was commensurate because the patrol officer presented substantial evidence of a reasonable belief that the object in Cooney's pocket might have been a weapon, and the patrol officer was not required to trust his personal safety to a perfunctory search performed by other officers who indicated that the initial search was insufficient to ensure the safe transport of a prisoner. St. v. Cooney, 2006 MT 318, 335 M 55, 149 P3d 554 (2006), followed in St. v. Whisler, 2008 MT 276, 345 M 292, 190 P3d 1098 (2008).

Search of Person Distinguished From Search of Possessions — Reduced Expectation of Privacy: The Supreme Court, citing U.S. v. Monclavo-Cruz, 662 F2d 1285 (9th Cir. 1981), distinguished between searches of person and searches of possessions, holding that once a person is lawfully seized and arrested, the reasonable expectation of privacy is diminished as to a routine search of open personal property seized prior to incarceration since the state has a compelling interest in protecting prisoners from potential danger. Helena v. Lamping, 221 M 370, 719 P2d 1245, 43 St. Rep. 901 (1986), followed in St. v. Lamere, 226 M 323, 735 P2d 511, 44 St. Rep. 690 (1987). See also Colorado v. Bertine, 479 US 367, 93 L Ed 2d 739, 107 S Ct 738 (1987).

Apprehension of Felony Suspects — Compelling State Interest: Defendant issued 13 bad checks totaling $231.76 between July 17, 1981, and October 30, 1981. On November 23, 1981, a Justice of the Peace issued an arrest warrant on the charge of issuing a bad check. There were no previous efforts to secure defendant's presence to answer the charge or post bond. On December 4, 1981, a Sheriff arrested defendant at his home. During booking, a full search of defendant was conducted and a gram of hashish was discovered. Defendant pleaded guilty to the bad check charge. The District Court granted his motion to suppress the contraband as an invasion of privacy under St. v. Carlson, 198 M 113, 644 P2d 498 (1982). The State appealed, and the Supreme Court vacated and remanded, stating that Carlson was clearly limited to traffic-related misdemeanors. The court held that full custodial arrests supported by a warrant for felonies are proper, and that the apprehension of felony suspects is a compelling state interest which justifies a full custodial arrest pursuant to warrant. The right of privacy must yield to a compelling state interest. St. v. Wood, 205 M 141, 666 P2d 753, 40 St. Rep. 1173 (1983).

Seizure of Evidence in Defendant's Possession and in Plain View:

Because the officers' initial entry into the apartment and the subsequent warrantless arrest were valid, the seizure of the marijuana on the table was also proper under either a "plain view" theory or a seizure incident to a lawful arrest theory. St. v. Allen, 188 M 135, 612 P2d 199 (1980).

The facts and circumstances within the officers' personal knowledge at the time of the defendant's arrest would justify a man of reasonable caution to believe that an offense had been or was being committed, and there was sufficient probable cause to arrest the defendant. Thus, the seizure of a grocery sack in his possession and in plain view was made pursuant to a valid lawful arrest, justifying denial of a motion to suppress this evidence. St. v. Petko, 177 M 229, 581 P2d 425 (1978).

Neutron Activation Test for Gunpowder Residues: The defendant was arrested at the police station without a warrant, and the police administered a neutron activation test to determine if there were gunpowder residues on the defendant's hands. The defendant sought to suppress the results of the test on the grounds that his right to be secure against unreasonable searches and seizures was violated. The Supreme Court held that a search incident to a lawful arrest is an exception to the warrant requirement of the 4th amendment. The administration of a neutron activation test following the defendant's arrest was within the permissible scope of a search incident to a lawful arrest. Once the search incident to arrest is found to be reasonable the State has no further burden to show that the evidence is destructible. St. v. Ulrich, 187 M 347, 609 P2d 1218 (1980).

Marijuana Odor — Probable Cause for Warrantless Arrest and Search: Law enforcement officers had probable cause to believe an offense was being committed in the defendants' residence where, among other things, they smelled marijuana odor coming from the residence, and because of the presence of exigent circumstances, were justified in entering and arresting the defendants and searching the defendants and the premises immediately under their control. Thus, the constitutionality of the warrantless search and seizure condition of parole and probation status was irrelevant. St. v. Means, 177 M 193, 581 P2d 406 (1978).

What May Be Seized: When an arrest is lawfully made, the person arresting may take from the possession of the arrestee articles of property that reasonably would be of use in the trial. State ex rel. Wong You v. District Court, 106 M 347, 78 P2d 353 (1938).

UNLAWFUL ARREST

No Necessity for Arrest — Subtle Coercion for Consent to Enter Home — Subsequent Search Invalid: Defendant was involved in a minor traffic accident that was not his fault. He failed to produce his driver's license. The investigating officer later learned that the license was revoked. The officer made out "Notice to Appear and Complaint" forms for operating a vehicle while driver's license was revoked and for obstructing an officer, both misdemeanors. The officer gave the citations to the City Clerk for mailing to the defendant, but this was never done. A week later, the officer, thinking the citations had been mailed, requested and received an arrest warrant. Two officers went to defendant's house, awakened him, and informed him he was under arrest. Defendant requested he be allowed to get dressed. The officers told defendant they would have to accompany him and observed marijuana and bongs. They obtained a search warrant, returned and searched the house, and found small quantities of drugs and a stolen pistol. Defendant moved to suppress the evidence as obtained through an illegal search. The State contended that full custodial arrest was reasonable, was not connected to any pretextual arrangement that the police suspected defendant as a drug user, and that the search warrant based on the "plain view" observation of the officers in the home was valid. The District Court declined to determine whether the arrest was a pretext but decided there was no necessity for a full custodial arrest and suppressed the evidence. The court held that under the totality of the circumstances, the defendant had not consented to the officers' entry. The validity of the officers' entry into the home is the fulcrum upon which the case turns. The State justified the entry on the claim of defendant's consent. The Supreme Court found that the subjective state of defendant, "half asleep" and in his underwear, and the unqualified statement of the officers that if defendant were to get dressed they would have to come into his house, without any other explanation of his rights, constituted subtle coercion, and the search was unconstitutional. The court found no prior justification or exigency for the entry by the officers. Their entry under the facts of the case was unreasonable, and it is that factor which converted their observation in the house into a warrantless search, which is always presumed unreasonable. This was especially true in light of the requirement of the State to establish a compelling interest in order to overcome defendant's reasonable expectation of privacy in his home. St. v. Carlson, 198 M 113, 644 P2d 498, 39 St. Rep. 802 (1982).

Visual Observation From Place Where Officer Has No Right to Be — Entry Into Home After Arrest: Defendant was involved in a minor traffic accident that was not his fault. He failed to produce his driver's license. The investigating officer later learned that the license was revoked. The officer made out "Notice to Appear and Complaint" forms for operating a vehicle while driver's license was revoked and for obstructing an officer, both misdemeanors. The officer gave the citations to the City Clerk for mailing to the defendant, but this was never done. A week later, the officer, thinking the citations had been mailed, requested and received an arrest warrant. Two officers went to defendant's house, awakened him, and informed him he was under arrest. Defendant requested he be allowed to get dressed. The officers told defendant they would have to accompany him and observed marijuana and bongs. They obtained a search warrant, returned and searched the house, and found small quantities of drugs and a stolen pistol. Defendant moved to suppress the evidence as obtained through an illegal search. The State contended that full custodial arrest was reasonable, was not connected to any pretextual arrangement that the police suspected defendant as a drug user, and that the search warrant based on the "plain view" observation of the officers in the home was valid. The District Court declined to determine whether the arrest was a pretext but decided there was no necessity for a full custodial arrest and suppressed the evidence. The court held that under the totality of the circumstances, the defendant had not consented to the officers' entry. The validity of the officers' entry into the home is the fulcrum upon which this case turns. The Supreme Court held that the distinctive factor which turns an observation into a search, in the constitutional sense, is whether the person making the observation has a right to be in the place where the observation is made. Evidence discovered in plain view from a place where officers are entitled to stand and where their claim to stand is not created as a pretext, solely to make legitimate otherwise impermissible intrusions, is not the subject of a "search". The court held that consent to enter the house was coerced and therefore the observations were a search and evidence seized was properly suppressed. St. v. Carlson, 198 M 113, 644 P2d 498, 39 St. Rep. 802 (1982).

Evidence Suppressed — Lack of Probable Cause: Evidence obtained when officers stopped a vehicle on the pretext of a traffic violation and arrested the defendant without probable cause was properly suppressed. Suspicion of an officer alone, unsubstantiated by some evidence upon which to base a belief that a crime is or has been committed, is not enough to establish probable cause, no matter what the subsequent search discloses. St. v. Rader, 177 M 252, 581 P2d 437 (1978).

Parking Meter Violation — Unlawful Search — Ordinance Unconstitutional: The search of the defendant's person under a warrant of arrest issued by a police magistrate for a parking meter violation was an unreasonable search since evidence at a suppression hearing did not disclose any basis for a mandatory custodial arrest. Furthermore, the city ordinance involved was unconstitutional to the extent that it precluded the defense that the defendant was not driving the vehicle when the parking violation occurred—depriving him of due process. St. v. Jetty, 176 M 519, 579 P2d 1228 (1978).

This section attempts to limit suppression of evidence to cases in which substantial rights have been infringed. It also attempts to codify the rule of State v. Nelson, 130 Mont. 466, pertaining to disclaimers and establishes a definite rule on the question of whether a defendant may plead the infringement of rights of a person other than himself as a ground for suppressing evidence.

No Privacy Interest in Rental Car by Unauthorized Driver Who Disavows Ownership of Contents: Hill was stopped for speeding and ticketed. After the stop was completed, the officer engaged Hill in small talk, inquiring where Hill was going and where his traveling clothes were. Hill replied that it was a quick trip, so no extra clothes were needed. Although no bags or clothes were in sight, the officer asked if Hill was carrying anything illegal. Hill said no, and the officer asked if Hill would consent to a search of the vehicle, to which Hill initially consented. In going over the terms of the consent form, Hill related that the car had been rented by a friend and that a search of the trunk was probably not a good idea because Hill did not know what the friend might have placed there. The officer then checked on the origin of the car and discovered that it had been acquired through a rental agency, but that the car was 2 days late in being returned, and that Hill was not an authorized driver. The agency asked that the car be impounded and gave permission for a search. The officers found two bags in the trunk, but Hill disclaimed ownership of the bags. A search of the bags revealed drugs and Hill's cell phone charger. Hill was then charged with drug crimes and later moved to suppress the evidence, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Hill had no reasonable expectation of privacy in the car's contents because he was not an authorized driver, had no relation to the car's owner or renter, and voluntarily disclaimed knowledge and ownership of anything in the car. Hill could not expect privacy in a car he illegally possessed, and once Hill waived control over the bags, he implicitly granted permission for the bags to be accessed. The search of the trunk was reasonable because permission was granted by the car owner, and the trunk contents were effectively surrendered by Hill, making the car owner's permission to search the vehicle sufficient to permit a full search of items found in the car. St. v. Hill, 2004 MT 184, 322 M 165, 94 P3d 752 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Elison, 2000 MT 288, 302 M 228, 14 P3d 456 (2000), and St. v. Tackitt, 2003 MT 81, 315 M 59, 67 P3d 295 (2003).

Abandonment As Waiver of Right to Object: The Dumas Hotel in Butte was robbed. The police were notified, and an investigation was begun. Police officers observed LaMere's residence for 3 days, observing no activity. They contacted the landlord, who invited an officer to enter the apartment. The apartment appeared abandoned. Later that day the landlord signed a consent to search. During the search, police found what appeared to be a map of the Dumas Hotel and a piece of pantyhose that was apparently part of a mask. LaMere contended that the entry to the apartment was illegal because no exigent circumstances existed which excused the lack of a warrant. He also contended that the requirement of filing an inventory and delivering a copy to the person from whose premises property was taken was not complied with. The Supreme Court held that because LaMere had abandoned the apartment he had disclaimed any right to object to the place being searched. On abandonment the landlord was in possession and had authority to consent to the search. There is no statutory requirement that items seized under a consent search be inventoried and reported to a magistrate. St. v. Madera, 206 M 140, 670 P2d 552, 40 St. Rep. 1558 (1983).

Scope and Validity of Disclaimer of Ownership — Automobile: The defendant had standing to contest the validity of a search of his automobile that resulted in the seizure of closed opaque bags of marijuana contained in the trunk even though, while under custodial interrogation, he had disclaimed ownership of the automobile. The disclaimer clause of this section must be interpreted in light of the fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination. The disclaimer in this instance was not valid because it was given in the coercive atmosphere of custodial interrogation. Even if the disclaimer had been valid for the automobile, it would not necessarily operate as a disclaimer of closed containers in the automobile. St. v. Isom, 196 M 330, 641 P2d 417, 39 St. Rep. 137 (1982).

Disclaimer — Evidence Admitted: Evidence discovered during a search of the house occupied by the defendant's mother was properly admitted on a charge of burglary since the defendant disclaimed any interest in the property recovered from the search and had no possessory interest in his mother's home. St. v. Dess, 154 M 231, 462 P2d 186 (1969).

Disclaimer — Evidence Suppressed: Suppression of evidence found in the car in which the defendant was riding at the time of arrest was not error when the vehicle belonged to the defendant's companion and the defendant disclaimed any ownership or right to possession of it or any of the property taken from it. St. v. Nelson, 130 M 466, 304 P2d 1110 (1956).

NO RIGHT OF DEFENDANT INFRINGED

Seized Property Abandoned by Owner in Lawful Possession of State for Purposes Other Than Forfeiture — Subsequent Petition for Forfeiture Not Precluded: After Branam's vehicle was stopped by an officer following a report of an assault, Branam fled. The officer had the vehicle towed to a storage yard. An employee of the storage yard noticed cash and a weapon in the vehicle. A search of the vehicle yielded cash, a weapon, and drug paraphernalia, and a canine alerted to the smell of drugs on the cash but not on the vehicle. Branam was not charged with a drug-related offense, but numerous confidential informants stated that the vehicle had been used in drug transactions. The state petitioned for forfeiture of the property. Branam moved to dismiss the petition on grounds that the state did not have probable cause to seize the property. The District Court agreed and summarily dismissed the petition, and the state appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Property is subject to forfeiture to the state if it is or has been used in connection with the manufacture, distribution, or sale of dangerous drugs, and property may be seized for the purpose of declaring it forfeit to the state if an officer has probable cause to believe that a conveyance has been or is intended to be used to unlawfully transport, keep, deposit, or conceal a controlled substance. Probable cause is required at the time of seizure if the state seizes property without a warrant solely for purposes of forfeiture. However, if property is lawfully seized for purposes other than forfeiture, nothing in 44-12-103 precludes a later petition for forfeiture when an investigation develops probable cause to believe that the property is subject to forfeiture. Search and seizure without a warrant may not be held illegal if a defendant has disclaimed any right or interest in the place or object searched or the evidence or contraband seized or if a right of the defendant has not been infringed by the search and seizure. Here, Branam's act of fleeing and leaving the vehicle and its contents on the street constituted abandonment sufficient to justify having the vehicle towed, and the warrantless discovery of the cash and weapon by the towing company employee did not infringe on Branam's right of privacy. Probable cause to seize property exists when an officer's knowledge is sufficient to warrant a reasonable person to believe that an offense has been committed, and when a vehicle is stopped and the occupants of the vehicle immediately flee, suspicions of an offense connected to the vehicle arise. Thus, when the officer took possession of the vehicle, sufficient probable cause existed to cause seizure of the property and allow further investigation. Additionally, nothing required that Branam be charged with a criminal offense to allow forfeiture of the property. St. v. Branam, 2006 MT 300, 334 M 457, 148 P3d 635 (2006).

Assistance for Search: Defendant signed a consent form for the search of his home. The consent form authorized the deputy to search. The Supreme Court, citing St. v. Yoss, 146 M 508, 409 P2d 452 (1965), held that the consent neither expressly nor by implication prohibited the deputy from obtaining the assistance of burglary victims in the search. St. v. Rodgers, 257 M 413, 849 P2d 1028, 50 St. Rep. 335 (1993).

Privacy Section of Montana Constitution — Contemplates Invasion Only by State Action: Sheriff's officers, armed with a search warrant, gained entrance to the defendants' rented house after their landlord, who was trespassing at the time, discovered a large number of marijuana plants growing there and reported his discovery to the Sheriff. The narrow issue on appeal was whether the fruits of a search conducted by a private citizen, without any type of governmental involvement, are properly the subject of exclusion. The Supreme Court overruled the well-established line of cases, holding that private searches invade privacy rights protected by the privacy section of the Montana Constitution. The Supreme Court held that the privacy section of the constitution contemplates privacy invasion only by state action. Unless specifically provided otherwise, citizens' rights articulated in the constitution proscribe only state action. Therefore, if a private citizen, such as the landlord in this case, invades the privacy of another citizen, there is no violation of the constitution. The exclusionary rule is a rule of court procedure to deny admission of the fruits of illegally seized evidence to deter unlawful police activities and to preserve the integrity of the judiciary. In this case, judicial integrity does not require exclusion of the evidence. St. v. Long, 216 M 65, 700 P2d 153, 42 St. Rep. 643 (1985), followed in St. v. Malkuch, 2007 MT 60, 336 M 219, 154 P3d 558 (2007).

No Warrantless Search Where Defendant Hands Over Murder Weapon: Where defendant was asked by police officers if a knife was involved in an altercation in which police officers were informed that defendant participated, and defendant answered "yes" and handed the knife to the police, no search by the police was involved and thus no warrantless search and seizure without consent was involved which would justify suppression of the knife. St. v. Graves, 191 M 81, 622 P2d 203, 38 St. Rep. 9 (1981), followed in St. v. Arthun, 274 M 82, 906 P2d 216, 52 St. Rep. 1133 (1995).

Standing to Challenge Constitutional Violations: The rule in Montana is that a defendant does not have standing to challenge violations of the constitutional rights of a codefendant or third party by law enforcement authorities. Furthermore, codefendant's consent to a search made it a lawful search. St. v. Coleman, 177 M 1, 579 P2d 732 (1978).

"Open Fields" Doctrine: Marijuana plants discovered in an old corral on unrestricted property were in an area not constitutionally protected from unreasonable search and seizure because of Montana's recognition of the "open fields" doctrine. St. v. Charvat, 175 M 267, 573 P2d 660 (1978).

SUBSTANTIAL RIGHTS NOT PREJUDICED

Search Warrant Procedural Irregularity Not Affecting Defendant's Substantial Rights: Defendant contended that because of a procedural error on the part of investigating officers who were executing a search warrant, the District Court erred when it did not suppress the seized evidence. The error was detected and corrected within 24 hours. An error in the manner in which notice of seized articles is given is an irregularity in the proceedings that does not affect the substantial rights of the accused and thus does not constitute reversible error. The corrected receipt effectively gave defendant notice of seized items. St. v. Abe, 1998 MT 206, 290 M 393, 965 P2d 882, 55 St. Rep. 876 (1998).

Failure to Fill in Name of Officer Obtaining Warrant Not Grounds for Suppression of Evidence: The defendant appealed his conviction on the basis that the evidence obtained under a search warrant should have been suppressed because the space for the name of the officer applying for the warrant had been left blank in the heading of the warrant. The Supreme Court held that the omission did not substantially affect the defendant's rights and that to suppress evidence when the officer applied for the warrant, served the warrant, and executed the return of service for the warrant would be an irrational result. The Supreme Court also indicated that the requirement that the officer be named presumes that the officer will have knowledge of the area to be searched and is therefore more than a formality and that the nonconformity must be carefully examined to see if the interests of the defendant have been compromised. St. v. Pipkin, 1998 MT 143, 289 M 240, 961 P2d 733, 55 St. Rep. 567 (1998).

No Prejudice Suffered Through Typographical Error on Warrant: Defendant claimed that because a search warrant was dated June 19, 1991, but was executed on June 18, 1991, the warrant was invalid and law enforcement was without authority to execute the warrant. However, the discrepancy between the dates was adequately explained by the state and was merely technical; thus, the defendant's substantial rights were not affected or prejudiced through the typographical error. St. v. Steffes, 269 M 214, 887 P2d 1196, 51 St. Rep. 1463 (1994).

Failure to Display and Leave Copy of Warrant: The defendant claimed that the evidence against him should be excluded because the arresting officers did not display the search warrant upon entering his house nor did they leave a copy of the warrant. The Supreme Court, relying on Illinois precedent, held that the requirements that the warrant be displayed and a copy left on the premises were ministerial only and that the failure to comply with these requirements did not void an otherwise valid search. St. v. Chatriand, 243 M 375, 792 P2d 1107, 47 St. Rep. 1062 (1990).

Failure to Make Return: The defendant failed to demonstrate any prejudice to his substantial rights by an officer's failure to make a return of an item of evidence; therefore, it was not rendered inadmissible. St. v. Lenon, 174 M 264, 570 P2d 901 (1977).

Retention of Property — Mere Technical Error: When clothes were taken from the defendant incident to a lawful arrest, the retention of the property by the police upon the release of the defendant was a mere technical error which did not compel suppression of the evidence by means of a Writ of Supervisory Control. State ex rel. Mankin v. Wilson, 174 M 195, 569 P2d 922 (1977).

Fatally Defective Warrant: A search warrant erroneously directed to the judge and naming no particular peace officer to serve it was fatally defective, and the defect was not a technical mistake cured by this section. State ex rel. Stief v. District Court, 168 M 87, 540 P2d 968 (1975).

Notice of Origin of Warrant: Prejudicial error was found when a City Court Judge issued a warrant containing a District Court title (with supporting documents containing the title also). The petition for warrant did not supply notice to the subject of the warrant concerning its origin and to whom he could address his grievances. St. v. Tropf, 166 M 79, 530 P2d 1158 (1975).

ADMISSIBILITY IN OTHER PROCEEDINGS

Reasonable Relationship Between Items Seized and Motive for Crimes Charged — Scope of Warrant Not Exceeded: Bar-Jonah was charged with impersonating a police officer and carrying a stun gun. During a search of Bar-Jonah's residence, police seized cameras, photo albums, film negatives, and various other items that Bar-Jonah contended were not related to the charges in the search warrant. Bar-Jonah's motion to suppress the items was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Relying on U.S. v. Clark, 31 F3d 831 (9th Cir. 1994), Bar-Jonah contended that allowing the seizure of fruits and instrumentalities of the offense was overbroad; however, in St. v. Quigg, 155 M 119, 467 P2d 692 (1970), the Supreme Court held that items may be seized if there is a reasonable relationship between the items and the motive for the charged crime and that it is sufficient to establish a fair probability that items sought in a warrant application are connected to that crime. In this case, based on all the facts and circumstances, the items were reasonably related to the criminal behavior enumerated in the warrant application and to Bar-Jonah's motive for impersonating a police officer and carrying a stun gun. Additionally, under Andresen v. Md., 427 US 463 (1976), the fact that items seized may later be used to form an evidentiary basis of another charge does not require suppression of the evidence. St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

Use of DNA Sample From Unrelated Investigation Not Violative of Right to Privacy — Waiver of Privacy Upon Consent to Particular Search: Notti contended that the use of a DNA profile from an unrelated sexual assault case, in which he was convicted, violated the right to privacy on a subsequent charge of deliberate homicide. The argument failed because Notti had consented to the withdrawal of a blood sample to be used for DNA testing, and a defendant's voluntary consent to a search constitutes waiver of any reasonable expectation of privacy with respect to the place searched (or blood or DNA), and the permitted search is lawful. St. v. Notti, 2003 MT 170, 316 M 345, 71 P3d 1233 (2003). See also St. v. Rodgers, 257 M 413, 849 P2d 1028 (1993).

Inventory Search Incident to a Lawful Arrest: Armstrong was arrested for shoplifting. Shoplifting is a misdemeanor for which bail bond schedules are established in Yellowstone County. The arresting officer however refused to accept the scheduled bond because he knew that Armstrong was a major suspect in the Lords homicide. During an inventory search of Armstrong after his arrest, a $100 bill was found which connected Armstrong to the Lords homicide. Armstrong argues that the police should have released him on bail and therefore the inventory search was illegal and the evidence should be suppressed. The court said that under the circumstances the police not only had the right to refuse the bail bond, but they had a duty to detain him. The arrest was lawful and the inventory search was incident to a lawful arrest. Since the $100 bill was lawfully seized, it is admissible in the homicide trial. St. v. Armstrong, 189 M 407, 616 P2d 341 (1980).

Admissibility of Suppressed Evidence in Proceedings Other Than Trial: Evidence of drugs seized in a search conducted under a defective warrant, although not admissible in any prosecution for possession of the drugs, may properly be considered in revoking a previously deferred sentence. St. v. Thorsness, 165 M 321, 528 P2d 692 (1974).

Part 2
Search Warrants

Part Case Notes

Franks Hearing Not Warranted Absent Showing of Misstatements or Omissions in Search Warrant: Defendant moved to suppress all items seized under an allegedly insufficient search warrant or alternatively for an evidentiary hearing pursuant to Franks v. Del., 438 US 154, 57 L Ed 2d 667, 98 S Ct 2674 (1978), to establish claims of omission and misstatements of material fact contained in the search warrant application. The motion to suppress was denied. In a supplemental order, the District Court found that the application contained no deliberate falsehoods or material omissions that would require excising that information from the application for determination of probable cause pursuant to Franks. Upon review, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that defendant's arguments of alleged omissions and misstatements, including the fact that the primary informant was a convicted felon and was paid for his tip, did not justify a Franks hearing. St. v. Garberding, 245 M 356, 801 P2d 583, 47 St. Rep. 2157 (1990), followed in St. v. Adams, 284 M 25, 943 P2d 955, 54 St. Rep. 717 (1997).

Same Officer Applying for and Serving Warrant — "Sanford" Inapplicable: Defendant claimed the undersheriff rather than a detective should have sworn to the information in a warrant application, and therefore evidence should be suppressed under State ex rel. Sanford v. District Court, 170 M 196, 551 P2d 1005 (1976). However, Sanford did not apply when the same officer applied for, was named in, and served the warrant. The mandate that a warrant be directed to a particular officer accords with the requirement that the warrant be served by one of the officers mentioned in its direction. St. v. Seaman, 236 M 466, 771 P2d 950, 46 St. Rep. 512 (1989).

Inaccuracies in Application Not to Defeat Warrant When Probable Cause Established: Defendant contended that inaccuracies in an affidavit filed in support of a request for a search warrant rendered reliance on it void as a matter of law. Although the Supreme Court does not condone the presence of inaccuracies in search warrant applications, in this case, after excising the inaccurate portions of the statements, the affidavit still established sufficient probable cause to issue the warrant. St. v. Hembd, 235 M 361, 767 P2d 864, 46 St. Rep. 55 (1989). See also Franks v. Del., 438 US 154, 57 L Ed 2d 667, 98 S Ct 2674 (1977).

Application and Search Warrant in Combination Describing Thing to Be Seized — Same Officer Applying for and Serving Warrant: A search warrant, standing alone, would be invalid for its failure to particularly describe the thing to be seized, which thing was described only in the application for the search warrant. The application and the warrant when read in combination adequately described the thing to be seized. If the warrant had been directed to an officer other than the officer who made and signed the application, it would have been invalid; however, in this case the same officer signed the application, served the warrant, and seized the contraband. The District Court properly denied defendant's motion to suppress even though the warrant was constitutionally defective. St. v. Peterson, 227 M 503, 741 P2d 392, 44 St. Rep. 1268 (1987), followed in St. v. Broell, 249 M 117, 814 P2d 44, 48 St. Rep. 605 (1991), and St. v. Pipkin, 1998 MT 143, 289 M 240, 961 P2d 733, 55 St. Rep. 567 (1998).

Electronic Surveillance of Suspect — Place to Be Searched: An informant was fitted with an electronic device authorized by court order to monitor the conversations in a drug buy from a named individual, but the order did not contain a specific location to be searched under the provisions of 46-5-201 (now repealed). The Supreme Court held that the geographic location of an electronic surveillance of a particular person is tied to the whereabouts of the suspect. The phrase in 46-5-201 (now repealed) describing what may be searched ("the thing, place, or person") is disjunctive; thus, the person whose conversation is to be overheard when named in the surveillance order is sufficiently precise to meet constitutional requirements. St. v. Coleman, 189 M 492, 616 P2d 1090, 37 St. Rep. 1661 (1980).

Equity of Retroactive Application — Hurdle Not Made: Armstrong sought to suppress evidence obtained in two searches. To suppress the evidence, the court would have to retroactively apply State ex rel. Sanford v. District Court, 170 M 196, 551 P2d 1005 (1976), which invalidated search warrants directed to "any police officer in this state". There is a three-part test to determine whether a decision should be applied retroactively. The third part of the three-part test to determine whether to apply a rule retroactively requires the court to consider the equity of retroactive application. Armstrong fails to make the third hurdle. The Sanford rule is intended to support and improve the integrity of the factfinding process. Retroactive application in this case would exclude relevant and reliable evidence. In addition, both the court issuing the search warrants and the police are entitled to rely on the rule in effect at the time the warrants were issued. The court declined to apply the Sanford rule retroactively. St. v. Armstrong, 189 M 407, 616 P2d 341 (1980).

Specificity of Warrant: All that was needed to meet the requirements of specificity was that an officer with reasonable effort could ascertain the auto intended to be searched and its owner, if possible. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

To Whom Warrant Directed:

Having previously disapproved the practice of directing search warrants "to any peace officer of this state", the court ordered the suppression of evidence seized under such a warrant in the present case. State ex rel. Sanford v. District Court, 170 M 196, 551 P2d 1005 (1976). See also St. v. Meidinger, 160 M 310, 502 P2d 58 (1972); St. v. Snider, 168 M 220, 541 P2d 1204 (1975).

When the same officer applied for the warrant and executed it, the fact that it was directed "to any peace officer of this State" was not a fatal defect since no prejudice resulted to the defendant; but the court again condemned the practice of issuing search warrants to any peace officer. St. v. Snider, 168 M 220, 541 P2d 1204 (1975).

A search warrant erroneously directed to the judge was defective since the judge is not a peace officer. State ex rel. Stief v. District Court, 168 M 87, 540 P2d 968 (1975).

A search warrant directed to "any peace officer of this state" was a valid warrant. St. v. Meidinger, 160 M 310, 502 P2d 58 (1972).

Notice of Origin of Warrant: Prejudicial error was found when a City Court Judge issued a warrant containing a District Court title (with supporting documents containing the title also). The petition for warrant did not supply notice to the subject of the warrant concerning its origin and to whom he could address his grievances. St. v. Tropf, 166 M 79, 530 P2d 1158 (1975).

Description of Place and Property:

Search warrants stating the street address of the house to be searched contained a sufficient description of the premises. St. v. Paschke, 165 M 231, 527 P2d 569 (1974).

A warrant which directed law enforcement personnel to search a certain described vehicle sufficiently described the object of the search. St. v. Meidinger, 160 M 310, 502 P2d 58 (1972), distinguished in St. v. Ballew, 163 M 257, 516 P2d 1159 (1973).

A search warrant must be complete in itself as to the description of the premises to be searched. State ex rel. King v. District Court, 70 M 191, 224 P 862 (1924).

When probable cause for issuance of a search warrant was shown, disclosing the time, place, and manner of an alleged violation of the liquor law, the warrant could validly issue, notwithstanding that the complaint did not set forth the time of commission of offense. St. v. Tesla, 69 M 503, 223 P 107 (1924).

General Warrant:

Search warrant which described the premises to be searched as "two cabins located near the Duck Creek 'Y', near West Yellowstone, Montana, near the office building at Koelzer's Duck Creek cabins" was of insufficient particularity where there were three cabins in the area of the office building and where police had good reason to believe that only one of the houses contained controlled substances. St. v. Ballew, 163 M 257, 516 P2d 1159 (1973), distinguished in St. v. Cope, 250 M 387, 819 P2d 1280, 48 St. Rep. 949 (1991).

Search warrants which incorporated the phrase "any .22 caliber pistol" and "any other property or evidence they might discover that may connect to the demise" of deceased was not a "general warrant", and therefore was not constitutionally invalid. St. v. Quigg, 155 M 119, 467 P2d 692 (1970), distinguished in St. v. Nanoff, 160 M 344, 502 P2d 1138 (1972).

Actions Which Do Not Lie Against Officer: Claim and delivery does not lie against Sheriff on theory of wrongful and negligent loss of possession; conversion does not lie where no facts are alleged that he instigated or assisted in the alleged wrongful taking; trespass and trespass on the case do not lie unless the injury is "proximate result" of Sheriff's wrongful or negligent acts or defaults. Harri v. Isaac, 111 M 152, 107 P2d 137 (1940).

Nature of Proceeding: The issuance of a search warrant by the District Court is a judicial proceeding. St. v. Tesla, 69 M 503, 223 P 107 (1924).

Compiler's Comments

1997 Amendment: Chapter 12 in (2)(a) substituted "administrative head, or the administrative head's designee, of the investigating agency" for "chief law enforcement officer"; in (2)(c), after "pawnbroker", inserted "or dealer"; and made minor changes in style.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 310 at end of first sentence in (1) substituted "upon issuance of an administrative warrant by a peace officer" for "unless demanded by a peace officer", at beginning of second sentence inserted "Following expiration of the 30-day period", and inserted last sentence authorizing pawnbroker or dealer to appeal validity of warrant in Justice Court or Municipal Court during 30-day period; inserted (2) defining administrative warrant; and made minor changes in style.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 344 near end of first sentence, after "30 days", inserted "unless demanded by a peace officer and, upon demand" and at end deleted "upon service of a search warrant by a peace officer pursuant to 31-1-401 through 31-1-406" and inserted second sentence requiring a receipt for surrendered property; and made minor changes in style.

46-5-220. Authority to issue search warrant.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an adaptation of the federal rule that specifically addresses who may issue and request a search warrant. See Rule 41(a), Fed. R. Crim. P. (1986). Montana's 1987 code authorized any judge to issue a warrant without limitation and also permitted any person to apply for a warrant. See 1987 MCA 46-5-202(1). This statute changes the 1987 code in two ways.

First, the statute limits those persons who may request a search warrant to the City or County Attorney, the Attorney General, or any peace officer. The 1987 code that allowed any person to request a search warrant was considered too broad. The limitation was imposed to reflect the general practice and to avoid questions of whether a private person may request a search warrant.

Second, this statute limits the authority of Municipal Court Judges or Justices of the Peace to issue search warrants outside their jurisdiction. This limitation reflects the general jurisdiction of these judges. The statute allows a District Court Judge to order a search and seizure anywhere in the state.

The statute also establishes a distinct rule concerning the authority to issue a warrant.

Case Notes

Validity of Search Warrant Issued by Previously Substituted Judge: A search warrant was issued by a judge who had previously been substituted from the case. Defendant contended that the warrant was void ab initio because the substituted judge had no jurisdiction to issue the warrant. The Supreme Court disagreed. Pursuant to this section, a search warrant may be issued by any District Judge within the state. The judge therefore had general authority to issue the warrant, and the warrant was not void. St. v. Dasen, 2007 MT 87, 337 M 74, 155 P3d 1282 (2007), distinguishing Erickson v. Hart, 231 M 7, 750 P2d 1089 (1988), and St. v. Vickers, 1998 MT 201, 290 M 356, 964 P2d 756 (1998).

Application for Search Warrant Signed by Deputy County Attorney of Another County — Search and Seizure Not Illegal if Any Irregularity Has Not Affected Substantial Rights of Accused — Exclusionary Rule Not Automatically Applied: The Deputy County Attorney of Lake County signed an application for a search warrant to be executed in Sanders County. The defendant moved to suppress all evidence seized as a result of the warrant. The District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court did not address the question of the authority of a Deputy County Attorney from one county to apply for a search warrant to be executed in another county. Because the warrant was sufficient under the constitution, the fact that the application for the warrant was signed by the Deputy County Attorney of another county did not affect the defendant's substantial rights under the constitution, the search and seizure was not illegal, and the evidence should not have been suppressed. The exclusionary rule should not be automatically applied when there is a technical violation of a statutory requirement. St. v. West, 1998 MT 282, 291 M 435, 968 P2d 289, 55 St. Rep. 1155 (1998).

46-5-221. Grounds for search warrant.

Commission Comments

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter 38,] section 108-3.

This section is designed to set forth the requirements essential to obtain a search warrant: facts showing probable cause made under oath, particular description of the things to be seized. Further, it should be noted the section contemplates the actual presence, before the magistrate, of the individual making the application. The intention of this section is to follow U.S. Supreme Court decisions on this point (e.g., Jones v. U.S., 362 U.S. 257; Aguilar v. State of Texas, 84 S. Ct. 1509, 378 U.S. 108 (1964)).

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In introductory clause, after "judge", substituted "shall" for "may" and after "affirmation" deleted "before the judge"; in (1), after "states", inserted "facts sufficient to support probable cause to believe"; at end of (2) substituted "support probable cause to believe that evidence, contraband, or persons connected with the offense may be found" for "show probable cause for issuance of the warrant"; in (3) substituted "object" for "things"; in (4) substituted "who or what is" for "the things"; and deleted former (2) through (4) that read: "(2) Whenever the application is made by telephone, the applicant's telephonic oath or affirmation is considered to have been made before the judge, and the sworn or affirmed telephonic testimony must be electronically recorded by the judge on a recording device in the custody of the judge when the application is made. The recording must be retained in the court records and transcribed verbatim, including the time and date of recording, as soon as possible thereafter.

(3) Whenever a law enforcement officer wishes to obtain a search warrant by telephone, he shall first contact the county attorney or a deputy county attorney. If the county attorney or deputy county attorney is convinced that a warrant is justified and that the circumstances require its immediate issuance, he shall telephone the judge and state that he is convinced that the warrant should be issued by telephone. The judge shall then telephone the officer at the number provided by the county attorney or deputy county attorney, and the officer shall make his application as provided in subsection (2). If the judge approves a warrant, the officer shall sign the warrant with his own name and the judge's name. A search warrant issued upon the telephonic request of a person other than the county attorney or a deputy county attorney is not valid unless the procedure provided for in this subsection is followed.

(4) A search warrant issued upon any telephonic request is invalid unless it is subsequently signed by the issuing judge or his successor"; and made minor changes in style.

Applicability of Commission Comments: The applicability of the commission comments should be scrutinized in light of amendments made after 1967.

GENERAL

Failure to Prove Falsity of Warrant Application — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Shelton moved to suppress evidence from a drug search based on the assertion that the warrant application mischaracterized statements upon which the application was based. The Supreme Court found that the alleged mischaracterization was merely a difference in semantics, not proof of a false statement in the application. The trial court gave Shelton the opportunity to challenge the veracity of the application but denied the motion to suppress, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Shelton, 2008 MT 282, 345 M 330, 191 P3d 420 (2008). Following conviction on drug charges in a different county but stemming from the same incident, Shelton raised an identical claim of the insufficiency of the search warrant based on false information. Having considered and dismissed the argument in Shelton, id., the Supreme Court denied review of the claim under res judicata. Further, there was no indication that the District Court in the subsequent case considered information not contained in the warrant application, so Shelton's second conviction was also affirmed in St. v. Shelton, 2008 MT 321, 346 M 114, 193 P3d 943 (2008).

Authorization to Search Garage No Justification of Search of House, Even if Items in Garage Are Portable to House: A search warrant application that supported search of defendant's unattached garage did not justify a search of the house, and the fact that the suspected crime was operation of a meth lab and that materials for operating such a lab could be searched for under the search warrant and are easily portable and thus could be moved between a house and a garage did not justify the search of the house. St. v. Graham, 2004 MT 385, 325 M 110, 103 P3d 1073 (2004).

Reasonable Relationship Between Items Seized and Motive for Crimes Charged — Scope of Warrant Not Exceeded: Bar-Jonah was charged with impersonating a police officer and carrying a stun gun. During a search of Bar-Jonah's residence, police seized cameras, photo albums, film negatives, and various other items that Bar-Jonah contended were not related to the charges in the search warrant. Bar-Jonah's motion to suppress the items was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Relying on U.S. v. Clark, 31 F3d 831 (9th Cir. 1994), Bar-Jonah contended that allowing the seizure of fruits and instrumentalities of the offense was overbroad; however, in St. v. Quigg, 155 M 119, 467 P2d 692 (1970), the Supreme Court held that items may be seized if there is a reasonable relationship between the items and the motive for the charged crime and that it is sufficient to establish a fair probability that items sought in a warrant application are connected to that crime. In this case, based on all the facts and circumstances, the items were reasonably related to the criminal behavior enumerated in the warrant application and to Bar-Jonah's motive for impersonating a police officer and carrying a stun gun. Additionally, under Andresen v. Md., 427 US 463 (1976), the fact that items seized may later be used to form an evidentiary basis of another charge does not require suppression of the evidence. St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

Reasonable Expectation of Privacy in Lost Wallet — Evidence Obtained From Search of Lost Wallet Subject to Suppression: Hamilton's lost wallet was turned into the Bozeman police, who opened it to determine ownership. In doing so, the police discovered prescription drugs. Hamilton confessed that the drugs were not prescribed for her, and she was arrested and convicted. On appeal, Hamilton asserted that she retained an expectation of privacy in the lost wallet and that the fruits of the search of the wallet should be suppressed. The Supreme Court agreed. In determining whether an unlawful search of the wallet occurred, the court applied St. v. Scheetz, 286 M 41, 950 P2d 722 (1997), looking at whether Hamilton had an actual expectation of privacy that society was willing to recognize as objectively reasonable and at the nature of the state's intrusion. When a person intentionally abandons property, the expectation of privacy is abandoned as well. However, when property is not intentionally or voluntarily abandoned, the expectation of privacy remains substantially intact. Thus, Hamilton's expectation of privacy was diminished only to the extent necessary for the police to determine ownership. The police search exceeded what was necessary to determine ownership of the wallet and was not justified by any exception to the warrant requirements. Therefore, the warrantless search was illegal, and the evidence obtained as a result of the search should have been suppressed. Hamilton's conviction was reversed. St. v. Hamilton, 2003 MT 71, 314 M 507, 67 P3d 871 (2003).

Evaluation of Reliability of Confidential Tip — Unreliable Tip as Only Grounds for Investigative Stop — Infringement of Right to Privacy: Following weeks of surveillance instigated by a confidential tip intimating drug activities, the Billings police observed no suspicious drug-related activities conducted by defendants, but after receiving a confidential tip that defendants would be driving from Billings to Bozeman to sell marijuana, officers stopped and searched defendants' vehicle and arrested defendants for drug possession. Defendants contended that insufficient objective data inferring criminality existed to justify the investigative stop. The Supreme Court applied the analysis in St. v. Pratt, 286 M 156, 951 P2d 37 (1997), to evaluate the reliability of the informant's tip. The court distinguished between a concerned citizen who reports a chance encounter with crime as a civic duty and a confidential informant who works with police by reporting on the illegal activities of others. A citizen informant is presumed to be telling the truth, but a confidential informant does not enjoy the same presumption of veracity. Further, for a tip to support a finding of probable cause, police must know the identity of the informant, trust from experience or presumption that the informant is telling the truth, and discern that the informant's information about the alleged crime derives from the informant's personal observations. Officers must then evaluate the veracity, reliability, and basis of knowledge of the informant to determine whether the report supports reasonable suspicion. If a tip is anonymous and lacks any indication of the basis for the informant's opinion, the tip must be corroborated through the observation of suspicious activity that alerts officers to the possibility of a violation. Corroboration of a tip with innocent information may lend an unknown or untested tipster some credibility, but this indicia of reliability does not obviate the relevance of the tipster's basis of knowledge as a factor in the evaluation. In the context of particularized suspicion, because the quantum of suspicion is less, an unreliable tip requires corroboration that supports an inference of criminality by direct police observation of suspicious activity and consideration of the modes of patterns of operation of certain kinds of lawbreakers, and mere police corroboration of innocent facts is insufficient. Here, defendants engaged in no observed criminal activity, and their travel plans were equally consistent with innocent behavior. Although the traffic stop was initially made to check a temporary sticker on the vehicle, once the sticker was found to be valid, grounds for the stop ended and no further police intrusion was warranted. St. v. Martinez, 2003 MT 65, 314 M 434, 67 P3d 207 (2003), following St. v. Henderson, 1998 MT 233, 291 M 77, 966 P2d 137 (1998), and distinguishing Ala. v. White, 496 US 325 (1990). See also St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83 (2000).

Failure by Investigating Officer to Preserve Record of Citizen Informant Statement Made in Controlled Environment — Judicial Distrust Extended to Truthfulness of Declarations: When a law enforcement officer, absent exigent circumstances or another compelling reason, fails to memorialize in some manner the statement of a witness or informant made at the station house or in a similarly controlled environment and when the statement forms the substantial basis for the issuance of a search warrant or otherwise provides the grounds for the state's invasion of a fundamental constitutional right or interest guaranteed to a defendant, that failure will be viewed with distrust in the judicial assessment of the truthfulness of the state's declarations made in the search warrant application, to the extent that those declarations are based on the citizen informant's statements. St. v. Worrall, 1999 MT 55, 293 M 439, 976 P2d 968, 56 St. Rep. 225 (1999).

Modification of Franks Procedure for Challenging Veracity of Information in Application for Search Warrant: In deciding that a criminal defendant may challenge the truthfulness of factual statements in an application for a search warrant, the Supreme Court adopted the procedure set out in Franks v. Del., 438 US 154, 57 L Ed 2d 667, 98 S Ct 2674 (1978). The Franks procedure requires not only that the defendant show that the application contained false statements, but also that the defendant make a substantial showing that the false statements were made knowingly, intentionally, or with a reckless disregard for the truth, in the form of an offer of proof containing affidavits, sworn statements, or other reliable witness statements tending to prove that the false statements were deliberately made. Adopting the rationale set out by Justice Trieweiler in concurring with St. v. Feland, 267 M 112, 882 P2d 500, 51 St. Rep. 994 (1994), the court modified its use of the Franks procedure, holding that a better procedure would be to require the defendant to make a substantial preliminary showing that false information was included in the application for a warrant or in the affidavit in support of the application. If that showing is made, a hearing must be held wherein the defendant must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the information is untrue. If proved untrue, that information must be excised from the application and a determination then made as to whether there is sufficient probable cause without the excised information. If there is not, the search warrant must be voided and the fruits of the search excluded. Thus, a defendant need not prove that the person providing false information did so knowingly, intentionally, or with a reckless disregard for the truth before the false statements may be excised from the application. If false information exists, it must be excised from the application regardless of whether the information was included mistakenly, unintentionally, or negligently because misstatements and inaccuracies, whether intentional or unintentional, might otherwise produce the same constitutionally impermissible result, of a search based on something other than probable cause. St. v. Worrall, 1999 MT 55, 293 M 439, 976 P2d 968, 56 St. Rep. 225 (1999), modifying St. v. Sykes, 194 M 14, 663 P2d 691 (1983), St. v. Mosley, 260 M 109, 860 P2d 69 (1993), and St. v. Feland, 267 M 112, 882 P2d 500, 51 St. Rep. 994 (1994), and followed in St. v. Minez, 2004 MT 115, 321 M 148, 89 P3d 966 (2004). On remand, after excising the officer's distrustful statements from the search warrant application, the District Court concluded that probable cause existed based on the facts from the application that were consistent with the boy's testimony and that the warrant to search Worrall's property was properly issued, so Worrall's motion to suppress the evidence of the search was dismissed. Worrall appealed. The Supreme Court noted that probable cause must be determined exclusively from the four corners of the application and must be based on a determination of whether, given all the circumstances set forth in the application, there is a fair probability that contraband or evidence of a crime will be found in a certain place. Worrall did not challenge the truthfulness of any of the unexcised facts, and the boy's statements were presumed reliable in light of his sincerity, the fact that he had not previously been in trouble, and the fact that he voluntarily went to the Sheriff's office to report his observations. St. v. Worrall, 2001 MT 57, 304 M 341, 22 P3d 182 (2001), followed in St. v. Clifford, 2005 MT 219, 328 M 300, 121 P3d 489 (2005).

Search Warrant Based in Part on Illegal Information — Motion to Suppress Denied — Reviewing Court to Conduct De Novo Review of Search Warrant Application: Police officers went to defendants' trailer home to check out a tip about marijuana being grown in the home. Defendants were arrested after the officers saw a marijuana pipe on a shelf. An officer went down the hall and saw and seized marijuana plants growing in a bedroom. The officers then got a search warrant and seized additional drug evidence. Defendants moved to suppress the plants seized without a warrant and the additional evidence seized pursuant to the warrant on the basis that it was tainted. The District Court granted the motion to suppress the plants on the basis that no exception to a warrantless search excused the illegal search and denied the motion to suppress the evidence seized with a search warrant. The Supreme Court held that when the issuance of a search warrant is based in part on illegally obtained information, the reviewing court shall excise the illegally obtained information from the application for search warrant and review the remaining information de novo to determine whether probable cause supported the issuance of a search warrant, overruling the use of the "great deference" standard of review in such cases. The Supreme Court held that the marijuana pipe and the citizen tip established probable cause for the issuance of the search warrant. The test is not to determine whether each individual fact presented in the application for search warrant establishes probable cause, but to determine from the totality of the circumstances whether there is probable cause. St. v. Kuneff, 1998 MT 287, 291 M 474, 970 P2d 556, 55 St. Rep. 1173 (1998).

Facts Provided by Nonconfidential Informant Self-Authenticating — Omissions and Misstatements Raised by Defendant Held Immaterial for Purposes of Determining Necessity for Franks Hearing — Issues Not Raised on Appeal Held Nonreviewable: Dotts was arrested for assault and disorderly conduct and, in the course of an interview with a detective, offered information on a marijuana-growing operation that was being run by Adams, in exchange for leniency on the charges. Dotts subsequently disclosed, without any commitments from the police, that Adams ran the marijuana-growing operation at a certain location, which Dotts himself helped establish, and that Adams and his son drove certain vehicles described by Dotts. The house and the vehicles were subsequently confirmed by detectives, a search warrant was obtained, a marijuana-growing operation was discovered, and Adams was arrested. Adams sought to suppress the evidence, arguing that a detective's statement in the warrant application that "Mr. Dotts asked for nothing . . . and I have offered him nothing . . ." in the way of leniency was untrue and that certain facts contained statements that were made by Dotts and that turned out to be incorrect. The Supreme Court distinguished St. v. Valley, 252 M 489, 830 P2d 1255 (1992), and St. v. Kaluza, 272 M 404, 901 P2d 107 (1995), explaining that, unlike those cases, the case before it involved a nonconfidential informant whose identification was known to the police. Declining to follow a procedure urged by defendant Adams that would establish a policy of "zero tolerance" for intentional misstatements or omissions in applications for search warrants because the argument was raised for the first time on appeal, the Supreme Court followed the procedure outlined in Franks v. Del., 438 US 154 (1978), and applied in Montana in St. v. Sykes, 194 M 14, 663 P2d 691 (1983), which requires a defendant to make a substantial showing that false statements were knowingly or intentionally made, requires the reviewing court to disregard any such statements, and then requires the court to determine if the remaining facts demonstrate probable cause. Following St. v. Garberding, 245 M 356, 801 P2d 583 (1990), and other cases, the Supreme Court found that the misstatements and omissions in the warrant application raised by Adams did not, in light of Dotts' admission against interest that he helped set up the marijuana-growing operation, cast doubt on the credibility of the other information given by Dotts. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that the misstatements and omissions were immaterial in determining Dotts' credibility and that, even if Dotts had been a confidential informant, the information that he gave was sufficiently corroborated to establish probable cause. Adams also raised the issue that the search warrant was overbroad, but relying upon St. v. Henderson, 265 M 454, 877 P2d 1013 (1994), the Supreme Court held that because the issue had been raised by Adams for the first time on appeal, the Supreme Court would not consider the issue. St. v. Adams, 284 M 25, 943 P2d 955, 54 St. Rep. 717 (1997), followed in St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154, 55 St. Rep. 1235 (1998), and followed in St. v. Worrall, 1999 MT 55, 293 M 439, 976 P2d 968, 56 St. Rep. 225 (1999).

Search of Defendant's Truck Invalid: The Beaverhead County Sheriff's Office was contacted and informed that Lott was going to receive a shipment of drugs in the mail. The officers obtained a warrant to search Lott's house and his three vehicles on the basis that the vehicles might be used to distribute the drugs. When the package arrived, Lott was at work and asked a coworker to deliver the package to him at work. When Lott left work, he was stopped, his truck was searched, and the drugs were found. The Supreme Court held that the search of the truck was invalid because the warrant did not contain any specific facts demonstrating probable cause that the drugs would be located in the vehicle. The Supreme Court also held that the search of the truck did not come under the automobile exception to the warrant requirement based on probable cause and exigent circumstances because of the lack of exigent circumstances. St. v. Lott, 272 M 195, 900 P2d 306, 52 St. Rep. 696 (1995).

Warrant Proper for Seizure of Beer and Wine Served Without Valid License: Investigators complied with constitutional and statutory requirements for search and seizure when they: (1) knew a crime was being committed and were able to state of their own knowledge that defendant was serving beer without a valid license; (2) established reasonable cause; (3) were able to describe the place to be searched and articles to be seized; (4) showed the warrant to defendant while executing the search; and (5) provided defendant with a copy of the warrant and supporting paperwork. St. v. Barnes, 232 M 405, 758 P2d 264, 45 St. Rep. 1150 (1988).

Statutory Procedures Not Followed — Search Warrant Voidable, Not Void: Although the arresting officer and the Justice of the Peace did not follow the statutory procedures for telephonic search warrants, the procedural defects rendered the warrant voidable, not void ab initio. In light of sufficient grounds for issuance, the warrant was valid. As stated in Harri v. Issac, 111 M 152, 107 P2d 137 (1940), a ministerial officer is justified in the execution of, and must execute, all process and orders regular on their face and issued by competent authority, whatever may be the defect in the proceedings upon which they were issued. Collins v. St., 232 M 703, 755 P2d 1373, 45 St. Rep. 878 (1988).

Speed With Which Affidavit Based on Past Activity Becomes "Stale": Generally speaking, when the affidavit in support of a search warrant recites a mere isolated violation, probable cause based on that violation dwindles rather quickly with the passage of time. However, when the affidavit recites facts indicating activity of a protracted and continuous nature, a course of conduct, the passage of time becomes less significant. St. v. O'Neill, 208 M 386, 679 P2d 760, 41 St. Rep. 420 (1984).

Affidavit Drawn in Anticipation of Offense Not Defective: Where an affidavit supporting an application for a warrant stated the facts of the delivery of a dangerous drug to the defendant and was prepared prior to such delivery, the Supreme Court held that the affidavit was not defective and did not show that the state intended to entrap the defendant. There is nothing inherently wrong in preparing an affidavit in anticipation of an expected violation; nor did the state, by preparing the affidavit, cause possession to happen, as the UPS package containing the drug would have been delivered to the defendant in any event. St. v. Kelly, 205 M 417, 668 P2d 1032, 40 St. Rep. 1400 (1983).

Marijuana in Unfenced Garden — Observation From Road by Police With Spotting Scope: When the State does not violate an individual's legitimate expectation of privacy, an unreasonable search has not taken place. Where no reasonable expectation of privacy exists, there is neither a search nor a seizure under the fourth amendment to the United States Constitution or Art. II, sec. 11, Mont. Const. There was no search when police stood on county road and used a spotting scope to look for marijuana in garden surrounded by open fields and the marijuana obtained pursuant to a warrant to search garden was properly used as direct evidence in prosecution for criminal possession of dangerous drugs. St. v. Bennett, 205 M 117, 666 P2d 747, 40 St. Rep. 1133 (1983).

Landlord's Inadvertent Observation as Basis for Search Warrant — Controlled Substances: The defendant, who had signed a lease allowing his landlord the right to enter the defendant's apartment, borrowed a vacuum cleaner from the landlord, who, upon entering the defendant's room to retrieve the vacuum, saw light coming from a closet and inadvertently discovered marijuana and drug paraphernalia. The District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to suppress the evidence taken after a search warrant was obtained. The landlord was justified in entering the room to show it to prospective lessees or to retrieve the vacuum. Once the landlord was in the apartment, he was justified in inspecting the closet to see if the cause of the light constituted a fire hazard. The landlord could, under the circumstances, permit the police officer to observe the items in the closet, and the officer's observation could be used as a basis for the warrant. St. v. Sayers, 199 M 228, 648 P2d 291, 39 St. Rep. 1309 (1982).

Search Warrant and Search Based on Marijuana Obtained by Trespassing Neighbor Illegal: The issuance of a search warrant and the subsequent search based solely on a sample of marijuana obtained by defendant's curious neighbor by means of an illegal trespass were improper and illegal. The evidence obtained by the search was properly suppressed by the District Court. St. v. Helfrich, 183 M 484, 600 P2d 816 (1979).

Warrant Issued by Tribal Court: The Supreme Court declined to address the applicability of Montana law versus that of the Blackfeet Tribal Law and Order Code to the admissibility in a State prosecution of a non-Indian of evidence seized on the Blackfeet Indian Reservation by Blackfeet tribal police acting under authority of a search warrant issued by the Blackfeet Tribal Court because both the State and the defendant agreed that under either law the search warrant and affidavit were defective and the evidence must be suppressed. St. v. Stenson, 175 M 523, 575 P2d 72 (1978).

Limited by Statute: The use of search warrants is not to be extended by construction to any case not clearly covered by statute. State ex rel. Streit v. Justice Court, 45 M 375, 123 P 405 (1912).

ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE

Recording Face-to-Face Conversation With Consent of Informant Without Warrant Violates Defendant's Right to Privacy and Constitutes Unreasonable Search: In two separate cases, consolidated by the Supreme Court, the defendants Goetz and Hamper pleaded guilty to felony distribution of dangerous drugs but reserved their right to appeal the denial of their motions to suppress the warrantless monitoring and recording of their face-to-face conversations with an informant wearing a wire who had consented to the procedure. In the case of Goetz the recorded conversation had taken place in Goetz's residence, and in Hamper's case the recorded conversation had taken place in his vehicle. The Supreme Court stated that Art. II, sec. 10 and 11, Mont. Const., when taken together afford citizens a greater right to privacy that, in turn, provides broader protection than the Fourth Amendment of the United States Constitution in situations involving searches and seizures occurring in private settings. The Supreme Court overruled St. v. Brown, 232 M 1, 755 P2d 1364 (1988), to the extent that it relied only on federal law and held that warrantless electronic monitoring of face-to-face conversations with the consent of one party is lawful. The Supreme Court found that the recorded conversations between the defendants and the informant took place in the private residences or vehicles of the defendants and were not conducted where other individuals were present, and therefore the defendants had exhibited actual subjective expectations of privacy in the face-to-face conversations. The Supreme Court also found that the defendants' privacy expectations were expectations that society was willing to accept as reasonable, and the conversations therefore constituted searches within the contemplation of Art. II, sec. 10 and 11, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court further held that the consent of the informant did not fall under the consent exception to unlawful warrantless searches and that the state could not rely on the particularized suspicion standard rather than the probable cause requirement in Art. II, sec. 11, Mont. Const., for the issuance of a warrant because the state's intrusion into the defendants' privacy expectations by electronic monitoring and recording of their conversations was not a minimal intrusion not rising to a level requiring probable cause. The Supreme Court concluded that the electronic monitoring and recording of the defendants' conversations without a warrant or the existence of an established exception to the warrant requirement violated the defendants' rights under Art. II, sec. 10 and 11, Mont. Const. St. v. Goetz, 2008 MT 296, 345 M 421, 191 P3d 489 (2008).

Warrantless Use of Thermal Imaging as Unconstitutional Search: The use of thermal imaging in a criminal investigation to detect heat and infrared radiation from outside a structure, such as that generated by an indoor marijuana growing operation, constitutes a search under Art. II, sec. 11, Mont. Const. The privacy interests of Art. II, sec. 10, Mont. Const., are also implicated by the use of thermal imaging technology. In the present case, defendants housed activities that they wished to keep private in an enclosed structure on posted, fenced property behind locked gates. As such, defendants had a subjective expectation of privacy in the heat signatures of activities, intimate or otherwise, pursued within the confines of their private homes and enclosed structures, which they did not knowingly expose to the public. Montana's Constitution affords citizens broader protection from warrantless governmental intrusion in search and seizure cases than does the United States Constitution. This heightened expectation of privacy is one that society is willing to recognize as objectively reasonable. Therefore, use of thermal imaging technology by the government in the absence of a search warrant requires the demonstration of a compelling state interest closely tailored to effectuate only that compelling interest, not simply enforcement of the criminal statutes. In the absence of these factors, use of the technology violated defendants' right to privacy. St. v. Siegal, 281 M 250, 934 P2d 176, 54 St. Rep. 158 (1997), following St. v. Solis, 214 M 310, 693 P2d 518 (1984), St. v. Young, 867 P2d 593 (Wash. 1994), U.S. v. Ishmael, 48 F3d 850 (5th Cir. 1995), U.S. v. Cusumano, 67 F3d 1497 (10th Cir. 1995), and St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995).

Admissibility of Recording of Warrantless Face-to-Face Conversation by Police Use of Body Wire Transmitting Device: Warrantless consensual electronic monitoring of face-to-face conversations by the use of a body wire transmitting device, when performed by law enforcement officers while pursuing their official duties, does not violate the constitutional right to be free of unreasonable search and seizure or the right of privacy. Consent must be clearly obtained from at least one party to the conversation and must be freely made and without compulsion. As in telephone conversations, the consenting party may be an informant or police officer. Evidence obtained from such monitoring is admissible in a subsequent criminal trial. St. v. Brown, 232 M 1, 755 P2d 1364, 45 St. Rep. 818 (1988), overruling St. v. Brackman, 178 M 105, 582 P2d 1216 (1978). Brown was overruled in St. v. Goetz, 2008 MT 296, 345 M 421, 191 P3d 489 (2008).

Electronic Surveillance of Suspect — Place to Be Searched: An informant was fitted with an electronic device authorized by court order to monitor the conversations in a drug buy from a named individual, but the order did not contain a specific location to be searched under the provisions of 46-5-201 (now repealed). The Supreme Court held that the geographic location of an electronic surveillance of a particular person is tied to the whereabouts of the suspect. The phrase in 46-5-201 (now repealed) describing what may be searched ("the thing, place, or person") is disjunctive; thus, the person whose conversation is to be overheard when named in the surveillance order is sufficiently precise to meet constitutional requirements. St. v. Coleman, 189 M 492, 616 P2d 1090, 37 St. Rep. 1661 (1980).

Electronic Surveillance of Suspect — Reliability of Informant: Where the defendant was arrested as the result of an electronically recorded conversation with an informant who had previously consented to carrying a transmitting device for police officers after providing them with detailed information on the time and circumstances of a proposed sale of drugs, the affidavit upon which the order for the electronic surveillance was issued was legally sufficient in that it properly informed the District Court of the underlying circumstances upon which the informant concluded that the drugs were where they were said to be located and the underlying circumstances from which the officer making the affidavit could conclude the informant was reliable, in spite of the fact that the informant was a convicted felon. St. v. Case, 616 P2d 1090, 37 St. Rep. 1661 (1980) (apparently not reported in Montana Reports).

Supporting Affidavit Showing Compelling State Interest: Where police officers obtained an order for electronic surveillance of the defendant, an affidavit supporting the request for the order which recited facts showing the defendant to be in possession of dangerous drugs satisfied the standard for issuance of electronic surveillance orders announced in St. v. Brackman, 178 M 105, 582 P2d 1216 (1978), in which the Supreme Court held that the state must show a compelling state interest to obtain this kind of order. The enforcement of criminal laws is essential to the preservation of an orderly society and is a compelling state interest sufficient to support the issuance of the order. St. v. Case, 616 P2d 1090, 37 St. Rep. 1661 (1980) (apparently not reported in Montana Reports).

Electronic Monitoring: Carrier, an undercover drug investigator, was outfitted with a concealed microphone and a body monitor during six meetings with the defendant. Court orders permitting the monitoring were obtained for the last three meetings but not for the first three. The transcripts of the last three meetings were admitted into evidence over the defendant's objection. On appeal, the Supreme Court said that the application for electronic monitoring authorization was based on Carrier's own personal observations which supplied adequate independent information. The application made no reference to the fact that the earlier conversations were monitored or recorded, and the later recordings were not tainted by the earlier unauthorized recordings. St. v. Bassett, 189 M 28, 614 P2d 1054 (1980).

Unauthorized Recording of Telephone Call — Third Person's Right to Privacy Invaded: Recording of telephone conversation by police undercover officer of a call received from an acquaintance of defendant setting up a drug sale did not taint all evidence against defendant even though the recording was not authorized by court order. The undercover officer personally contacted police regarding the setting up of the drug buy which resulted in defendant's conviction. Furthermore, a defendant cannot invoke a breach of right of privacy of his acquaintance; he must assert his own privacy rights. The recording was not introduced into evidence, but the undercover officer testified concerning it. St. v. Hanley, 186 M 410, 608 P2d 104 (1980).

Requirements for Electronic Surveillance: Under Title III of the Federal Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act, states are required to have a specific statutory scheme for electronic surveillance before public officials can lawfully monitor oral and wire communications in the state. If a state chooses to allow electronic surveillance by adopting a statutory scheme, the scheme must be at least as or more restrictive than the regulations of Title III. Montana statutes 45-8-213, defining the offense of violating privacy in communications, and 46-5-202 (renumbered as this section), setting forth the grounds for issuance of a search warrant, fail to meet the minimum requirements of Title III or the standard enumerated by the U.S. Supreme Court in the Berger and Katz decisions. Among other things, Montana's statutes fail: (1) to require a showing of exigent circumstances to overcome the defect of not giving prior notice; (2) to state what items of information should be included in the application for a warrant; and (3) to outline the general procedures by which law enforcement officials obtain warrants for electronic surveillance. In St. v. Brackman (since overruled in St. v. Brown, 232 M 1, 755 P2d 1364, 45 St. Rep. 818 (1988)), the court held that in view of Montana's constitutional right of privacy, law enforcement officials must first obtain a warrant before intercepting any communication. This will no longer suffice, since the requirements of Title III are not met. Any evidence seized by electronic surveillance must be suppressed since Montana's statutory scheme for allowing such surveillance does not meet the federal requirements. St. v. Hanley, 185 M 459, 605 P2d 1087 (1979), followed in St. v. Lynch, 1998 MT 308, 292 M 144, 969 P2d 920, 55 St. Rep. 1278 (1998). Lynch was followed in St. v. Pizzichiello, 1999 MT 123, 294 M 436, 983 P2d 888, 56 St. Rep. 499 (1999).

AUTHORITY TO ISSUE

Authority of Properly Appointed Substitute Justice of the Peace to Issue Search Warrant: A search warrant was issued by a substitute Justice of the Peace, and Beaupre contended that the fruits of the search should be suppressed because no attempt was made to call in another Justice of the Peace or City Judge and because the substitute was not properly appointed. The Supreme Court dismissed the claims. The regular Justice of the Peace had letters from judges in nearby cities indicating that they were not available should the Justice of the Peace be absent, and the letters were updated every 6 months in accordance with the Attorney General's recommendations in 48 A.G. Op. 11 (2000). Further, the substitute was timely designated during the second term of the regular Justice of the Peace, and incorrect wording on the waiver of training form was inconsequential and did not affect the authority of the substitute to act. St. v. Beaupre, 2004 MT 300, 323 M 413, 102 P3d 504 (2004). See also Potter v. District Court, 266 M 384, 880 P2d 1319 (1994), and St. v. Vickers, 1998 MT 201, 290 M 356, 964 P2d 756 (1998).

Issuing Magistrate Involved in Police Investigation — Subsequent Search Warrant Improper: Following a burglary and upon receiving a report of an empty safe being found in the water, the Sheriff, a deputy, and the Justice of the Peace traveled to the site, discussing the evidence and the investigation. Two days later, after additional evidence was gathered, the Justice of the Peace issued a search warrant to search Wilson's truck. Upon conviction, Wilson challenged the impartiality of the Justice of the Peace to issue a warrant. Once the magistrate became an active participant in the police investigation, his impartiality ceased and he could no longer make a neutral and detached evaluation of the evidence to determine whether probable cause existed and thus could no longer protect Wilson's right to be free from a search not based on probable cause. Because the warrant was invalid, the subsequent search was illegal and evidence from the search was suppressed. St. v. Wilson, 266 M 146, 879 P2d 683, 51 St. Rep. 697 (1994).

Affidavit Alleging Possession of Dangerous Drug After Shipment From Another State Held Sufficient: Where an affidavit made in application for a search warrant indicated the offense of possession of a dangerous drug and stated that the offense took place in Gallatin County, Montana, the District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to suppress the evidence of the offense, which had been shipped from Hawaii. No jurisdictional question existed for the magistrate who issued the warrant, as the affidavit showed that the crime of possession had been committed within the county. St. v. Kelly, 205 M 417, 668 P2d 1032, 40 St. Rep. 1400 (1983).

Issuance of Search Warrant by Justice of the Peace in Case Involving Dangerous Drugs: Justices' Courts are constitutionally created, and when the Legislature has had the opportunity to limit their jurisdiction and has not seen fit to do so, a legislative intent to authorize the practice of Justices' Courts issuing search warrants is presumed as a Justice of the Peace meets the United States constitutional standard of "a neutral and detached magistrate" to examine the application for a search warrant and determine whether reasonable cause exists for its issuance. St. v. Snider, 168 M 220, 541 P2d 1204 (1975).

Issuance of Warrant by City Judge: A City Court Judge does not have the statutory authority to issue search warrants, and the trial court correctly suppressed evidence obtained under color of a search warrant executed by a City Court Judge. St. v. Tropf, 166 M 79, 530 P2d 1158 (1975), applied, with regard to substitute judges, in Potter v. District Court, 266 M 384, 880 P2d 1319, 51 St. Rep. 853 (1994).

PROBABLE CAUSE

Sufficient Probable Cause for Issuance of Search Warrant for Investigation of Hunting Activities: Cotterell asserted that there was insufficient probable cause to issue a search warrant for investigation of alleged illegal hunting activities. The Supreme Court reviewed the facts in the warrant application and concluded that the facts and circumstances described in the application were sufficient to indicate a fair probability that evidence of a crime existed on Cotterell's property, including Cotterell's possession of two-way communication devices for use in hunting big game animals and Cotterell's unlawful use of an amphibious off-highway vehicle to retrieve a deer from his neighbor's property. St. v. Cotterell, 2008 MT 409, 347 M 231, 198 P3d 254 (2008).

Sufficient Probable Cause for Search Warrant — Motion to Suppress on Grounds of Unreliable Sources Properly Denied: Tucker asserted that fruits of a search of his residence should be suppressed because the warrant application was insufficient to establish probable cause because police failed to corroborate information provided by two informants. The Supreme Court examined the information in light of St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83 (2000), and St. v. Barnaby, 2006 MT 203, 333 M 220, 142 P3d 809 (2006), to determine the reliability of the informants. The first test is whether corroboration was required because the informants were anonymous, and in this case both informants were known to officers. The second test is whether the informants' information was based on hearsay, which requires corroboration, or on personal information. Here both informants had personal information of Tucker's activities. The third test is whether the informants were reliable. Neither informant was a confidential informant, but rather acted as concerned citizens, and the warrant application contained the necessary information to establish the reason for the informants' personal exposure to the evidence as well as their motivation for going to the police. Both informants were thus considered reliable, and any necessity for corroboration was satisfied. Therefore, the warrant application demonstrated the necessary probable cause, and Tucker's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Tucker, 2008 MT 273, 345 M 237, 190 P3d 1080 (2008).

Defendant's Drug Precursor Purchases and Officer's Experience — Sufficient Probable Cause for Search Warrant for Drug Lab Under Totality of Circumstances: Dutton moved to suppress the evidence from a search on grounds of staleness and lack of sufficient information to support the warrant. The Supreme Court dismissed the staleness argument after determining that a crimestopper's tip from 9 months before the warrant was issued was timely when coupled with information received 5 months earlier and considerable information that was only days or weeks old at the time of the warrant application. Additionally, when viewing the totality of the circumstances in a practical, common-sense manner, there was sufficient probable cause for the warrant based on an experienced officer's observations of Dutton's activity of purchasing numerous drug precursors used in methamphetamine production as inconsistent with the average consumer. Dutton's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Dutton, 2007 MT 56, 336 M 192, 153 P3d 642 (2007).

Companion's Activity at Defendant's Residence Sufficient to Justify Search of Defendant's Property: Officers obtained a warrant to search Barnaby's residence based in large part on informants' tips that Barnaby's companion, Sheridan, was operating a clandestine drug laboratory at the residence. Barnaby moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the search warrant was insufficient because evidence of Sheridan's involvement in methamphetamine production did not establish probable cause to search Barnaby's residence. The Supreme Court cited Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 US 547 (1978), St. v. Gray 2001 MT 250, 307 M 124, 38 P3d 775 (2001), and St. v. St. Marks, 2002 MT 285, 312 M 468, 59 P3d 1113 (2002), for the proposition that the critical element in a reasonable search is not that the owner of the property is suspected of crime but that there is reasonable cause to believe that the specific things to be searched for and seized are located on the property to which entry is sought. Thus, corroboration of criminal conduct by Barnaby's companion, Sheridan, could be imputed to Barnaby, even though Sheridan's mere presence at the residence did not amount to probable cause to search Barnaby's residence. However, Sheridan's involvement in the production of methamphetamine and continued presence at Barnaby's house, coupled with two independent reports that Sheridan operated a drug lab at the house and a report of suspicious activity at the house since Sheridan's arrival, amounted to a substantial basis for determining whether probable cause supported the issuance of a warrant under the totality of the circumstances. The fact that the warrant application did not include a specific account of the circumstances under which some informants viewed the events or whether two citizens based their reports on personal observations did not preclude a court from finding probable cause. Sufficiency of the warrant was affirmed, and Barnaby's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Barnaby, 2006 MT 203, 333 M 220, 142 P3d 809 (2006).

Totality of Circumstances, Including Odor of Marijuana, Sufficient Probable Cause to Support Search Warrant: The Department of Public Health and Human Services received a call alleging that Morse was selling drugs in the presence of her juvenile daughter, and the local drug task force received two additional calls alleging that Morse was distributing drugs from her apartment. When police visited Morse's apartment, there were four other people there, all of whom had prior drug-related arrests, including Morse. The officers smelled marijuana and observed an empty electric digital scale in the living room. Morse refused a search of the apartment, so officers obtained a search warrant. In executing the warrant, the officers found drugs and paraphernalia. At trial, Morse moved to suppress the evidence based on lack of probable cause for the warrant. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court reviewed the totality of the circumstances and affirmed. The smell of marijuana did not in itself establish probable cause, nor did the telephone calls. However, when considered with Morse's drug history, the criminal backgrounds of the other four people, and the presence of the scale, the search warrant application established probable cause, and the motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Morse, 2006 MT 54, 331 M 300, 132 P3d 528 (2006).

Personal Possession of Pipe Insufficient Probable Cause to Search Vehicle — Evidence in Plain View in Vehicle Sufficient Probable Cause for Subsequent Search of Residence: When Griffin was lawfully arrested for driving without a license, the arresting officer found a pipe in Griffin's pocket that, in the officer's opinion, contained drug residue. The officer then obtained a search warrant for Griffin's truck. When approaching the truck, the officer observed items in plain view in the open truck bed that could be used to manufacture methamphetamine. Pursuant to another search warrant based on the evidence in the truck bed, officers searched Griffin's residence and found a drug lab that was booby-trapped with explosives. Griffin moved to suppress all the evidence because the first search warrant was issued without probable cause. The motion was denied, but on appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that the only evidence supporting the vehicle search warrant—the existence of a pipe on Griffin's person and the fact that Griffin recently exited the truck—provided insufficient probable cause for a warrant to search the truck. Just because a person has a pipe in a pocket that contains untested white residue does not mean that the person's vehicle will contain evidence of a drug offense. However, in this case, the majority of evidence seized from the truck was in plain view in the truck bed. Griffin had no expectation of privacy regarding items in plain view, nor was a warrant required to seize the items in the truck bed. Therefore, any error in issuing the search warrant for the truck was harmless and not prejudicial. Additionally, the lawfully seized evidence in the truck bed was sufficient to support a finding of probable cause for issuance of another warrant to search Griffin's residence. Denial of Griffin's motion to suppress was affirmed. St. v. Griffin, 2004 MT 331, 324 M 143, 102 P3d 1206 (2004).

Information Provided by Citizen Informant — Sufficient Warrant Application: Beaupre contended that the fruits of a search should be suppressed because the warrant application was based on uncorroborated information provided by a confidential informant unknown to the officer who applied for the warrant and that the application was based on impermissible hearsay. The motion to suppress was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The informant was part of a cleaning crew hired by Beaupre to clean up damage after a fire at Beaupre's residence. During the cleanup, the informant observed drug paraphernalia and suspected drug lab materials, photographed the items, and gave the photographs to police. The informant remained confidential, but was not anonymous, and was acting as a concerned citizen. Questions regarding the informant's involvement and motivation were answered by the application and thus provided probable cause without further corroboration. The informant's information was not considered hearsay because the observations of fellow officers were a reliable basis for a warrant applied for by another officer. St. v. Beaupre, 2004 MT 300, 323 M 413, 102 P3d 504 (2004). See also St. v. Seaman, 236 M 466, 771 P2d 950 (1989), and St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83 (2000).

Admission of Unrelated Criminal Activity by Informant — Independent Corroboration Unnecessary: An informant who was known to police told the authorities that Meyer was in possession of illegal explosives after witnessing the explosives being delivered to Meyer. The informant admitted several instances of criminal activity, including use and possession of methamphetamine and being present when the explosives were delivered. Meyer sought to suppress evidence of the explosives because the informant's statements were not corroborated, the informant was not charged with transporting illegal explosives, and the drug charges were unrelated to the explosives investigation. The motion to suppress was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Independent corroboration is not required for a reliable informant whose identity is known to law enforcement and whose information is not based on hearsay, and an informant who gives an unequivocal admission against interest is considered reliable without further corroboration. Because corroboration was not necessary, the court declined to address whether admissions unrelated to the underlying offense may be classified as an admission against interest. St. v. Meyer, 2004 MT 272, 323 M 173, 99 P3d 185 (2004), following St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83 (2000).

Not Necessary to Allege Every Element of Offense to Support Finding of Probable Cause for Search Warrant: A search warrant application alleged that Meyer violated 45-8-335 by illegally possessing explosives. Meyer contended that the application was insufficient because it did not allege a violation of every element of 45-8-335, so probable cause did not exist. The Supreme Court disagreed. Probable cause to believe that an offense has been committed is a separate question from whether probable cause exists to search a suspect's residence, and evidence sufficient to support probable cause for a warrant is significantly less than that required to support a conviction. In this case, the warrant application stated facts supporting probable cause to believe that contraband connected with the offense of illegal possession of explosives would be found at Meyer's residence, described with particularity the place to be searched and what was to be seized, was based on observations of a reliable informant, and alleged a specific timeframe related by the informant as to when the continuing possession occurred. Under the totality of the circumstances, the application was sufficient when viewed on its four corners to support a finding of probable cause. St. v. Meyer, 2004 MT 272, 323 M 173, 99 P3d 185 (2004).

Suspect's Conduct and Officer's Knowledge of Suspect's Criminal History Sufficient Probable Cause for Warrant to Search Vehicle for Drugs: When officers arrested Frasure on an outstanding warrant, Frasure acted jittery and nervous, spoke with choppy, accelerated speech, and was sweating. Based on their training, the officers knew Frasure's actions were consistent with a person under the influence of methamphetamine. The officers also knew from previous contact that Frasure was a methamphetamine addict who had previously been arrested for methamphetamine offenses. A pat-down search incident to the arrest revealed a marijuana pipe in Frasure's pocket. Frasure denied consent to search the vehicle that he was in when arrested, but the vehicle was impounded and a warrant was obtained to search the vehicle. The search revealed drugs and paraphernalia, and Frasure moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that there was insufficient probable cause for the search warrant. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The officers' knowledge and Frasure's conduct constituted sufficient evidence to support the officers' belief that Frasure had committed an offense, so sufficient probable cause existed to support the vehicle search, and denial of Frasure's motion to suppress was not erroneous. St. v. Frasure, 2004 MT 242, 323 M 1, 97 P3d 1101 (2004).

Sufficient Corroboration of Tip in Application for Warrant to Demonstrate Probable Cause — Suppression Motion Improperly Granted: Based on a tip, Palmer was arrested for drugs following a search of his bus. The District Court subsequently granted Palmer's motion to suppress after concluding that: (1) the informant lacked reliability; (2) timeframes surrounding the information were unclear; (3) the informant's tip was not sufficiently corroborated; (4) associations between Palmer and drug activity were tenuous; and (5) evidence found in Palmer's trash could not be directly linked to Palmer. The state appealed the suppression, and the Supreme Court reversed. Applying St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83 (2000), the court found it unnecessary to determine whether the informant should be treated as a confidential informant, requiring corroboration, or as an informant who made an unequivocal admission against interest in the course of providing the tip because the search warrant application itself sufficiently corroborated the tip and demonstrated probable cause. The fact that corroborative evidence in the form of video surveillance revealed no actual criminal activity did not necessarily lead to the conclusion that probable cause did not exist. St. v. Palmer, 2003 MT 129, 316 M 46, 68 P3d 809 (2003).

Sufficient Probable Cause for Search of Vehicle for Suspected Drug Lab: Officers received a tip from Olson's estranged husband that a methamphetamine lab was being operated in Olson's garage. The officers placed the garage under surveillance and saw equipment being loaded into Olson's car that same day. The officers stopped the car for an investigative stop, and an officer informed Olson that he knew that lab equipment was in the trunk. Olson initially denied it, but when the officer expressed concern for Olson and her son, she made incriminating statements and confessed that the lab was in the car. The officers then obtained a search warrant and searched the vehicle and Olson's garage. Olson contended that the warrant application was not supported by probable cause. The Supreme Court applied the standards in Ill. v. Gates, 462 US 213 (1983), and St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83 (2000), and concluded that Olson's husband was acting as a good citizen and was a reliable informant. The officers had sufficient probable cause to believe that a drug lab was relocated from Olson's garage to the vehicle to support the issuance of the search warrant. St. v. Olson, 2003 MT 61, 314 M 402, 66 P3d 297 (2003).

De Novo Review of Excised Search Warrant Application by Supreme Court — Standard of Review: Supreme Court review of an application for a search warrant grants great deference to the issuing magistrate's determination that probable cause existed for issuing the warrant. However, when information has been excised from an application after the fact, that deference will not be paid to the magistrate's probable cause determination and the court will review the excised application de novo to determine whether probable cause supported the issuance of the search warrant. The Supreme Court's standard of review has often been articulated as whether the magistrate had a substantial basis to issue the search warrant, while the court's conclusions tended to be focused on whether sufficient probable cause existed. For purposes of review, the phrase "substantial basis for probable cause" has the same meaning as the phrase "sufficient probable cause". St. v. St. Marks, 2002 MT 285, 312 M 468, 59 P3d 1113 (2002). See also St. v. Kuneff, 1998 MT 287, 291 M 474, 970 P2d 556 (1998).

Sufficient Independent Corroboration of Statements of Confidential Informant: A confidential informant told police that St. Marks was engaged in illegal drug distribution with another man. The informant gave details concerning St. Marks' distinctive license plate, where he parked his car in public places, and the fact that he was staying in a particular room in a local motel. Corroboration of these innocent facts alone failed to prove the necessary indicia of suspicious human conduct to substantiate the informant's statements. However, further independent police investigation revealed that St. Marks had been staying at the motel for over 2 months, paid the bill in cash every 2 weeks, and had a home address in the same town as the motel. In the officers' judgment, it was unusual for a person to stay in a motel for long periods when the person has a local address, but it was common for drug dealers to stay in places other than their home to avoid bringing attention to themselves or placing their residence at risk, and distributors of dangerous drugs often have significant amounts of cash on hand. The Supreme Court decided that credence should be given to the officers' judgment because their experience and training provided a reasonable basis for the conclusions regarding St. Marks' behavior. Also, the other man mentioned by the informant was subsequently arrested after being found with a significant quantity of drugs. Thus, after evaluating the totality of the circumstances within the four corners of the search warrant application and excluding certain information that was conceded as being stale, the Supreme Court concluded that the unredacted information supplied in the application, including the subsequent corroboration and investigation by law enforcement, provided sufficient probable cause to support the belief that an offense had been committed and that evidence, contraband, or persons connected with the offense could be found. St. Marks' motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. St. Marks, 2002 MT 285, 312 M 468, 59 P3d 1113 (2002).

Common Sense Review of Four Corners of Warrant Application Using Totality of Circumstances Test — Sufficient Grounds for Warrant in Arson Case: The Markses were charged with arson in connection with a fire that burned their home. The investigating officer had obtained a search warrant based upon the fact that most of the Markses' furniture and belongings had been removed before the fire and based upon the fire marshal's statement that Mrs. Marks had to have been absent for more than 20 minutes before discovering the fire as she had stated. The Markses argued that the application for the warrant was invalid because it only established suspicion, not probable cause that the crime of arson was committed. The Supreme Court held that the issuing of the warrant was valid because probable cause exists when the facts presented would warrant an honest belief in the mind of a reasonable person that the offense has been committed. The Supreme Court held that a common sense review of the four corners of the application using the totality of circumstances test would justify the investigating officer's conclusion that evidence connected to the crime of arson would be found at the residence and that there was a fair probability that the items sought in the application were connected to the crime. St. v. Marks, 2002 MT 255, 312 M 169, 59 P3d 369 (2002).

Informants' Statements Based on First-Hand Evidence — Sufficient Probable Cause for Search Warrant: The Gramses' teenage daughter held a slumber party at the family home. During the party, the daughter procured marijuana from a filing cabinet in her father's bedroom, telling her friends that her father approved of her smoking marijuana and did not care if she went into the bedroom to procure some. The children allegedly smoked marijuana at the party, and the daughter was later implicated in a marijuana distribution scheme at her middle school. During the school investigation, one of the girls who was at the slumber party recalled the incident, and based on the information, a warrant was obtained to search the Gramses' residence. Marijuana and paraphernalia were seized. The Gramses moved to suppress the evidence, contending that probable cause did not support the search warrant. The motion was denied, and the Gramses appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The court applied the test in St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83 (2000), for determining whether an informant's information is sufficient to establish probable cause. The informants here were not anonymous, so the question became whether the informants' testimony was hearsay or based on personal observation of the criminal activity. The statements were based on first-hand evidence, so the last element of the Reesman test was whether the informants were reliable. In this case, the informants admitted that they smoked marijuana, which was an unequivocal admission against their interests, so the information was considered reliable and the police were not required to independently corroborate the informants' information. The admissions provided sufficient probable cause to obtain the search warrant, and the motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Grams, 2002 MT 188, 311 M 102, 53 P3d 897 (2002).

Sufficient Probable Cause for Search Warrant Based on Tip From Confidential Informant — Corroboration Required — Defendant's Burden to Show False Information in Warrant Application: A confidential informant told police that Gray was conducting a marijuana growing operation in his home. Based on the allegations, officers surveyed the exterior of the home and discovered a newly installed chimney and vents consistent with such an operation. Known drug offenders were observed frequenting the residence. An investigative subpoena of Gray's utility records showed an increase in power consumption consistent with a growing operation. Based on this information, officers obtained a search warrant and discovered 77 marijuana plants and associated growing paraphernalia. Gray moved unsuccessfully to suppress the evidence on grounds of insufficient probable cause to support the warrant, arguing that the warrant application contained unreliable hearsay, insufficient detail, and unsupported conclusory statements. The Supreme Court affirmed. In St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83 (2000), the court reiterated that corroboration of an informant's tip through other sources is necessary when the information is hearsay or the informant is anonymous. In this case, even though the informant was not anonymous, the informant lacked personal knowledge of the operation, so the information was hearsay and required corroboration. Nevertheless, the information could still be considered with other factors in determining probable cause under the totality of the circumstances test. The officers made several attempts to corroborate the information, including verification of the physical description of Gray and the residence, although that innocuous information alone provided no indicia of suspicious human conduct to substantiate the allegations, as required in St. v. Griggs, 2001 MT 211, 306 M 366, 34 P3d 101 (2001). However, the officers' other observations did provide sufficient corroboration to support probable cause, despite Gray's attempt to offer seemingly innocent explanations for the suspicious conduct. When a defendant challenges the veracity of information in a warrant application, the defendant must make a substantial preliminary showing that the application or affidavit in support of the application contained false information. If that showing is made, a hearing must be held and the defendant must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the information is untrue, and if proved untrue, that information must be excised from the application and a determination made as to whether sufficient probable cause exists without the excised information (see St. v. Worrall, 1999 MT 55, 293 M 439, 976 P2d 968 (1999)). Here, Gray did challenge the veracity of some, but not all, of the information, but the Supreme Court declined to disturb the trial court's findings regarding the reasonableness and prudence of the investigation or its judgment regarding the credibility of the witnesses. The court found that at some point, credence must be lent to the judgment of law enforcement whose training and experience invoke common sense conclusions about human behavior, and as long as officers provide reasonable justifications for their conclusions, the court will not disturb a finding of probable cause for issuance of a search warrant. The information here was sufficiently corroborated, and in light of the totality of the circumstances, the conclusion that probable cause existed was affirmed. St. v. Gray, 2001 MT 250, 307 M 124, 38 P3d 775 (2001). See also St. v. Rinehart, 262 M 204, 864 P2d 1219 (1993).

Sufficiency of Law Enforcement Officer's Independent Corroboration of Anonymous Tip — Failure to Corroborate Probability of Criminal Activity — Evidence of Search Properly Suppressed: Bozeman police received an anonymous tip that Griggs was conducting a mushroom-growing operation in his home. The informant also included a physical description of Griggs, his address, a description of his vehicle, the fact that Griggs had recently improved the wood trim on his residence, and the facts that he was a member of the armed forces, was a sharpshooter, and possessed several weapons. Detectives were able to corroborate all the personal information and incorporated it into a search warrant application, but did not corroborate that alleged criminal activity was occurring. Nevertheless, a warrant was issued by a District Court Judge and executed the following day, resulting in the seizure of contraband and Griggs's arrest. Griggs moved to suppress, arguing that the warrant was issued without sufficient probable cause, and a different District Court Judge granted the motion on grounds that because there was no independent police investigation that corroborated the caller's statements about the drug activity, sufficient probable cause for the warrant did not exist. The state appealed, contending that the further law enforcement investigation required under the standards in Ill. v. Gates, 462 US 213 (1983), and St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83 (2000), do not necessarily require corroboration of any criminal activity at all and need not extend to any incriminating information regarding alleged criminal activity supplied by an informant. The Supreme Court disagreed. A defendant may challenge whether independent corroboration or investigation was sufficient within the context of a court's totality of the circumstances analysis. Upon review, an appellate court must look solely to the information given to the impartial magistrate and to the four corners of the entire warrant application, rather than examining the application sentence by sentence. An anonymous informant's information regarding criminal activity always requires law enforcement corroboration in order to supply a sufficient substantial basis for a probable cause determination, although information supplied by a "concerned citizen" whose identity is known, who personally observes the alleged criminal activity, and who openly risks liability by accusing another person of criminal activity may not need further law enforcement corroboration. What is critical in the corroboration of an informant's information, when corroboration is in fact required, is that innocent noncriminal activity or evidence subjected to further investigation by officers ripens into suspicious behavior in light of the tip concerning criminal activity. A warrant application must state facts sufficient to support probable cause to believe that a criminal offense has been committed, as well as facts supporting probable cause to believe that evidence, contraband, or persons connected with the offense may be found. The necessary indicia of suspicion that results from police corroboration of otherwise innocent information must reveal a pattern of human behavior associated with the alleged criminal activity or activity necessary to carry out the activity that, when viewed as a whole, is consistent with the criminal activity. It is possible that in order to reveal this indicia of suspicious conduct, officers may investigate and corroborate otherwise innocent, noncriminal activity with further observations of otherwise innocent, noncriminal activity, but in Griggs's case, none of the subsequent investigations served to supply the magistrate with any indicia of conduct even remotely associated with the criminal activity alleged by the informant. Thus, probable cause did not exist, and the fruits of the search were properly suppressed. St. v. Griggs, 2001 MT 211, 306 M 366, 34 P3d 101 (2001), distinguishing St. v. Deskins, 245 M 158, 799 P2d 1070 (1990), and St. v. Hook, 255 M 2, 839 P2d 1274 (1992), followed in Hauge v. District Court, 2001 MT 255, 307 M 195, 36 P3d 947 (2001). See also U.S. v. Mendonsa, 989 F2d 366 (9th Cir. 1993).

Clarification of Corroboration Necessary to Verify Information Provided by Anonymous or Confidential Informant — Confidential Informant's Information Corroborated by Anonymous Tip Considered Insubstantial Basis for Determination of Probable Cause: A confidential informant provided police with firsthand information on alleged drug-related activities at a trailer home in Big Sky occupied by a person named Hoge, but there was no mention that Reesman lived at the trailer or was involved in any way. There was no indication that the informant had provided reliable information in the past. Police also received information from an anonymous citizen, who had reportedly provided reliable information in the past, regarding similar activity at the trailer home. However, there was no indication that the citizen's information came from personal observation or in what context prior reliable information had been received. Police took no further steps to corroborate the information supplied by either informant. Nevertheless, a warrant was issued for the entire trailer home and executed 2 days later. Police found Reesman and three other persons there and, upon searching Reesman's bedroom without his valid consent, discovered more than 100 doses of LSD. Reesman was charged with criminal possession of dangerous drugs with intent to sell, but he pleaded not guilty and moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the warrant lacked probable cause and was overbroad. The District Court determined that corroboration of the confidential informant's firsthand, detailed information by an anonymous tip weighed heavily in favor of the informant's reliability and provided a substantial basis for a finding of probable cause; therefore, the court refused to suppress the evidence. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied the totality of circumstances test set out in Ill. v. Gates, 462 US 213 (1983), to determine the sufficiency of the warrant application based on information supplied by anonymous or confidential informants, examining extensive case law. In obtaining a search warrant based on a tip from an anonymous informant or one based on hearsay, independent corroboration of the information is necessary. If an informant is not anonymous, but the information is not based on personal observation of the described criminal activity, independent corroboration is also required. In the case of a confidential informant with information based on personal observation, that person must have provided reliable and accurate information in the past in order for the information to serve as a basis for determining probable cause without further corroboration. If an informant makes an unequivocal admission against interest, further corroboration is unnecessary for warrant purposes. If an informant is motivated by good citizenship and the information demonstrates a sufficient degree of the nature of the circumstances under which the information became known, the informant's disclosures are considered a reliable basis for determining probable cause. A citizen informant is generally presumed reliable, and that reliability is shown by the very nature of the circumstances under which the incriminating evidence became known. Under the circumstances in Reesman's case, the confidential informant's information, which required further corroboration, could not serve as a source of independent corroboration or investigation that transformed the other informant's information into a basis for establishing probable cause. Thus, without further independent corroboration or investigation, the confidential informant's information in the search warrant application failed to supply the magistrate with the substantial basis for probable cause. The District Court erred in denying Reesman's motion to suppress the evidence, and the Supreme Court reversed. St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83, 57 St. Rep. 1017 (2000), distinguishing St. v. Rydberg, 239 M 70, 778 P2d 902 (1989), St. v. Deskins, 245 M 158, 799 P2d 1070 (1990), and St. v. Oleson, 1998 MT 130, 289 M 139, 959 P2d 503 (1998), and followed in St. v. Palmer, 2003 MT 129, 316 M 46, 68 P3d 809 (2003). See also St. v. Walston, 236 M 218, 768 P2d 1387 (1989), and St. v. Martinez, 2003 MT 65, 314 M 434, 67 P3d 207 (2003).

Staleness — Continuing Nature of Criminal Activity:

When criminal activity is continuing in nature, information that would be stale when considered individually carries greater weight in a probable cause determination when combined with more recent information. If information reveals "that the possession and distribution of dangerous drugs by a person is a protracted and continuing activity", the passage of time between prior conduct and the probable cause determination becomes less significant. Here, the informant's tips about Anderson's drug-related activities between 7 and 10 months prior to the search and seizure, drug-related arrests 5 years and again 7 months earlier, and discovery during the search of methamphetamine in the trailer where Anderson was staying demonstrated a pattern of continuous conduct and was not stale for purposes of determining probable cause. Thus, probable cause existed to believe that Anderson was committing an offense, but it was insufficient, standing alone, to justify a warrantless search. The case was reversed because the state failed to meet its burden of establishing that exigent circumstances existed to justify the warrantless search and, given the fact that although it may have been reasonable to detain Anderson under the circumstances, the search was conducted at midday, during regular business hours, and on a weekday, yet the officers did not approach one of the available judicial officers to obtain a warrant or to amend the existing warrant to properly authorize a search. St. v. Anderson, 1999 MT 60, 293 M 490, 977 P2d 983, 56 St. Rep. 252 (1999), following St. v. Wakeford, 1998 MT 16, 287 M 220, 953 P2d 1065, 55 St. Rep. 56 (1998), and followed in St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

Informant indicated that he had observed a marijuana growing operation on several occasions over the previous 5 months. The investigating officer stated that in his experience, such an operation was highly likely to stay in one location for a long time. The Supreme Court held that if a criminal activity is continuing in nature, a greater amount of time may elapse between the observation of the activity and the application for a search warrant without negating probable cause. St. v. Walston, 236 M 218, 768 P2d 1387, 46 St. Rep. 309 (1989), followed in St. v. Crowder, 248 M 169, 810 P2d 299, 48 St. Rep. 376 (1991), St. v. Rinehart, 262 M 204, 864 P2d 1219, 50 St. Rep. 1517 (1993), St. v. Hulbert, 265 M 317, 877 P2d 25, 51 St. Rep. 526 (1994), and St. v. Siegal, 281 M 250, 934 P2d 176, 54 St. Rep. 158 (1997).

Unproved Statements of Child Informant as Sole Basis for Issuance of Warrant: A child observed marijuana plants growing on Worrall's property and reported it to police. The child's observation was never corroborated by the police. Worrall averred that allowing a search of his property based on the uncorroborated claim of an unproved 11-year-old child, after only a 15-minute interview, was unreasonable and that the District Court erred in finding probable cause for the search warrant because unverified statements of an unproved informant, much less a child informant, could not serve as the sole basis for the issuance of the warrant. Citing St. v. Adams, 284 M 25, 943 P2d 955, 54 St. Rep. 717 (1997), the Supreme Court noted that corroboration of an informant's testimony through other sources is necessary only when the information is hearsay or the informant is anonymous. In this case, the child was not anonymous and the information was based on personal observation rather than hearsay, so corroboration was unnecessary. The court observed that information provided to police that is motivated by good citizenship is a reliable basis for determining probable cause and that nothing in the record indicated that the child's report should be viewed more critically than a similar report from an adult. Thus, the unproved statement of the child informant may serve as the sole basis for issuance of a search warrant. St. v. Worrall, 1999 MT 55, 293 M 439, 976 P2d 968, 56 St. Rep. 225 (1999). On remand, after excising the officer's distrustful statements from the search warrant application, the District Court concluded that probable cause existed based on the facts from the application that were consistent with the boy's testimony and that the warrant to search Worrall's property was properly issued, so Worrall's motion to suppress the evidence of the search was dismissed. Worrall appealed. The Supreme Court noted that probable cause must be determined exclusively from the four corners of the application and must be based on a determination of whether, given all the circumstances set forth in the application, there is a fair probability that contraband or evidence of a crime will be found in a certain place. Worrall did not challenge the truthfulness of any of the unexcised facts, and the boy's statements were presumed reliable in light of his sincerity, the fact that he had not previously been in trouble, and the fact that he voluntarily went to the Sheriff's office to report his observations. St. v. Worrall, 2001 MT 57, 304 M 341, 22 P3d 182 (2001).

Existence of Probable Cause for Search of Particular Location: Probable cause to believe that an offense has been committed by a suspect is a separate question from whether probable cause exists to search the suspect's residence; therefore, probable cause must exist for the search of the particular location for which the search warrant is obtained. The court issuing the search warrant is required to make a commonsense determination of whether, given the circumstances set forth in the warrant application, a fair probability exists that contraband or evidence related to a crime will be found in a particular place. Because a search warrant application did not establish the existence of that fair probability that evidence would be found in defendant's residence, even though a reliable informant provided information of defendant's suspected criminal activity, it was error to deny defendant's motion to suppress evidence obtained during the subsequent search of defendant's residence. St. v. Kaluza, 272 M 404, 901 P2d 107, 52 St. Rep. 795 (1995), following St. v. Crowder, 248 M 169, 810 P2d 299 (1991), and distinguished in St. v. Oleson, 1998 MT 130, 289 M 139, 959 P2d 503, 55 St. Rep. 517 (1998). See also St. v. Rinehart, 262 M 204, 864 P2d 1219 (1993), St. v. Kaluza, 262 M 360, 865 P2d 263 (1993), and St. v. Siegal, 281 M 250, 934 P2d 176, 54 St. Rep. 158 (1997).

No Showing of Informants' Veracity and Reliability or Basis for Information — Search Warrant Improperly Issued: A search warrant application that failed to establish the veracity and reliability of the informants and that, in addition, failed to indicate the basis for any of the informants' knowledge regarding defendant's criminal activities in relation to the residence to be searched could not be said to corroborate or verify the information with regard to the residence and thus provided no value in establishing probable cause for the issuance of the search warrant. St. v. Kaluza, 272 M 404, 901 P2d 107, 52 St. Rep. 795 (1995), distinguished in St. v. Adams, 284 M 25, 943 P2d 955, 54 St. Rep. 717 (1997).

Search of Home for Marijuana Based on Informant's Knowledge and Police Suspicions of Marijuana-Growing Operation: Probable cause to search a home was established when there was a fair probability of finding incriminating evidence. The search warrant and affidavit stated that the affiant was trained and experienced in the field of drug crimes, that a confidential informant had seen marijuana-growing operations in the home a number of times and had spoken with the occupants about the operations, and that two other officers had been to the home's front door on other matters and suspected that the operations were ongoing. In addition, the information supporting the warrant, which consisted mainly of events occurring during the 3 months prior to the warrant, was not stale, especially in view of the continuing nature of a marijuana-growing operation. St. v. Sarbaum, 270 M 176, 890 P2d 1284, 52 St. Rep. 133 (1995).

Corroboration of Victim's Statements: Defendant contended that a search warrant was issued without probable cause because law enforcement did not corroborate or confirm the testimony of the sex crime victim upon which the warrant was based. Although under St. v. Kelly, 205 M 417, 668 P2d 1032 (1983), corroboration may be necessary in cases in which police receive their information through an informant, a crime victim is not equivalent to an informant, and the same principles of corroboration do not apply. In this case, the issuance of a search warrant "upon application affirming the victim's statements to the police" was an adequate demonstration of probable cause. St. v. Steffes, 269 M 214, 887 P2d 1196, 51 St. Rep. 1463 (1994).

General Overview of Probable Cause Requirements: An application for a search warrant must state facts sufficient to show probable cause for issuance of the warrant, following the "totality of the circumstances" test set out in Ill. v. Gates, 462 US 213, 76 L Ed 2d 527, 103 S Ct 2317 (1983). Probable cause must be determined solely from the information contained within the four corners of the search warrant application. A determination of probable cause does not require a prima facie showing of criminal activity. Rather, the issuing magistrate must determine only that there is a probability of criminal activity. An affidavit supporting a search warrant is to be interpreted by the magistrate and examined by a reviewing court in a common sense, realistic fashion, avoiding hypertechnical interpretations. If a magistrate issues a search warrant after subjecting the application to the Gates test, a reviewing court must presume that decision to be correct. An application that provides a substantial basis for the probability that criminal activity is occurring is sufficient to establish probable cause. St. v. Rinehart, 262 M 204, 864 P2d 1219, 50 St. Rep. 1517 (1993), following St. v. O'Neill, 208 M 386, 679 P2d 760 (1984), St. v. Sundberg, 235 M 115, 765 P2d 736 (1988), St. v. Walston, 236 M 218, 768 P2d 1387 (1989), St. v. Seaman, 236 M 466, 771 P2d 950 (1989), St. v. Rydberg, 239 M 70, 778 P2d 902 (1989), and St. v. Baldwin, 242 M 176, 789 P2d 1215 (1990), and followed in St. v. Kaluza, 262 M 360, 865 P2d 263, 50 St. Rep. 1596 (1993), in which it was held that probable cause to search a residence does not follow simply from the existence of probable cause to believe a suspect is guilty, St. v. Siegal, 281 M 250, 934 P2d 176, 54 St. Rep. 158 (1997), St. v. Oleson, 1998 MT 130, 289 M 139, 959 P2d 503, 55 St. Rep. 517 (1998), St. v. Anderson, 1999 MT 60, 293 M 490, 977 P2d 983, 56 St. Rep. 252 (1999), and St. v. Gray, 2001 MT 250, 307 M 124, 38 P3d 775 (2001), and St. v. Barnaby, 2006 MT 203, 333 M 220, 142 P3d 809 (2006).

Totality of Circumstances — Search Sustained on Legally Obtained Evidence Supporting Search Warrant — Evidence Gathered by Ruse Irrelevant: Detectives were informed by a previously reliable confidential informant that Holstine conducted a marijuana growing operation in his house in the Big Sky area. The information provided by the informant about the location and description of Holstine's home was independently verified by detectives. Posing as a skier, one detective then gained entrance to Holstine's home, and smelled marijuana smoke inside the home. The same detective also smelled growing marijuana near an outside corner of Holstine's home and observed a boarded window near the place where the informant had said the growing operation was located inside Holstine's home. A search warrant was obtained based upon all of the information gathered by the detectives. Marijuana plants were confiscated from Holstine's home, and Holstine was convicted of felony possession of marijuana. The Supreme Court held that under the "totality of the circumstances" test adopted by St. v. Campbell, 254 M 425, 838 P2d 427 (1992), and St. v. Valley, 252 M 489, 830 P2d 1255 (1992), the information gained from the confidential informant, together with the testimony of the detective concerning the window and smell of marijuana from outside the residence, was sufficient information constituting probable cause to support the application for the search warrant. The information gained by the detectives by use of the skier ruse was of no value. St. v. Holstine, 260 M 310, 860 P2d 110, 50 St. Rep. 1063 (1993).

Stale Information, Lack of Informant Veracity, and Failure to Investigate as Insufficient Basis for Probable Cause — Motion to Suppress Proper: An application for a search warrant was based on five tips, including three that were stale, ranging in time and age from 11 months to over 7 years, and two that were anonymous and confidential Crimestoppers tips that did not allow for proper assessment of the credibility of the informant or his sources. None of the tips were subjected to prompt or adequate law enforcement investigation. The application did not contain sufficient facts and circumstances to meet the Gates test for probable cause, and a motion to suppress evidence seized as a result of the warrant should have been granted. St. v. Valley, 252 M 489, 830 P2d 1255, 49 St. Rep. 30 (1992), distinguished in St. v. Adams, 284 M 25, 943 P2d 955, 54 St. Rep. 717 (1997).

Personal Observation by Law Officer Sufficient to Establish Probable Cause: Defendants argued that the issuing judge went beyond the "four corners" of the warrant application to find probable cause for searching defendants' property for drugs because the application did not allege that the investigating officer had any training or experience in marijuana identification. However, questions of informant reliability and credibility were inapplicable because a law enforcement officer does not require the same accreditation as an unknown informant. In this case, personal observation by the law enforcement officer was sufficient to establish probable cause for issuing the warrant. St. v. Cope, 250 M 387, 819 P2d 1280, 48 St. Rep. 949 (1991).

Consistency of Informants' Details Adding to Totality of Circumstances — Prior Criminal Activity as Enhancement of Informant's Tip: Defendant contended that a search warrant issued on three informants' tips, a prior drug-related conviction, and a deputy's recollection that he smelled marijuana at defendant's home on a previous unrelated visit failed to provide a basis to conclude that probable cause existed for issuance of the warrant. The state, relying on U.S. v. Harris, 403 US 573, 29 L Ed 2d 723, 91 S Ct 2075 (1971), maintained that prior criminal activity of a similar nature, even if unverified, enhances an informant's tip that a person is presently engaged in criminal conduct so that under the totality of circumstances test, the issuing Justice of the Peace was entitled to consider the information presented in the search warrant application as a whole, including past offenses, when assessing probable cause. The Supreme Court agreed, holding that the degree of consistent detail provided by the informants not only added to the totality of circumstances to establish probable cause but also substantiated their reliability. St. v. Garberding, 245 M 356, 801 P2d 583, 47 St. Rep. 2157 (1990).

Information Provided by Investigating Officer as Reliable Basis for Warrant: Observations of fellow officers engaged in a common investigation are plainly a reliable basis for a warrant applied for by one of their number. It is sufficient if the affidavit recites at the outset, or if it is clear from reading the affidavit as a whole, that it is based in part upon information obtained from other law enforcement officers. Therefore, the hearsay nature of the link between information provided by an undersheriff to a detective did not invalidate the finding of probable cause. St. v. Seaman, 236 M 466, 771 P2d 950, 46 St. Rep. 512 (1989), following U.S. v. Ventresca, 380 US 102, 13 L Ed 2d 684, 85 S Ct 741 (1965), and U.S. v. Kirk, 781 F2d 1498 (11th Cir. 1986), and followed in St. v. Rinehart, 262 M 204, 864 P2d 1219, 50 St. Rep. 1517 (1993).

Reliability of Informants in Probable Cause Determination: An application for a warrant: (1) recounted informants' past production of reliable information; (2) stated that one informant had extensive knowledge of local drug trade; (3) contained explicit descriptions of defendant's drug dealings with informants; and (4) indicated one informant's knowledge of defendant's address. These facts demonstrated the veracity, reliability, and basis of knowledge of informants sufficient to show probable cause for the warrant. St. v. Seaman, 236 M 466, 771 P2d 950, 46 St. Rep. 512 (1989).

Informant's Tip — Admissions Against Interest: An investigating officer obtained a search warrant based on information from a self-admitted marijuana user. Before obtaining the warrant, the officer corroborated all the information through public records. A search of the respondent's residence resulted in the seizure of marijuana plants and materials used to cultivate marijuana. The District Court granted respondent's motion to suppress the evidence. The Supreme Court reversed and held that there was probable cause to support the warrant. The affidavit supporting the warrant was sufficient not only under the "totality of the circumstances" test, but also because the informant admitted his marijuana use. Admissions of crime, like admissions against proprietary interests, carry their own indicia of credibility—sufficient at least to support a finding of probable cause to search. St. v. Sundberg, 235 M 115, 765 P2d 736, 45 St. Rep. 2235 (1988), followed in St. v. Adams, 284 M 25, 943 P2d 955, 54 St. Rep. 717 (1997).

Probable Cause — Informant's Tip — "Totality of Circumstances" Test — "Four Corners of the Warrant Application": An investigating officer obtained a search warrant based on information from a self-admitted marijuana user. Before obtaining the warrant, the officer corroborated all the information through public records. A search of the respondent's residence resulted in the seizure of marijuana plants and materials used to cultivate marijuana. The District Court granted respondent's motion to suppress the evidence. The Supreme Court reversed and held that there was probable cause to support the warrant. To determine whether there is probable cause to issue a search warrant, one must look only at information contained in the four corners of the application. The test for determining probable cause for issuance of a search warrant is the "totality of the circumstances" test set forth in Ill. v. Gates, 462 US 213, 76 L Ed 2d 527, 103 S Ct 2317. Legally unimpeachable findings of probable cause may rest upon evidence that is not legally admissible at the criminal trial itself. After-the-fact scrutiny by the reviewing court should not take the form of de novo review. St. v. Sundberg, 235 M 115, 765 P2d 736, 45 St. Rep. 2235 (1988), followed in St. v. Crowder, 248 M 169, 810 P2d 299, 48 St. Rep. 376 (1991), St. v. Van Voast, 247 M 194, 805 P2d 1380, 48 St. Rep. 160 (1991), and in St. v. Rinehart, 262 M 204, 864 P2d 1219, 50 St. Rep. 1517 (1993). See also St. v. Mosley, 260 M 109, 860 P2d 69, 50 St. Rep. 675 (1993), St. v. Adams, 284 M 25, 943 P2d 955, 54 St. Rep. 717 (1997), and St. v. Oleson, 1998 MT 130, 289 M 139, 959 P2d 503, 55 St. Rep. 517 (1998).

Officer's Persistence in Obtaining Blood Sample Pursuant to Search Warrant — Within Scope of Employment: Collins was arrested for DUI but refused to submit to a chemical test. Upon learning that Collins was on probation for a prior DUI and for other non-DUI offenses, the arresting officer obtained a search warrant authorizing extraction of a blood sample. Collins later filed an action alleging assault and battery and violation of his constitutional rights. The District Court found the officer acted outside the scope of his employment and that the blood sample was unauthorized and contrary to 61-8-402(3). The Supreme Court reversed, finding it was clear the officer acted as he did to preserve evidence relating to non-DUI offenses and acted within the scope of his employment. Where law enforcement authorities have probable cause to believe an offense other than an underlying DUI has occurred for which a blood test is required to preserve evidence, a blood sample may be taken pursuant to a search warrant. Collins v. St., 232 M 73, 755 P2d 1373, 45 St. Rep. 878 (1988).

Informant's Tip — Gates Test Replaces Aguilar-Spinelli Test: Crain was convicted of a drug offense after issuance of a search warrant to search his motel room led to the discovery and seizure of drugs, paraphernalia, and drug records. Crain appealed, contending that the application of the Gates "totality of the circumstances" test should not be applied to determine the sufficiency of the evidence to issue a warrant and that neither the Gates nor Aguilar-Spinelli test was met. The Supreme Court held that there was sufficient information in the application for a magistrate to determine that there was a probability that drugs and records would be found in Crain's room. Additionally, the Gates "totality of the circumstances" test for determining the sufficiency of the evidence to issue a search warrant completely replaces the more stringent two-pronged Aguilar-Spinelli test. St. v. Crain, 223 M 167, 725 P2d 209, 43 St. Rep. 1628 (1986).

Probable Cause Not Negated by Passage of Time — Staleness as Dependent on Nature of Property Sought: Defendant in a homicide case contended that the applications for search warrants did not state facts sufficient to show probable cause, that the applications did not establish a nexus between the items sought, and that the information in the applications was stale. The Supreme Court, noting its decision in St. v. O'Neill, 208 M 386, 679 P2d 760, 41 St. Rep. 420 (1984), to draw all reasonable inferences to support the magistrate's determination, found substantial basis for concluding probable cause existed at the time the warrants were issued, including the fact that since staleness depends largely on the nature of the property sought, the passage of time alone (in this case 53 days after discovery of the body) may not negate probable cause. St. v. Pease, 222 M 455, 724 P2d 153, 43 St. Rep. 1417 (1986).

Anonymous Tip: In dicta, the Supreme Court stated that as a general rule it does not disapprove of the use of anonymous tips as an element in the determination of probable cause for a search warrant. St. v. Cain, 220 M 509, 717 P2d 15, 43 St. Rep. 568 (1986).

Insufficient Findings by Trial Court: In considering a motion to suppress evidence discovered during a search of the defendant's motel room, the trial judge made inadequate findings of fact; therefore, the matter was remanded for a second evidentiary hearing. The trial judge made no finding of whether the defendant knowingly exposed his motel room to the police officer; whether the officer intruded beyond any invitation extended by the defendant; whether, if the officer did intrude, the intrusion had any effect on what the officer was able to observe in the motel room; or what the officer could observe from his position at the doorway of the motel room. St. v. Wilson, 218 M 359, 708 P2d 270, 42 St. Rep. 1647 (1985).

Substantial Preliminary Showing of False Affidavit: The defendant satisfied the test adopted by the Supreme Court in St. v. Sykes, 194 M 14, 663 P2d 691, 40 St. Rep. 690 (1983), for challenging the validity of an affidavit used by law enforcement officers to obtain a search warrant. The defendant made a substantial preliminary showing that the state's affidavit was based on deliberate falsehood or reckless disregard for the truth. Thus, the trial judge did not err in considering evidence on this issue at the probable cause hearing. St. v. Wilson, 218 M 359, 708 P2d 270, 42 St. Rep. 1647 (1985). The Sykes standard was modified, inasmuch as a defendant need no longer prove that the person providing false information did so knowingly, intentionally, or with a reckless disregard for the truth before the false statements may be excised from the application or affidavit, in St. v. Worrall, 1999 MT 55, 293 M 439, 976 P2d 968, 56 St. Rep. 225 (1999).

Totality of Circumstances:

There was probable cause to issue a search warrant when the police officer's affidavit in support of the warrant indicated the following: (1) a citizen-informant reported that after some property had been stolen from her, she was approached by an individual who told her he had been involved in the theft and that he had traded some of her property for drugs at a trailer (the location for which the search warrant was later issued); (2) the citizen-informant told police that she had retrieved some of her stolen property at the trailer; (3) the police officer had known the citizen-informant for a number of years and believed her to be reliable; (4) the citizen-informant had been told by another person that he had traded a rifle for drugs at the trailer; (5) a neighbor of the trailer's residents reported to police that he believed that drugs were being sold from the trailer; and (6) another neighbor had made similar complaints to the police, including a complaint of a high rate of traffic in the area of the trailer. St. v. Jensen, 217 M 272, 704 P2d 45, 42 St. Rep. 1191 (1985).

Chubb observed a vehicle on a single-lane road that provided access to a house. Since it was uncommon to see a vehicle on the road, Chubb stopped it to talk to the driver. It was later learned that the house had been burglarized. The vehicle was identified as belonging to the defendant, and a receipt with the defendant's name on it was found at the burglarized house. An investigation revealed that the defendant's residence had several tarps spread on the ground covering unknown personal property and a temporary structure had recently been constructed, apparently used for storage of personal property. The defendant was seen outside a tavern in Idaho known as a place for fencing stolen property. Based on the foregoing information, a search warrant was issued. The defendant made a motion to suppress the fruits of the search, asserting that there had been insufficient probable cause to search the defendant's premises. In the instant case, the totality of the circumstances as expressed in the application for search warrant supported the decision of the magistrate that there was a fair probability that evidence of a crime would be found in a particular place. St. v. Pierre, 208 M 430, 678 P2d 650, 41 St. Rep. 445 (1984).

Probable Cause Contained Within Four Corners of Officer's Affidavit: The information contained in Sergeant Harada's affidavit satisfied the probable cause test set forth in Ill. v. Gates, 462 US 213, 76 L Ed 2d 527, 103 S Ct 2317 (1983). It included information concerning the time, date, and place where drugs could be found; the kind and intended use of drugs; and an accurate description of defendant's car and defendant's travel plans. It also stated that the informant had been present when defendant used drugs; that defendant personally told informant he was going to transport drugs to Great Falls on January 25, 1984; and that informant was believed to be reliable because of reliable information previously provided by him to the police. Finding probable cause, the Supreme Court reversed the District Court with an admonition to the Justice of the Peace who issued the search warrant to refrain from conducting conversations with the officer making application that elicit oral responses not recorded on the face of the affidavit and possibly tainting the warrant issued. St. v. Hendrickson, 217 M 1, 701 P2d 1368, 42 St. Rep. 981 (1985).

Probable Cause Established By Defendant's Record and Informant's Information: When the affidavit in support of an application for a search warrant indicated that: (1) defendant had allegedly been arrested in 1975 for possession of marijuana; (2) in 1977, 347 grams of marijuana had allegedly been found in defendant's laundry; (3) in 1978, an informant had advised law enforcement officers that defendant possessed a large quantity of cocaine and had distributed it to the informant; (4) in January and February of 1982, defendant had associated with Fitzgibbons, who became in May 1982 a fugitive on charges connected with distribution of cocaine; (5) in June 1982, law officers learned that defendant had distributed cocaine to several people at his residence; (6) 2 days before the search an informant advised a law officer that Fitzgibbons was coming to defendant's town; and (7) on the day of the search the same informant had seen Fitzgibbons at defendant's house twice and had smelled marijuana in the home, there was probable cause to issue a search warrant to search for Fitzgibbons or contraband. St. v. O'Neill, 208 M 386, 679 P2d 760, 41 St. Rep. 420 (1984).

Informant's Self-Verifying Tip — Aquilar-Spinelli and Gates Tests: A search warrant was based upon a tip from an informant (who was reliable in three previous tips), and part of the tip resulted in the seizure of marijuana from a car specifically described in the tip and that had apparently originated from the defendant's residence. There was sufficient probable cause to issue a search warrant for the search of the defendant's residence under the Aquilar-Spinelli test because there was sufficient "self-verifying" detail in the tip to inform the issuing magistrate of the circumstances underlying the informant's basis of knowledge and the informant's specific information, corroborated by the details concerning the automobile, was sufficient evidence of the informant's veracity. Since the stringent requirements of the Aquilar-Spinelli test were met, probable cause also existed under the "totality of the circumstances" test set forth in Illinois v. Gates, 462 US 213, 76 L Ed 2d 527, 103 S Ct 2317, 51 U.S.L.W. 4709 (1983). St. v. Erler, 207 M 88, 672 P2d 624, 40 St. Rep. 1915 (1983).

Date and Knowing Commission of Offense — Omission of Allegations Not Fatal to Affidavit: Where a search warrant was issued upon an affidavit that failed to allege that the defendant "knowingly" committed the offense of possession of a dangerous drug and alleged a date of its commission only in the alternative, the District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to suppress the evidence as gained from a search warrant for which there was no probable cause. The evidence sufficient to establish probable cause for a search warrant is significantly less than that required to support a conviction. The affidavit showed that the UPS package accepted by the defendant contained the drug in Hawaii and in Montana before it was delivered to the defendant. Thus, the failure of the affidavit to allege that the defendant knew his package contained hashish did not invalidate the search warrant. Because the affidavit alleged a time and dates in the alternative (12:10 p.m. on either April 6 or 7, 1981) on which the offense was committed, a doubtful basis of fact such as to defeat the affidavit was not created. St. v. Kelly, 205 M 417, 668 P2d 1032, 40 St. Rep. 1400 (1983).

Test for Determining Sufficiency of Affidavit Based on Hearsay — Affidavit Held Sufficient: Where the defendant challenged the sufficiency of an affidavit supporting an application for a search warrant on the basis that the affidavit contained hearsay based on hearsay statements of a federal inspector and a drug agent in Hawaii that were relayed to the affiant, the District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to quash the evidence as obtained under a warrant for which there was no probable cause. The facts alleged in the affidavit showed both the underlying circumstances as to how the affiant believed the hashish was where he believed it to be, and also showed the circumstances why the affiant believed his hearsay sources, in this case two federal officers, were reliable; and the affidavit therefore satisfied both the two-pronged test for use of hearsay statements established in Aguilar v. Texas, 378 US 108, 12 L Ed 2d 723, 84 S Ct 1509 (1964), and Spinelli v. U.S., 393 US 410, 21 L Ed 2d 637, 89 S Ct 584 (1969), and the more common sense "totality of the circumstances" test announced in Illinois v. Gates, 462 US 213, 76 L Ed 2d 527, 103 S Ct 2317 (1983). St. v. Kelly, 205 M 417, 668 P2d 1032, 40 St. Rep. 1400 (1983).

Disclosure of Informant's Identity — Challenge to Informant's Statements: A defendant in a drug offense case moved to quash a search warrant and to produce the name of the informant whose statements were used in the affidavit in support of the search warrant. Defendant alleged that either the informant had made false statements or the informant had made an illegal entry into defendant's home. In a proceeding for Writ of Supervisory Control, the Supreme Court set forth the procedure to be used to challenge the validity of an affidavit on the basis of deliberate falsehood or of reckless disregard for the truth. First, the defendant must make a substantial preliminary showing that his rights have been violated. Second, if defendant makes the requisite preliminary showing, then the affidavit must be examined to determine if sufficient information remains after excising the challenged material to support a finding of probable cause. Only if the remaining content is insufficient is defendant entitled to an evidentiary hearing. Finally, at the hearing defendant must establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the affidavit was based on an illegal entry, false information, or insufficient probable cause. If defendant is successful, that evidence will be suppressed. Defendant is not entitled to disclosure of the informant's identity until he has made a substantial preliminary showing that the entry was illegal or the information was false. St. v. Sykes, 194 M 14, 663 P2d 691, 40 St. Rep. 690 (1983).

Matters Before District Court, but Not Magistrate at Issuance of Warrant: The District Court erred in upholding a search when it considered as probable cause matters testified to by police but not contained in the information available to the magistrate issuing the warrant. The only information given the Justice of the Peace was the search warrant and the search warrant application, which did not on their face contain probable cause for the issuance of the search warrant. St. v. Isom, 196 M 330, 641 P2d 417, 39 St. Rep. 137 (1982), followed with regard to applicability of the four corners of the warrant application in St. v. Van Voast, 247 M 194, 805 P2d 1380, 48 St. Rep. 160 (1991).

Insufficient Facts: A search warrant premised on two factors, photographs taken of defendant's yard by a Sheriff's detective and a sample of marijuana illegally obtained by an inquisitive neighbor, was not based on sufficient competent facts. Since it was virtually impossible by careful scrutiny of the photographs alone to either locate or identify any substance which would give credibility to the existence of marijuana, the search warrant was, in fact, based solely on an illegally obtained sample. St. v. Helfrich, 183 M 484, 600 P2d 816 (1979).

Writing Required — Hearsay: The information relied upon to establish probable cause must be in writing. Hearsay evidence may be sufficient to establish probable cause to support a search warrant, but the person making the application must provide the issuing magistrate with additional facts which will permit the magistrate to determine whether probable cause exists. The magistrate must be informed of some of the underlying circumstances from which the informant concluded that the narcotics were where he claimed they were and from which the applicant concluded that the informant was credible or his information reliable. Thomson v. Onstad, 182 M 119, 594 P2d 1137 (1979).

Odor of Marijuana Insufficient: The odor of burning marijuana does not by itself establish probable cause to issue a search warrant. Smell alone is not sufficient to justify the invasion of the privacy of one's home. St. v. Olson, 180 M 151, 589 P2d 663 (1979), distinguished in St. v. O'Neill, 208 M 386, 679 P2d 760, 41 St. Rep. 420 (1984).

Probability Sufficient: To constitute probable cause for arrest or issuance of a search warrant "only a probability of criminal conduct need be shown". St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978), quoting State ex rel. Garris v. Wilson, 162 M 256, 511 P2d 15 (1973).

Sworn Testimony Supporting Affidavit: The Supreme Court rejected the defendant's contention that search warrants were invalid for failure on the part of the County Attorney to swear or affirm and reduce the supporting testimony to writing, when there was, in effect, sworn testimony by the County Attorney and Deputy Sheriff in addition to an affidavit, the combination of which established probable cause. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978). See also St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

"Mere Informant" Distinguished From "Citizen Informant": An application for a search warrant based on hearsay is insufficient if it does not show the credibility of a "mere informant" or contain facts or circumstances showing the informant to be a disinterested eyewitness, motivated by good citizenship, openly in the aid of law enforcement as a "citizen informant". St. v. Flynn, 176 M 441, 578 P2d 1165 (1978); St. v. Leistiko, 176 M 434, 578 P2d 1161 (1978).

Facts Sufficient — Oral Examination to Establish Reliability: While the general rule is that an affidavit for a search warrant cannot be supplemented by oral statements to the issuing magistrate, the rule requires only that the affidavit allege facts which, if true, give probable cause to search; it does not prohibit the magistrate's oral examination of the informant to determine his reliability. St. v. Thomson, 169 M 158, 545 P2d 1070 (1976).

Informant's Oral Testimony to Establish Reliability: When an affidavit for a search warrant is wholly sufficient to establish probable cause but is based on hearsay from an untested informant, the reliability of that informant may be checked by a magistrate and informant's oral testimony to the magistrate is not considered as supplementing probable cause to support the affidavit, but merely as providing a direct test of the informant's reliability as to the hearsay contained in the affidavit. St. v. Thomson, 169 M 158, 545 P2d 1070 (1976).

Sufficiency of Affidavit for Warrant: Contemporaneous oral declarations to a magistrate cannot be used to bolster an insufficient affidavit in the attempt to establish probable cause, unless such declarations are sworn, signed, reduced to writing, and made a part of the affidavit for the issuance of the search warrant. An affidavit which omits reference to the time of the criminal event cannot establish probable cause and is therefore deficient. State ex rel. Townsend v. District Court, 168 M 357, 543 P2d 193 (1975).

Third-Hand Information — Credible: The affidavit of a police officer, who had acquired information from a military investigator, who had acquired his information from a known and reliable informer, was of sufficient credibility to constitute probable cause for a search warrant. Longsworth v. District Court, 165 M 539, 530 P2d 462 (1974).

Failure to State Why Credible: The statement in the affidavit that a source of known reliability had told police that the defendant would be traveling with cocaine and other drugs in his possession was not sufficient to establish probable cause since the magistrate must be informed of some of the underlying circumstances from which the officer could conclude that the testimony of the anonymous informant was credible and his information reliable. St. v. Thorsness, 165 M 321, 528 P2d 692 (1974).

Verification by Other Sources: The affidavit for a search warrant, which was based on the statements of an anonymous informer and did not establish the credibility of the informer but was verified by two other sources of information, established sufficient probable cause for the issuance of the search warrant. St. v. Paschke, 165 M 231, 527 P2d 569 (1974).

Connection Between Defendant and Activity Insufficient: The application for a search warrant was defective, notwithstanding it informed the issuing justice of criminal activity in a certain room of the house, since the only connection between the defendant and the activity described was that he had a room in the house. State ex rel. Garris v. Wilson, 162 M 256, 511 P2d 15 (1973), distinguished in St. v. Paschke, 165 M 231, 527 P2d 569 (1974).

Stolen Property in Plain Sight: Stolen property in plain sight which is discovered by police during the lawful impounding of a vehicle may be used as the basis of probable cause for issuance of a search warrant. State ex rel. Wilson v. District Court, 159 M 439, 498 P2d 1217 (1972).

Hearsay From Reliable Informants: An affidavit based on hearsay from reliable and credible informants with no felony convictions was sufficient. St. v. Troglia, 157 M 22, 482 P2d 143 (1971).

Judge's Personal Knowledge and Witnesses' Observations Insufficient: There was not probable cause for the issuance of a search warrant for burglar tools and illegal drugs based on the judge's personal knowledge of the accused's reputation and witnesses' observations of a pillow and bags in his car from which the accused drew a gun. St. v. Bentley, 156 M 129, 477 P2d 345 (1970).

Sufficient Facts: The evidence was held to establish probable cause for a search and seizure. In re Herter, 30 F2d 968 (9th Cir. 1929), modified in 33 F2d 400 (9th Cir. 1929).

Facts Necessary to Establish:

An application for a search warrant must set forth sufficient facts to enable a judicial officer to see that probable cause for its issuance exists. State ex rel. Baracker v. District Court, 75 M 476, 244 P 280 (1926); State ex rel. Thibodeau v. District Court, 70 M 202, 224 P 866 (1924); State ex rel. Samlin v. District Court, 59 M 600, 198 P 362 (1921).

The circumstances justifying the issuance of a search warrant must create a reasonable belief that probable cause exists and must be as strong as those which would warrant the institution of a criminal charge for an arrest on such a charge without warrant. State ex rel. Stange v. District Court, 71 M 125, 227 P 576 (1924).

PARTICULARITY

Seized Evidence Not Considered "Other Evidence of a Crime" Not Subject to Suppression: Cotterell moved to suppress evidence of illegal hunting activity that was seized under a search warrant that allowed seizure of numerous hunting-related items, but also allowed seizure of "any other evidence of a crime", on grounds that the warrant was overbroad. The motion was denied. On appeal, the state conceded that the phrase "any other evidence of a crime" was overbroad (see St. v. Seader, 1999 MT 290, 297 M 60, 990 P2d 180 (1999), and Hauge v. District Court, 2001 MT 255, 307 M 195, 36 P3d 947 (2001)) but asserted that journals and calendars found in searching Cotterell's property were directly related to the crimes being investigated and thus were not subject to suppression. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. Although the journals and calendars were not specifically mentioned in the warrant, they were found during execution of a validly executed warrant in places that could lawfully be searched, were found in the course of a search for items that were specifically set out in the warrant, and were related to hunting and fishing activities. Even if the overbroad phrase was excised from the warrant, the journals and calendars were within the scope of the warrant, so denial of the motion to suppress was affirmed. St. v. Cotterell, 2008 MT 409, 347 M 231, 198 P3d 254 (2008).

References in Search Warrant to Currency and Items Connected With Illegal Drug Activity in Violation of Chapter of Code Sufficient: Payne, who was driving a rental car, was stopped for speeding and subsequently arrested for driving under the influence. During the stop, based on observations, the officer asked Payne if he was carrying drugs or large amounts of cash, and Payne responded that he was not. Payne also stated that he was traveling from Pittsburgh to Seattle to visit his children and flying back. The officer was suspicious because Payne was driving thousands of miles to visit but flying back after only a few hours. Payne was transported to the Sheriff's office, the vehicle was towed, and the rental company was notified. The rental company immediately terminated its contract with Payne under terms of the agreement and requested that Payne's personal items be removed from the car so that the company could have someone retrieve the vehicle. Payne subsequently consented to a search of the car, but officers obtained a warrant covering Payne's property that was found in the car. When removing Payne's property, the officer found some drugs and paraphernalia in plain view and removed a toolbox from the trunk. The toolbox contained $129,970. A petition for forfeiture was filed for the funds in the toolbox, and Payne argued that the petition should be dismissed, claiming that the search of the vehicle was illegal because the search warrant was not particular enough with respect to items to be seized because it referred to currency and items connected to illegal drug activity in violation of Title 45, ch. 9. The Supreme Court held that there was sufficient probable cause to issue the search warrant and that the warrant was not overbroad because a more precise description of the items to be seized was not possible because officers could not know in advance the type or amounts of currency or the type or amounts of drugs that the search might uncover. St. v. $129,970.00 in U.S. Currency, 2007 MT 148, 337 M 475, 161 P3d 816 (2007).

Catchall Phrase in Warrant — Particularity Requirement — Suppression of Only Articles Seized Pursuant to Invalid Portions of Search Warrant: A lawful search warrant authorized officers to search Hauge's mobile home and seize drugs, drug paraphernalia, records of drug transactions, weapons, and the proceeds of drug transactions, including "anything else of value furnished or intended to be furnished in the exchange of controlled substances". Hauge argued that the catchall phrase "anything else of value" rendered the warrant overbroad and invalid and that any evidence seized pursuant to the warrant must be suppressed. After initially citing the requirement that a search warrant must particularly describe who or what is to be seized, the Supreme Court noted that in St. v. Seader, 1999 MT 290, 297 M 60, 990 P2d 180 (1999), warrant language authorizing seizure of anything else of value was a catchall phrase encompassing everything conceivable, giving officers unbridled discretion to engage in a general exploratory rummaging without any guidance in distinguishing between items that could and could not be seized and that the language rendered the warrant facially overbroad and all fruits of the search inadmissible. However, the court also noted the adoption of the doctrine of severance, explained in U.S. v. Gomez-Soto, 723 F2d 649 (9th Cir. 1984), which provides that invalid portions of a search warrant may be stricken and valid portions preserved and that only articles seized pursuant to the invalid portions of the warrant need be suppressed. In Hauge's case, officers acting pursuant to a lawfully issued and otherwise sufficiently particularized warrant did not seize any property related to the catchall phrase and no criminal charges resulted from the presence of the catchall language in the warrant. The overbroad catchall clause was thus severable, and because no evidence was seized pursuant to the clause, no evidence was subject to suppression. Hauge v. District Court, 2001 MT 255, 307 M 195, 36 P3d 947 (2001). See also St. v. Kuneff, 1998 MT 287, 291 M 474, 970 P2d 556 (1998).

Warrant Authorizing Search for "Anything Else of Value" as Overbroad: Authorities suspected that Seader's van would contain drugs and drug-related evidence, and a search warrant was issued in part authorizing the seizure of "proceeds of drug sales whether in monies, precious metals, property or anything else of value furnished or intended to be furnished in the exchange for the evidence or contraband relating to the use, sale or manufacture of dangerous drugs". Seader moved to suppress the results of the search, including a stolen ATV discovered in the van. The Supreme Court noted that the specificity required of a search warrant may vary depending on the circumstances and the type of items involved and that generic categories or general descriptions of items are not necessarily invalid if a more precise description of items to be seized is not possible. However, the language in this warrant authorizing seizure of "anything else of value" was a catchall phrase encompassing everything conceivable, giving officers unbridled discretion to engage in a general exploratory rummaging in Seader's belongings without any guidance in distinguishing between items that could and could not be seized. The language rendered the warrant facially overbroad and all fruits of the search inadmissible. St. v. Seader, 1999 MT 290, 297 M 60, 990 P2d 180, 56 St. Rep. 1165 (1999). See also Coolidge v. N.H., 403 US 443, 29 L Ed 2d 564, 91 S Ct 2022 (1971), U.S. v. Leary, 846 F2d 592 (10th Cir. 1988), and St. v. Perrone, 834 P2d 611 (Wash. 1992). However, see Hauge v. District Court, 2001 MT 255, 307 M 195, 36 P3d 947 (2001), in which it was held that when faced with a lawfully issued and otherwise sufficiently particularized warrant, the overbroad catchall phrase should be severed and only evidence seized under that clause need be suppressed.

Application and Search Warrant in Combination Describing Thing to Be Seized — Same Officer Applying for and Serving Warrant: A search warrant, standing alone, would be invalid for its failure to particularly describe the thing to be seized, which thing was described only in the application for the search warrant. The application and the warrant when read in combination adequately described the thing to be seized. If the warrant had been directed to an officer other than the officer who made and signed the application, it would have been invalid; however, in this case the same officer signed the application, served the warrant, and seized the contraband. The District Court properly denied defendant's motion to suppress even though the warrant was constitutionally defective. St. v. Peterson, 227 M 503, 741 P2d 392, 44 St. Rep. 1268 (1987).

Sufficient Description of Premises to Be Searched: The search warrant was of insufficient particularity. St. v. Ballew, 163 M 257, 516 P2d 1159 (1973).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute preserves the former requirement that a search warrant specify the peace officer who will conduct the search. The Commission discussed this provision at length and decided it should be retained. The provision that an executing officer be named in the warrant reflects a desire to limit the search to the discovery of the thing that is the object of the search. The requirement that the officer be named presumes that the officer will have knowledge of the place to be searched and the object to be seized.

Case Notes

Failure to Fill in Name of Officer Obtaining Warrant Not Grounds for Suppression of Evidence: The defendant appealed his conviction on the basis that the evidence obtained under a search warrant should have been suppressed because the space for the name of the officer applying for the warrant had been left blank in the heading of the warrant. The Supreme Court held that the omission did not substantially affect the defendant's rights and that to suppress evidence when the officer applied for the warrant, served the warrant, and executed the return of service for the warrant would be an irrational result. The Supreme Court also indicated that the requirement that the officer be named presumes that the officer will have knowledge of the area to be searched and is therefore more than a formality and that the nonconformity must be carefully examined to see if the interests of the defendant have been compromised. St. v. Pipkin, 1998 MT 143, 289 M 240, 961 P2d 733, 55 St. Rep. 567 (1998).

46-5-224. What may be seized with search warrant.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute reflects both 1987 MCA 46-5-203 and Rule 41(b) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Both the 1987 code and the federal rule provide for the search and seizure of evidence of criminal activity and of contraband, other things criminally possessed, and items used in committing a criminal offense. The 1987 code and this statute are substantially similar except for subsection (3).

Montana's 1987 code did not provide for the search and seizure of a criminal offender. Subsection (3) permits a search warrant to issue for a person for whom there is probable cause for arrest and for a person against whom an arrest warrant has already been issued. Under this statute, practice and procedure should not change but the authorization for such a search warrant will be express.

The 1987 code allowed a warrant to issue whereby officers could search for and seize a kidnap victim. See 1987 MCA 46-5-203(3). This statute allows similar search warrants for persons who are unlawfully restrained. While this statute broadens the applicability of the search warrant, it should not affect established procedure because unlawful restraint is an element of kidnapping.

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter 38,] section 108-3(a) and (b).

The intent of this provision is to set out as expansively as possible the items which may be seized under a search warrant. This section basically codifies present law established by federal and state cases. (See State v. Bisaccia, 213 A.2d 185.)

This provision does not eliminate the necessity of "particularly describing" the place to be searched or the things to be seized as is required by [46-5-201 (now repealed)], the Montana Constitution [1889], Art. III, section 7 [now Art. II, sec. 11, 1972 Mont. Const.], and the United States Constitution, Amendment 4.

The courts are not clear and exacting as to the requirement of description. Describing an apartment building generally, and not an explicit apartment is not sufficient. People v. Estrada, 44 Cal. Rptr. 165. Where books are to be seized the most "scrupulous exactitude" must be used when the basis for their seizure is ideas which they contain. Stanford v. Texas, 85 S. Ct. 506. Thus a determination of particular description necessary to meet the statutory and constitutional requirements may be made only in view of the facts and circumstances of the particular case.

1991 Amendment: Substituted introductory clause that reads: "A warrant may be issued under this section to search for and seize any" for "A search warrant may authorize the seizure of the following"; inserted (1) listing "evidence"; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) any instruments, articles, or things which are the fruits of, have been used in the commission of, or may constitute evidence of any offense"; in (3) substituted present language concerning person subject to arrest for "any person who has been kidnapped in violation of the laws of this state or who has been kidnapped in another jurisdiction and is now concealed within this state"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Seized Evidence Not Considered "Other Evidence of a Crime" Not Subject to Suppression: Cotterell moved to suppress evidence of illegal hunting activity that was seized under a search warrant that allowed seizure of numerous hunting-related items, but also allowed seizure of "any other evidence of a crime", on grounds that the warrant was overbroad. The motion was denied. On appeal, the state conceded that the phrase "any other evidence of a crime" was overbroad (see St. v. Seader, 1999 MT 290, 297 M 60, 990 P2d 180 (1999), and Hauge v. District Court, 2001 MT 255, 307 M 195, 36 P3d 947 (2001)) but asserted that journals and calendars found in searching Cotterell's property were directly related to the crimes being investigated and thus were not subject to suppression. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. Although the journals and calendars were not specifically mentioned in the warrant, they were found during execution of a validly executed warrant in places that could lawfully be searched, were found in the course of a search for items that were specifically set out in the warrant, and were related to hunting and fishing activities. Even if the overbroad phrase was excised from the warrant, the journals and calendars were within the scope of the warrant, so denial of the motion to suppress was affirmed. St. v. Cotterell, 2008 MT 409, 347 M 231, 198 P3d 254 (2008).

Reasonable Relationship Between Items Seized and Motive for Crimes Charged — Scope of Warrant Not Exceeded: Bar-Jonah was charged with impersonating a police officer and carrying a stun gun. During a search of Bar-Jonah's residence, police seized cameras, photo albums, film negatives, and various other items that Bar-Jonah contended were not related to the charges in the search warrant. Bar-Jonah's motion to suppress the items was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Relying on U.S. v. Clark, 31 F3d 831 (9th Cir. 1994), Bar-Jonah contended that allowing the seizure of fruits and instrumentalities of the offense was overbroad; however, in St. v. Quigg, 155 M 119, 467 P2d 692 (1970), the Supreme Court held that items may be seized if there is a reasonable relationship between the items and the motive for the charged crime and that it is sufficient to establish a fair probability that items sought in a warrant application are connected to that crime. In this case, based on all the facts and circumstances, the items were reasonably related to the criminal behavior enumerated in the warrant application and to Bar-Jonah's motive for impersonating a police officer and carrying a stun gun. Additionally, under Andresen v. Md., 427 US 463 (1976), the fact that items seized may later be used to form an evidentiary basis of another charge does not require suppression of the evidence. St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

Catchall Phrase in Warrant — Particularity Requirement — Suppression of Only Articles Seized Pursuant to Invalid Portions of Search Warrant: A lawful search warrant authorized officers to search Hauge's mobile home and seize drugs, drug paraphernalia, records of drug transactions, weapons, and the proceeds of drug transactions, including "anything else of value furnished or intended to be furnished in the exchange of controlled substances". Hauge argued that the catchall phrase "anything else of value" rendered the warrant overbroad and invalid and that any evidence seized pursuant to the warrant must be suppressed. After initially citing the requirement that a search warrant must particularly describe who or what is to be seized, the Supreme Court noted that in St. v. Seader, 1999 MT 290, 297 M 60, 990 P2d 180 (1999), warrant language authorizing seizure of anything else of value was a catchall phrase encompassing everything conceivable, giving officers unbridled discretion to engage in a general exploratory rummaging without any guidance in distinguishing between items that could and could not be seized and that the language rendered the warrant facially overbroad and all fruits of the search inadmissible. However, the court also noted the adoption of the doctrine of severance, explained in U.S. v. Gomez-Soto, 723 F2d 649 (9th Cir. 1984), which provides that invalid portions of a search warrant may be stricken and valid portions preserved and that only articles seized pursuant to the invalid portions of the warrant need be suppressed. In Hauge's case, officers acting pursuant to a lawfully issued and otherwise sufficiently particularized warrant did not seize any property related to the catchall phrase and no criminal charges resulted from the presence of the catchall language in the warrant. The overbroad catchall clause was thus severable, and because no evidence was seized pursuant to the clause, no evidence was subject to suppression. Hauge v. District Court, 2001 MT 255, 307 M 195, 36 P3d 947 (2001). See also St. v. Kuneff, 1998 MT 287, 291 M 474, 970 P2d 556 (1998).

Nude Photographs Within Scope of Tax Evasion Search Warrant: Agents of the Department of Revenue obtained a search warrant for the search of the home of John and Jane Doe for the purpose of obtaining evidence of failure to report income derived from insurance and firearms sales. In executing the warrant, agents found an envelope that they opened. They discovered nude photos of John and Jane Doe, some of which led to an investigation for child abuse of the parties' children. The Does brought an action for invasion of privacy, claiming that the search of the envelope was outside the scope of the search warrant. The Supreme Court held that under the rationale of U.S. v. Ross, 456 US 798 (1982), and Stanley v. Ga., 394 US 557 (1969), the state's motion to dismiss the complaint was properly granted. The envelope could have contained photographic evidence of illegal dealing in firearms, of which the Does were suspected. The search of the envelope was therefore within the scope of the warrant. Doe v. St., 256 M 348, 846 P2d 1018, 50 St. Rep. 105 (1993).

Application of Inadvertent Discovery Rule: The cautious actions of law enforcement officials in seeking to protect the validity of a search warrant should not invalidate the inadvertent seizure of evidence or contraband when the officers conducting the search adhere to the intent contained in the warrant. St. v. Hembd, 235 M 361, 767 P2d 864, 46 St. Rep. 55 (1989), following U.S. v. $10,000 in U.S. Currency, 780 F2d 213 (2nd Cir. 1986). St. v. Hembd was overruled in part in St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996).

Seizure of Items Not Described in Search Warrant: Based on an informant's tip, a search warrant was issued for respondent's home, and marijuana plants and materials used to cultivate marijuana were seized. The District Court granted respondent's motion to suppress, and the Supreme Court reversed, holding that there was probable cause to support the warrant. Items or things other than those described in the warrant may be seized so long as a reasonable relationship is demonstrated between the search authorized by the warrant and the seizure of the thing not described. St. v. Sundberg, 235 M 115, 765 P2d 736, 45 St. Rep. 2235 (1988).

Officer's Persistence in Obtaining Blood Sample Pursuant to Search Warrant — Within Scope of Employment: Collins was arrested for DUI but refused to submit to a chemical test. Upon learning that Collins was on probation for a prior DUI and for other non-DUI offenses, the arresting officer obtained a search warrant authorizing extraction of a blood sample. Collins later filed an action alleging assault and battery and violation of his constitutional rights. The District Court found the officer acted outside the scope of his employment and that the blood sample was unauthorized and contrary to 61-8-402(3). The Supreme Court reversed, finding it was clear the officer acted as he did to preserve evidence relating to non-DUI offenses and acted within the scope of his employment. Where law enforcement authorities have probable cause to believe an offense other than an underlying DUI has occurred for which a blood test is required to preserve evidence, a blood sample may be taken pursuant to a search warrant. Collins v. St., 232 M 73, 755 P2d 1373, 45 St. Rep. 878 (1988).

Federal Constitutional Requirement of Search Warrant Prior to Entry Into Home to Conduct Search or Make Arrest: A search warrant cannot be obtained under 46-5-203 (renumbered as this section) for the purpose of searching for and seizing a person unless that person has been kidnapped. Although 46-6-104(3) and 46-6-401(3) (renumbered 46-6-210) would have permitted entry into respondent's home to arrest a fugitive without a search warrant, entry into a home to conduct a search or make an arrest has been held by the U.S. Supreme Court in Steagald v. U.S., 451 US 204, 68 L Ed 2d 38, 101 S Ct 1642 (1981), to be unreasonable under the fourth amendment to the United States Constitution unless done pursuant to a warrant. Therefore, compliance with 46-6-104(3) or 46-6-401(3) (renumbered 46-6-210) would not be sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the fourth amendment. St. v. O'Neill, 208 M 386, 679 P2d 760, 41 St. Rep. 420 (1984).

Seizure of "Mere Evidence" Not Described in Warrant: Given a lawful search, some items may be seized in connection with the search which are not described in the warrant. The seizure of two license plates bearing the defendant's nickname and a letter addressed to the defendant at the place illegal drugs were found was permissible because the items tended to show the defendant's dominion and control over the premises and were therefore reasonably related to the search authorized by the warrant. St. v. Meader, 184 M 32, 601 P2d 386 (1979).

Items Reasonably Related to Search: All that is needed to meet the requirements of specificity is that the officer with reasonable effort can ascertain, if possible, the automobile intended to be searched and its owner. Items other than those specifically described in the search warrant may be seized as long as a reasonable relationship is demonstrated between the search authorized in the warrant and seizure of the items not specifically described therein. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

Description of Place and Property: The search warrant sufficiently described the objects to be seized. St. v. Meidinger, 160 M 310, 502 P2d 58 (1972), distinguished in St. v. Ballew, 163 M 257, 516 P2d 1159 (1973).

The section does not change the present law. The 10-day limit was retained because it was thought to give the officer sufficient leeway as a practical matter, and at the same time deny him unbridled discretion.

Search Warrant Executed within Ten Days of Issuance Not Stale: Neely argued that the warrant authorizing the search of her home was stale because it described a party at which drugs were present and the warrant was executed 2 days after the party. The Supreme Court held that the warrant described the premises at which drugs were present not the event where they were used and that a search warrant executed within 10 days of issuance as required by statute could not be stale. Commission Comments 1991 Comment: This statute combines some elements of 1987 MCA 46-5-206 and Rule 41(d) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The substance of the code is essentially unchanged. The phrase "or a duplicate original warrant" is added to the first sentence to reflect the procedure for issuing a search warrant by telephone. The second sentence, which provides for presenting the warrant and a receipt for property seized, is adopted from the federal rule. See Rule 41(d), Fed. R. Crim. P. The substance of the federal rule is favored because it is less verbose. The statute preserves the principle that the failure to leave a receipt does not render the evidence inadmissible.

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter 38,] section 108-6; and R.C.M. 1947, section 94-301-13.

This provision provides for specific directions as to the manner in which the search is made and specifies that failure to give a receipt is not a defect which will render the evidence inadmissible. The intent of this provision is to provide for adequate notice to the possessor of the goods or premises by requiring a copy to be left with him or at the place where the articles or things are seized.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In second sentence, after "from whom", substituted "or from whose premises the property is taken" for "any instruments, articles, or things are seized" and at end substituted "property was taken" for "instruments, articles, or things were seized" and in last sentence substituted "property seized" for "evidence"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

No Brady Violation When Petitioner Could Have Obtained Evidence by Other Available Means: Ellenburg asserted that the state committed a Brady violation (see Brady v. Md., 373 US 83, 10 L Ed 2d 215, 83 S Ct 1194 (1963)) and violated his due process rights by the state's loss or destruction of potentially exculpatory documents seized from his office without a warrant while Ellenburg was in prerelease status in the intensive supervision program following his imprisonment at the state prison. Applying Gollehon v. St., 1999 MT 210, 296 M 6, 986 P2d 395 (1999), the Supreme Court noted that one element of proving a Brady violation is that the petitioner did not possess the evidence and could not have obtained it with reasonable diligence. In this case, the court affirmed, finding no Brady violation because Ellenburg did not demonstrate that he was unable to obtain comparable evidence by other reasonably available means. St. v. Ellenburg, 2000 MT 232, 301 M 289, 8 P3d 801, 57 St. Rep. 958 (2000).

Search Warrant Procedural Irregularity Not Affecting Defendant's Substantial Rights: Defendant contended that because of a procedural error on the part of investigating officers who were executing a search warrant, the District Court erred when it did not suppress the seized evidence. The error was detected and corrected within 24 hours. An error in the manner in which notice of seized articles is given is an irregularity in the proceedings that does not affect the substantial rights of the accused and thus does not constitute reversible error. The corrected receipt effectively gave defendant notice of seized items. St. v. Abe, 1998 MT 206, 290 M 393, 965 P2d 882, 55 St. Rep. 876 (1998).

Testimony of Arresting Officer That Copy Given to Defendants — Suppression Denied: Defendants did not meet their burden of impeaching the testimony of the arresting officer, who stated that he exhibited the original search warrant to defendants and left a duplicate copy on their premises. The testimony, although not perfect, was sufficient for the District Court's reliance in denying a motion to suppress the fruits of the search based on failure to serve the warrant at the time of the search. St. v. Cope, 250 M 387, 819 P2d 1280, 48 St. Rep. 949 (1991).

46-5-228. Procedures assisting in execution of service of search warrant.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute combines two 1987 code sections that allowed certain actions during the execution of a warrant. Subsection (1) reflects 1987 MCA 46-5-208, describing the force that may be used in executing a warrant. Subsection (2) preserves 1987 MCA 46-5-209, permitting the temporary detention of a person present during the execution of a warrant. The adoption and consolidation of these statutes should create no changes in established procedure.

Source: [Former 46-5-208] Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter 38,] section 108-8; and R.C.M. 1947, sections 94-301-9 and 94-301-10.

This section uses language employed by the modern courts and is consistent with the amount of force allowed in effecting an arrest (e.g., U.S. v. Lord, 184 F. Supp. 923).

[Former 46-5-209] Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter 38,] section 108-9.

There is no counterpart to this section in the present Montana sections. It provides a necessary safeguard for the court issuing the warrant and the officer executing it to see that the officer's safety is assured and the purpose of the warrant is carried out without interference. The case law in this area is confused and unclear and statutory clarification seems both necessary and desirable. The word "reasonably" applies to both time and manner.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 153 in (1) at end inserted "but any restraint or detention of the person served must be in the least restrictive manner that is consistent with the safety of the person serving the warrant and anyone assisting that person"; in (2) at end of first sentence after "search" inserted "but must do so in the least restrictive manner that is consistent with the safety of the person serving the warrant and anyone assisting that person. The search of persons on the premises is"; in (2)(a) at beginning after "for" substituted "protection of the person serving the warrant and anyone assisting that person" for "self-protection"; and made minor changes in style. Case Notes

Requisite Objective Data and Resulting Suspicion for Lawful Stop and Frisk in Motel Room: Officers were lawfully searching Roehr's motel room when Dawson knocked on the door. An officer opened the door, and Dawson entered, asking for Roehr. The officer told Dawson that he was going to conduct a pat-down search for weapons and asked Dawson if he possessed any weapons, drugs, or needles. Dawson said that he had no weapons. The officer repeated the question. Dawson motioned toward his coat pocket and said that he had some "smoke" in there. The "smoke" turned out to be methamphetamine and drug paraphernalia. Dawson sought to suppress the evidence, contending that the search was illegal because the officer had no articulable, reasonable suspicion that Dawson had engaged in criminal activity. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that Roehr was a known criminal and that his room had been under surveillance for suspected drug activity. The officer had probable cause to believe that Roehr was conducting transactions involving dangerous drugs and stolen property in the room. When Dawson appeared, asking for Roehr, the officer had a particularized suspicion, based on the totality of the circumstances, to believe that Dawson had committed or was about to commit an offense. Thus, sufficient cause existed to detain Dawson. Further, in the officer's experience, people involved in drug offenses frequently carry weapons. The officer had no prior dealings with Dawson to help him determine whether Dawson was armed and did not know whether Dawson presented a danger to the officers conducting the search of the room, so reasonable cause existed to suspect that Dawson was armed and dangerous. Therefore, the officer possessed the requisite objective data and resulting suspicion to lawfully stop and frisk Dawson, and denial of the motion to suppress the fruits of the search was not error. St. v. Dawson, 1999 MT 171, 295 M 212, 983 P2d 916, 56 St. Rep. 668 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Anderson, 1999 MT 60, 293 M 490, 977 P2d 983, 56 St. Rep. 252 (1999).

Taking of Blood Sample Not Offensive Conduct: The taking of a blood sample pursuant to a valid search warrant did not constitute harmful or offensive conduct and was insufficient to support charges of assault and battery. Collins v. St., 232 M 73, 755 P2d 1373, 45 St. Rep. 878 (1988).

Search and Seizure — Complaint for Return of Photographs Not Properly Pleaded: John and Jane Doe brought an action for invasion of privacy stemming from execution of a search warrant. They claimed that the search was overbroad in that agents searched an envelope and found nude photos when they were searching for evidence of tax evasion. The complaint contained a statement that three of the photographs were missing. The parties' brief referred only to a single count for invasion of privacy. The Supreme Court held that these references were insufficient to put the defendants and the District Court on notice that Does were alleging a specific seizure by one of the named defendants and did not constitute an independent basis for a claim for invasion of privacy. Doe v. St., 256 M 348, 846 P2d 1018, 50 St. Rep. 105 (1993).

46-5-301. Return.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute reflects 1987 MCA 46-5-301, which provided for the return of a warrant. This code provision was amended to permit the return of the warrant and an inventory of the things seized to the appropriate court. The 1987 code required that the actual items seized be returned to the court. The Commission noted that such a procedure is unnecessary and that established procedure has not followed the code provision.

Subsection (2) adopts the last sentence of 1987 MCA 46-5-301. This code provision was amended to include the phrase "and the order of custody or disposition". Under this statute, the aggrieved party is entitled to an inventory and a copy of the order showing the disposition of that property.

Subsection (3) reflects 1987 MCA 46-5-302. The statute amends the code to require only that an order of custody or disposition be entered. The amendment follows the change provided in subsection (1) to require a return of only the warrant and inventory, not the items seized.

This section not only requires a return to the magistrate issuing the warrant, if available, but in addition provides for a copy of the inventory to be given to the deprived possessor of the goods to insure an adequate record of what was taken for the protection of both parties.

1991 Amendment: In (1), at beginning of first sentence, substituted "A return must be made promptly" for "The return of the warrant and all instruments, articles, and things seized shall be made promptly before the judge who issued the warrant or, if he is absent or unavailable, before the nearest available judge", near middle substituted "evidence or contraband" for "property", and near end of sentence substituted "serving" for "executing" and inserted second sentence concerning return of the warrant; in (2), after "inventory", inserted "and the order of custody or disposition"; inserted (3) concerning custody or disposition of evidence or contraband; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Suppression of Stolen Truck Not Due Process Violation: Defendant appealed his conviction for theft, contending that the failure to provide a jury view of the allegedly stolen truck and the state's subsequent disposition of the truck constituted an illegal suppression of physical evidence prejudicing his defense and violating his due process rights. The court affirmed the conviction, ruling that the defendant failed to show the suppressed evidence was exculpatory. Negligent suppression requires a reversal of conviction where the result would have been different had the evidence been disclosed. St. v. Amaya, 227 M 390, 739 P2d 955, 44 St. Rep. 1173 (1987).

Failure to Make Return — Effect: The defendant failed to demonstrate any prejudice to his substantial rights by an officer's failure to make a return of an item of evidence; therefore, it was not rendered inadmissible. St. v. Lenon, 174 M 264, 570 P2d 901 (1977).

Person Claiming Right to Seized Property Entitled to Hearing on Right to Possession: If a person who claims a right to seized property claims an interest in the property, the District Court must hold a hearing to determine if the person has a right to possession of the property. Notice must be given to all persons who have or may have an interest in the property. St. v. Torgerson, 2009 MT 402, 353 M 463, 221 P3d 1182 (2009).

Grant of Petition to Dispose of Evidence Held No Denial of Constitutional Rights — Inclusion of Additional Property for Restitution — Order to Dispose of Property Held Not to Impose Restitution Obligation: Woods was convicted of writing a bad check for $3,830. However, Woods continued to write other bad checks totaling over $30,000, even as of the time that his probation officer was preparing his presentence investigation. The investigation showed that the bad checks had been used to purchase merchandise and to obtain cash. After sentencing, which included a requirement for restitution, the state filed a petition for destruction of evidence, requesting that it be allowed to return the merchandise to the rightful owners, to apply the value of that property to satisfy Woods's obligation to make restitution, and to destroy other property that had been seized as evidence. The District Court granted the petition but stayed enforcement pending appeal. Woods contended that the District Court order granting the petition violated his rights under Art. II, sec. 3, 4, 15, 17, and 22, Mont. Const., and under the 5th, 8th, and 14th amendments to the United States Constitution. The Supreme Court held that Woods had waived his right to object to restitution, even restitution in an amount greater than $3,830, because Woods promised to make restitution in response to the recommendation of his probation officer that Woods make restitution in an amount in the "tens of thousands of dollars". The Supreme Court held, contrary to Woods's claim that the state misinterpreted the District Court order as to the amount of restitution, that the District Court had ordered Woods to make "full restitution" and that the order included the amounts over and above the $3,830 involved in the underlying conviction for writing a bad check. Woods also objected to the timing of the state's petition, arguing that he was not required to make restitution until he was released from jail. In response, the Supreme Court pointed out that Woods misconstrued the purpose of the state's petition; all the state wanted to do was receive permission from the District Court to return the merchandise to its rightful owners and apply the value to Woods's obligation for restitution. For this reason, the Supreme Court held that the District Court did not err when it granted the state's petition. St. v. Woods, 286 M 355, 951 P2d 981, 54 St. Rep. 1445 (1997).

No Right to Counsel in Petition to Dispose of Evidence — Issue Held Res Judicata: Woods was convicted of writing a bad check. After the state filed a petition to dispose of certain evidence pursuant to 46-5-306 through 46-5-309, Woods argued to the District Court that he was entitled to appointed counsel, pursuant to 46-8-104, for the purpose of responding to the petition. The District Court held that Woods was not entitled to appointed counsel because the granting of the state's petition would not result in a conviction of an offense for which Woods could be punished. Woods appealed that decision to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court. After the District Court granted the petition to dispose of evidence, Woods again raised the issue of his entitlement to appointed counsel to the District Court. The District Court denied the request for the same reason that it had previously. Woods then appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court held that because of its earlier decision in the matter of Woods's right to counsel, the issue was now res judicata, and the Supreme Court therefore affirmed the holding of the District Court. St. v. Woods, 286 M 355, 951 P2d 981, 54 St. Rep. 1445 (1997).

1997 Amendment: Chapter 186 in (1) inserted second and third sentences allowing the victim to be heard in open court and requiring consideration of the victim's statements prior to issuing an order; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

46-5-310. Filing of return.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute concerns the time and manner in which the application for and return of an executed warrant may be made. Subsection (1) preserves the 1987 code that identified the proper time in which an application for a warrant must be filed. See 1987 MCA 46-5-204. Subsection (2) adopts the provision from the federal rules that requires the court to file a copy of the return and other associated documents with the court that issued the warrant. See Rule 41(g), Fed. R. Crim. P.

The purpose is to provide for safekeeping of the original documents (by stating the application "shall be retained by the magistrate"), while not making it mandatory to file the warrant until after execution. This procedure keeps the proceeding from becoming a matter of public record and prevents leaks of information from the clerk's office until the warrant is executed, and it also protects the person being searched from harmful publicity.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In (1), in two places near end, substituted "served" for "executed"; inserted (2) concerning attachments to and filing of warrant; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Failure to Leave Warrant Application With Issuing Judge — Motion to Suppress Denied: Authorities did not leave the warrant application with the issuing judge or file it with the Clerk of Court until 6 days after execution of the search warrant. Defendants contended that under the rationale of St. v. Tropf, 166 M 79, 530 P2d 1158 (1975), failure to leave the application with the issuing judge constituted prejudicial error necessitating suppression of the search results. However, the pertinent Tropf language was merely dicta, which was never subsequently relied on by the Supreme Court on suppression issues. Denial of the suppression motion was proper because the filing oversight did not affect any substantial rights of defendants. St. v. Cope, 250 M 387, 819 P2d 1280, 48 St. Rep. 949 (1991).

46-5-311. Custody and disposition — seizure without search warrant.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an adaptation of 1987 MCA 46-5-303. Subsection (1) preserves 1987 MCA 46-5-303(3) to the extent that it allows the peace officer to possess the items seized for the purpose of an investigation. The statute is intended to have effect without regard to whether an arrest has been made. Subsection (2) follows 46-5-227 and requires an inventory receipt of all items seized to be given to the owner or the person from whose possession the items had been seized. Like those instances in which items are seized under a warrant, the failure to give a receipt does not make the seized items inadmissible.

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter 38,] section 108-2.

The first paragraph of this section is intended to act as a safeguard for the person from whom property has been taken and is consistent with seizure of property under warrant [46-5-226]. The intent of this section is to conform the procedure for handling things seized on an incidental search to that prescribed for things seized on a warrant. Any "taking" by a police officer amounts to a seizing.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: Inserted (1) concerning custody of evidence or contraband during an investigation; in (2) substituted first sentence concerning notice of and receipt for evidence or contraband seized for "Any peace officer seizing any instruments, articles, or things must give a receipt to the person from whose possession they are taken"; deleted former (2) and (3) that read: "(2) If an arrest has been made, all instruments, articles, or things seized on a search without warrant shall be delivered to the judge before whom the person arrested is taken and thereafter handled and disposed of in accordance with 46-5-301, 46-5-302, and 46-5-304. If the person arrested is released without a charge being preferred against him, all instruments, articles, or things seized from him other than contraband shall be returned to him upon release.

(3) If no arrest has been made, such instruments, articles, or things may be retained in the custody of the officer making the seizure for a time sufficient for investigation of the supposed crime, after which they must be delivered to the proper judge for disposition in accordance with 46-5-301, 46-5-302, and 46-5-304 or returned to the person from whom they were taken"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

No Brady Violation When Petitioner Could Have Obtained Evidence by Other Available Means: Ellenburg asserted that the state committed a Brady violation (see Brady v. Md., 373 US 83, 10 L Ed 2d 215, 83 S Ct 1194 (1963)) and violated his due process rights by the state's loss or destruction of potentially exculpatory documents seized from his office without a warrant while Ellenburg was in prerelease status in the intensive supervision program following his imprisonment at the state prison. Applying Gollehon v. St., 1999 MT 210, 296 M 6, 986 P2d 395 (1999), the Supreme Court noted that one element of proving a Brady violation is that the petitioner did not possess the evidence and could not have obtained it with reasonable diligence. In this case, the court affirmed, finding no Brady violation because Ellenburg did not demonstrate that he was unable to obtain comparable evidence by other reasonably available means. St. v. Ellenburg, 2000 MT 232, 301 M 289, 8 P3d 801, 57 St. Rep. 958 (2000).

Retention of Property — Mere Technical Error: When clothes were taken from defendant incident to a lawful arrest, the retention of the property by the police upon the release of the defendant was a mere technical error which did not compel suppression of the evidence by means of a Writ of Supervisory Control. State ex rel. Mankin v. Wilson, 174 M 195, 569 P2d 922 (1977).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute reflects 1987 MCA 46-5-304. Some of the terms have been amended to make the statute compatible with other statutes. The second part of 1987 MCA 46-5-304(2)(a), allowing for subsequent return of evidence, has been deleted. Deletion of that provision does not substantially alter procedure practiced under the 1987 code and avoids any chain-of-custody problems.

1991 Amendment: In (1), in first sentence after "judge", deleted "to whom it has been delivered" and in second sentence substituted "prosecutor" for "county attorney" and at end substituted "determine the right to possession" for "hear all claims to its true ownership"; in (2), after "possession is", substituted "established, the judge" for "proved to the judge's satisfaction"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Person Claiming Right to Seized Property Entitled to Hearing on Right to Possession: If a person who claims a right to seized property claims an interest in the property, the District Court must hold a hearing to determine if the person has a right to possession of the property. Notice must be given to all persons who have or may have an interest in the property. St. v. Torgerson, 2009 MT 402, 353 M 463, 221 P3d 1182 (2009).

Seized Property Abandoned by Owner in Lawful Possession of State for Purposes Other Than Forfeiture — Subsequent Petition for Forfeiture Not Precluded: After Branam's vehicle was stopped by an officer following a report of an assault, Branam fled. The officer had the vehicle towed to a storage yard. An employee of the storage yard noticed cash and a weapon in the vehicle. A search of the vehicle yielded cash, a weapon, and drug paraphernalia, and a canine alerted to the smell of drugs on the cash but not on the vehicle. Branam was not charged with a drug-related offense, but numerous confidential informants stated that the vehicle had been used in drug transactions. The state petitioned for forfeiture of the property. Branam moved to dismiss the petition on grounds that the state did not have probable cause to seize the property. The District Court agreed and summarily dismissed the petition, and the state appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Property is subject to forfeiture to the state if it is or has been used in connection with the manufacture, distribution, or sale of dangerous drugs, and property may be seized for the purpose of declaring it forfeit to the state if an officer has probable cause to believe that a conveyance has been or is intended to be used to unlawfully transport, keep, deposit, or conceal a controlled substance. Probable cause is required at the time of seizure if the state seizes property without a warrant solely for purposes of forfeiture. However, if property is lawfully seized for purposes other than forfeiture, nothing in 44-12-103 precludes a later petition for forfeiture when an investigation develops probable cause to believe that the property is subject to forfeiture. Search and seizure without a warrant may not be held illegal if a defendant has disclaimed any right or interest in the place or object searched or the evidence or contraband seized or if a right of the defendant has not been infringed by the search and seizure. Here, Branam's act of fleeing and leaving the vehicle and its contents on the street constituted abandonment sufficient to justify having the vehicle towed, and the warrantless discovery of the cash and weapon by the towing company employee did not infringe on Branam's right of privacy. Probable cause to seize property exists when an officer's knowledge is sufficient to warrant a reasonable person to believe that an offense has been committed, and when a vehicle is stopped and the occupants of the vehicle immediately flee, suspicions of an offense connected to the vehicle arise. Thus, when the officer took possession of the vehicle, sufficient probable cause existed to cause seizure of the property and allow further investigation. Additionally, nothing required that Branam be charged with a criminal offense to allow forfeiture of the property. St. v. Branam, 2006 MT 300, 334 M 457, 148 P3d 635 (2006).

Conflict Between Civil and Criminal Statutes: When property is taken from a pawnbroker and held as evidence for an underlying criminal prosecution, the provisions of the criminal procedure statutes governing return of property apply rather than the civil pawnbroker statutes. The criminal statutes are the particular and specific statutes and the pawnbroker statutes are general. The pawnbroker statutes control the situation where a private citizen discovers his property at a pawnbroker's shop and no criminal prosecution grows out of the incident. Part 4
Stop and Frisk

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: The amendments to this part reflect case law. The statutes do not make any significant change in established procedure. Perhaps the most significant change in the stop and frisk provisions is the deletion of 1987 MCA 46-5-401(2) and (3). The Commission noted that those subsections were repetitive and that they struck an unnecessary and confusing distinction between felony and misdemeanor offenses.

There are no comparable provisions directly reflecting the stop and frisk procedure in either the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure.

Part Case Notes

Sufficient Objective Police Data to Warrant Investigative Stop of Burglary Suspect — Motion to Suppress Evidence Properly Denied: Following a tip from a former parole officer and a background check, Eixenberger became a potential suspect in a string of burglaries in Kalispell area casinos. Eixenberger had received two citations while driving a red Thunderbird in the area and became a primary suspect when the car was seen about 200 yards from a casino about 9 minutes before the casino was burglarized. The car was subsequently spotted several times, with either Eixenberger or a friend driving, during early morning hours when the burglaries occurred. One early morning, a casino was burglarized. Police checked Eixenberger's friend's residence and found neither Eixenberger nor the car and then stopped Eixenberger in the car a short distance from and within minutes of another casino burglary. Police found rocks and tools consistent with the burglaries. Eixenberger moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the police lacked a particularized suspicion to make the investigative stop, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the totality of circumstances in this case, the police had sufficient objective data to support a suspicion that Eixenberger was or had engaged in wrongdoing, so the investigative stop was appropriate. St. v. Eixenberger, 2004 MT 127, 321 M 298, 90 P3d 453 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Lafferty, 1998 MT 247, 291 M 157, 967 P2d 363 (1998).

Officer's Knowledge of Vehicle Owner's Revoked License Sufficient Basis for Suspicion of Criminal Activity to Warrant Stopping Vehicle: Deputy Keintz observed a vehicle displaying a distinctive personalized license plate being driven by a female south of Missoula. The officer recognized the license plate, recalled the prior arrest and license suspension of the vehicle owner, and initiated a traffic stop. Halvorson was the owner and driver of the vehicle and was ticketed for driving with a suspended license. On appeal, Halvorson contended that the officer did not have sufficient information to form a particularized suspicion that the occupant of the vehicle was or had been engaged in criminal activity to justify stopping the vehicle. Applying the criteria in St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293 (1981), the Supreme Court followed St. v. Pike, 551 NW 2d 919 (Minn. 1996), in holding that an officer's knowledge that the owner of a vehicle has a revoked driver's license is enough to form the basis of a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity when the officer observes the vehicle being driven, as long as the officer remains unaware of any facts that would render unreasonable an assumption that the owner is driving the vehicle. St. v. Halvorson, 2000 MT 56, 299 M 1, 997 P2d 751, 57 St. Rep. 270 (2000), followed in Billings v. Costa, 2006 MT 181, 333 M 84, 140 P3d 1070 (2006). Costa was followed in St. v. Neil, 2009 MT 128, 350 M 268, 207 P3d 296 (2009).

Stop and Frisk Procedure Applicable to Automobiles: Where, upon investigating a possible burglary, the investigating officer stopped a suspicious looking automobile and noticed what appeared to be stolen property in the back seat of the car, which was driven off at a high rate of speed in the middle of the investigation, the District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to suppress the stolen property recovered from the automobile. The dictum in St. v. Rader, 177 M 252, 581 P2d 437 (1978), that stop and frisk principles do not apply to automobiles must be abandoned in light of the principle most recently announced in U.S. v. Cortez, 449 US 411, 66 L Ed 2d 621, 101 S Ct 690 (1981), that an assessment of whether a crime has been committed must be based upon all relevant circumstances and the evidence evaluated in light of the knowledge of a trained law enforcement officer. When a trained police officer has a particularized suspicion that the occupant of a vehicle is or has been engaged in criminal activity or is a witness thereto, a limited and reasonable investigatory stop and search is justified. St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293, 38 St. Rep. 1078 (1981), followed in In re Blake, 220 M 27, 712 P2d 1338, 43 St. Rep. 143 (1986), St. v. Lee, 232 M 105, 754 P2d 512, 45 St. Rep. 903 (1988), St. v. 46-5-401. Investigative stop and frisk.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an adaptation of 1987 MCA 46-5-401(1). The statute defines those instances in which an investigative stop may be properly conducted.

Two amendments were made, both of which reflect the case of St. v. Gopher, 38 St. Rep. 1078 (1981). The first change replaced the phrase "reasonable cause to suspect" with "a particularized suspicion". In Gopher, the court decided that a particularized suspicion, and not probable cause, was the appropriate standard. The standard is subjective and viewed with respect to the totality of the circumstances.

The second amendment inserted the phrase "or occupant of the vehicle" in recognition of the fact that the stop and frisk procedure does apply to individuals in a vehicle. See Gopher at 1082.

Compiler's Comments

2003 Amendment: Chapter 343 in (1) at end inserted second sentence that read: "If the stop is for a violation under Title 61, unless emergency circumstances exist or the officer has reasonable cause to fear for the officer's own safety or for the public's safety, the officer shall as promptly as possible inform the person of the reason for the stop"; inserted (2) outlining procedures that a peace officer who makes a lawful stop may undertake; inserted (3) requiring that a peace officer who makes a lawful stop while not in uniform inform the person who is stopped that the officer is a peace officer; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

1991 Amendment: At beginning inserted "In order to obtain or verify an account of the person's presence or conduct or to determine whether to arrest the person", after "any person" inserted "or vehicle", after "circumstances that" substituted "create a particularized suspicion" for "give him reasonable cause to suspect", after "the person" inserted "or occupant of the vehicle", and after "offense" deleted "involving the use or attempted use of force against a person or theft, damage, or destruction of property if the stop is reasonably necessary to obtain or verify an account of the person's presence or conduct or to determine whether to arrest the person"; and deleted (2) and (3) that read: "(2) A peace officer may stop any person he finds near the scene of an offense that he has reasonable cause to suspect has just been committed if:

(a) he has reasonable cause to suspect that the person has knowledge of material aid to the investigation of the offense; or

(b) the stop is reasonably necessary to obtain or verify the person's identity or an account of the offense.

(3) A peace officer may stop any person in connection with an offense that he has probable cause to believe has been committed if:

(a) the offense is a felony involving the use or the attempted use of force against a person or theft, damage, or destruction of property;

(b) he has reasonable cause to suspect the person committed the felony; and

(c) (i) the stop is reasonably necessary to obtain or verify the person's identity to determine whether to arrest the person for the felony; or

(ii) the peace officer has reasonable cause to suspect that the person was present at the scene of the offense, and the stop is reasonably necessary to obtain or verify the person's identity"; and made minor changes in style.

GENERAL

Disclaimer of Authority to Grant Permission to Search Vehicle Constituting Waiver of Right to Privacy: After stopping Hurlbert for speeding, officers noticed additional behavior that led them to believe that Hurlbert might be engaged in illegal activity. The officers asked Hurlbert for permission to search the vehicle, but Hurlbert declined because the vehicle belonged to his wife. The officers then called the wife, who gave permission to search the vehicle, although Hurlbert initially declined permission for a warrantless search of his personal items in the vehicle. No contraband was found in the vehicle, but while the search was underway, Hurlbert spontaneously admitted that there was drug paraphernalia in his personal possessions in the vehicle. Hurlbert then consented to a search of his possessions, and a search of his backpack indeed revealed drugs and paraphernalia. Hurlbert contended on appeal that because he lawfully possessed the vehicle at the time of the stop, he had a reasonable expectation of privacy in it and was entitled to protection from unlawful searches and seizures. Hurlbert also maintained that his wife's consent to search the vehicle was not valid because she was not in possession of the vehicle at the time of the search and she was coerced into consenting to the search. The Supreme Court affirmed. Hurlbert could not demonstrate that he was prejudiced in any way from the search of the vehicle, because the search revealed nothing unlawful. Additionally, when Hurlbert disclaimed that he had any authority to grant permission to search the vehicle, he thereby conceded that he did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the vehicle and waived the right to object to a search of the vehicle. St. v. Hurlbert, 2009 MT 221, 351 M 316, 211 P3d 869 (2009).

No Reason to View With Distrust Failure of Officer to Record Events Creating Particularized Suspicion for Traffic Stop: An officer observed Deines drive through two red lights without stopping, but the officer failed to record either act. Deines was subsequently stopped for a traffic violation and was then arrested for DUI as a result of the traffic stop. Following conviction, Deines appealed on grounds that because the officer failed to record the events that created a particularized suspicion for the traffic stop, the officer's testimony should be viewed with distrust in the judicial assessment of particularized suspicion. The Supreme Court noted a line of cases that "view with distrust" the failure of law enforcement officers to preserve a record of particular evidentiary matters, but the court declined to extend those cases to the circumstances of this case. The prior cases were related primarily to officers gathering evidence in the controlled environment of a police station, and the court recognized that circumstances in the field may preclude the creation of a tangible record. Additionally, the court noted the passage of HB 534 (Ch. 214, L. 2009), which requires the electronic recording of custodial interrogations in most felony cases and essentially renders the "view with distrust" line of cases moot, so future application of the view with distrust precedent is doubtful. Therefore, there is no reason to view with distrust the failure of a police officer to record events creating particularized suspicion for a traffic stop. St. v. Deines, 2009 MT 179, 351 M 1, 208 P3d 857 (2009).

Officer's Voluntary Exchange With Person in Parked Vehicle in Public Place Not Considered Seizure: Wilkins was parked in a public industrial area late on a cold night in a running vehicle with the lights on. An officer noticed the car and, being concerned that the vehicle was in an area where recent burglaries had occurred and concerned for the welfare of the driver, stopped to investigate. While speaking with Wilkins, the officer smelled the odor of an alcoholic beverage and noticed that Wilkins' speech was slurred, and after further investigation Wilkins was arrested for DUI. Wilkins contended that the arrest was unlawful because the officer had no particularized suspicion and because the community caretaker doctrine was inapplicable. Without reaching either of Wilkins' arguments, the Supreme Court affirmed because the officer's contact with Wilkins did not amount to a seizure. The officer was alone and did not activate emergency lights or a spotlight, display a weapon, or use threatening tones during the conversation, but rather simply approached Wilkins to see why she was parked on a dark, remote street late at night in cold weather. A reasonable person in Wilkins' place would not have concluded that she was not free to leave following the voluntary contact. Wilkins was parked in a public place, and the officer did not need a particularized suspicion to justify the contact. St. v. Wilkins, 2009 MT 99, 350 M 96, 205 P3d 795 (2009).

Defendant Stopped on Basis of Deputy's Report of Domestic Disturbance and Report of Lack of Driver's License Held Sufficient: Clark was stopped by highway patrol officer Gleich after Gleich received a report from his brother, a Deputy Sheriff, that the two persons in the car had just been involved in a domestic disturbance and that neither of them possessed a valid driver's license. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's decision that officer Gleich had a sufficient particularized suspicion, based upon the call from his brother, that warranted a stop to see if the passenger was in any danger and to see which of the unlicensed drivers was illegally operating the vehicle. Deputy Gleich's provision of the description and license number of the vehicle added sufficient facts to justify the stop under the standards set forth in St. v. Martinez, 2003 MT 65, 314 M 434, 67 P3d 207 (2003). St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 419, 347 M 354, 198 P3d 809 (2008).

Particularized Suspicion for Investigative Stop Established Despite Failure to Issue Traffic Violation Citation: Officer Kitchin observed Waite swerving across the centerline, crossing the fog line, and following the truck in front of her too closely. After Kitchin smelled alcohol on Waite and observed her inability to smoothly perform a horizontal gaze nystagmus test, Waite was charged with DUI. Waite moved to suppress the evidence, alleging that the stop was invalid because there were insufficient facts to support a particularized suspicion that she was committing an offense. On appeal from a Justice's Court guilty verdict, the District Court granted Waite's motion to suppress, concluding that swerving within a lane, touching the fog line, and following too closely were insufficient to establish a particularized suspicion because Kitchin did not cite Waite with a traffic violation. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and distinguished Waite from St. v. Reynolds, 272 M 46, 899 P2d 540 (1995) (driving that was "bordering on too fast" and waiting too long at an intersection with no traffic laws broken were insufficient for particularized suspicion), St. v. Lafferty, 1998 MT 247, 291 M 157, 967 P2d 363 (1998) (crossing the fog line twice was insufficient, without other relevant circumstances, for particularized suspicion), and Morris v. St., 2001 MT 13, 304 M 114, 18 P3d 1003 (2001) (merely "drifting over" the fog line with no other evidence of speeding or erratic driving was insufficient for particularized suspicion), by ruling that by the totality of circumstances, Waite's crossing of the fog line, continuously swerving within the lane, crossing over the centerline twice, and following too closely, all late at night, were sufficient to establish a particularized suspicion despite the officer's failure to issue a citation. St. v. Waite, 2006 MT 216, 333 M 365, 143 P3d 116 (2006).

Failure to Give Investigative Stop Advisory Following DUI-Related Accident — No Error: Zakovi was involved in a motorcycle accident, and when the investigating officer arrived, Zakovi was being loaded into an ambulance. Prior to transport to the hospital, the officer noticed that Zakovi's breath smelled of alcohol. Following further investigation at the hospital, Zakovi was arrested for DUI. At trial, Zakovi moved to suppress the DUI evidence because the officer failed to give the investigative stop advisory required under former 46-5-402 and St. v. Krause, 2002 MT 63, 309 M 174, 44 P3d 493 (2002). The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the former statute, an officer was required to give an investigative stop advisory only when making an investigative stop upon observing circumstances that created a particularized suspicion. Here, the officer did not observe circumstances creating a particularized suspicion because Zakovi was already stopped. Absent initiation of an investigative stop, no advisory was required. St. v. Zakovi, 2005 MT 91, 326 M 475, 110 P3d 469 (2005).

Justifiable Stop for Daytime Check of Temporary Window Sticker Warranted — Further Police Intrusion Not Warranted Once Limited Purpose of Stop Accomplished: Following weeks of surveillance instigated by a confidential tip intimating drug activities, the Billings police observed no suspicious drug-related activities conducted by defendants, but after receiving a tip that defendants would be driving from Billings to Bozeman to sell marijuana, officers stopped defendants' vehicle because there were no license plates displayed, although a temporary sticker could be seen but not read in the tinted rear window. When the officers approached the vehicle, they noticed that the temporary sticker properly displayed in the window was current. Nevertheless, in a short time, additional officers arrived with a drug-sniffing dog. The dog indicated the presence of drugs, the vehicle was searched, marijuana was found, and defendants were arrested. Defendants contended that the evidence should be suppressed because there was no particularized suspicion to make the stop. The Supreme Court agreed that the investigative stop was warranted because the officers' inability to read the expiration date on the temporary sticker provided an objective basis to infer that the sticker was not valid. However, a quick check of the properly displayed sticker in bright daylight confirmed the sticker's validity. Defendants had committed no traffic offense or violated any other criminal law of which the officers were aware. An investigative stop is a temporary detention that may not last longer than necessary to effectuate the purpose of the stop. Once the limited purpose of the investigative stop was accomplished, no further police intrusion was warranted, and the investigative stop related to drug possession was not justified. The District Court committed reversible error in refusing to suppress the evidence of the subsequent vehicle search. St. v. Martinez, 2003 MT 65, 314 M 434, 67 P3d 207 (2003), following St. v. Henderson, 1998 MT 233, 291 M 77, 966 P2d 137 (1998).

Use of Force in Resisting Arrest Committed After Investigative Stop — Exclusionary Rule Inapplicable: Courville was stopped by an officer who had reports of underage drinking in the area. When the officer tried to arrest Courville, Courville assaulted the officer. Courville moved to suppress the evidence under the exclusionary rule because the officer did not have a particularized suspicion to make the stop in the first place. The motion was denied, and Courville appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. An officer must have a particularized suspicion to conduct an investigatory stop, and if no particularized suspicion exists, the exclusionary rule precludes introduction of evidence gathered from the illegal stop. However, the rule does not apply in every case. If the evidence is so attenuated or dissipated from the government's constitutional violation that the evidence loses its primary constitutional taint, then the evidence is admissible. To allow a person whose right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures was allegedly violated to respond with unlimited violence would create intolerable results. Here, the evidence of Courville's criminal conduct committed against the officer was so attenuated from the claimed improper investigatory stop that it lost its primary constitutional taint, if any existed. Thus, the exclusionary rule did not apply, and the motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Courville, 2002 MT 330, 313 M 218, 61 P3d 749 (2002), following St. v. Ottwell, 240 M 376, 784 P2d 402 (1989).

Shining of Police Spotlight Into Vehicle Not Considered Seizure: After Clayton left a Bozeman bar, he noticed that he was being followed by a police car, so he pulled to the right side of the road and stopped. As the police car pulled in behind Clayton's vehicle, the officer shined a spotlight into Clayton's vehicle to see how many people were in it. Before the police car came to a stop, Clayton got out of his vehicle, looked at the police car, and began to run. The officer immediately recognized Clayton from a prior involvement and knew that Clayton's driver's license had been revoked, so the officer gave chase, eventually catching Clayton and placing him under arrest for obstructing an officer. Clayton was subsequently also charged with fourth offense felony DUI and driving with a suspended license. Clayton argued that he was seized when the officer pulled in behind his vehicle and shined the spotlight into it, because the officer did not have a particularized suspicion to effect a stop, and contended that he felt restrained and reasonably believed that he was not free to leave. The District Court concluded that the police acted reasonably and that when Clayton turned and faced the officer and gave away his identity, the police had particularized suspicion. The question for the Supreme Court was whether the police had effected a stop prior to that time and whether a seizure occurred. The state relied on Calif. v. Hodari D., 499 US 621 (1991), for the proposition that a seizure requires either a physical restraint or a submission to an assertion of authority, arguing that even if a stop did occur, the police had particularized suspicion to effect the stop and that the police action was reasonable in nature and scope. The Supreme Court rejected Hodari D., holding that it does not comport with Montana constitutional requirements, and instead affirmed the test in St. v. Roberts, 1999 MT 59, 293 M 476, 977 P2d 974 (1999), that no seizure occurs unless, in view of all the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have felt that the person was not free to leave. In this case, the fact of the police slowing down and coming to a stop behind Clayton's vehicle, and shining a spotlight into the vehicle, did not amount to such a show of authority to meet the Roberts test. The police did not use a siren or emergency lights, the encounter took place on a public street, and the police did not exit the police car and approach Clayton. Thus, no stop occurred prior to Clayton exiting his vehicle, and the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Clayton, 2002 MT 67, 309 M 215, 45 P3d 30 (2002).

Requirement That Officer Provide Certain Information to Person Lawfully Stopped for Investigation or Stop and Frisk: Prior to a hearing on his petition for reinstatement of his driver's license, which was revoked after his refusal to take a Breathalyzer test, Krause moved to suppress various statements made to the arresting officer. Krause argued that under Montana's stop and frisk statute, before asking where Krause had been and whether he had been drinking, the officer was required pursuant to 46-5-402(4) (now repealed) to inform Krause that he was a peace officer, that the stop was not an arrest but rather a temporary detention for investigative purposes, and that, unless arrested, Krause would be released upon completion of the investigation. The motion to suppress was denied, and Krause appealed. The state argued that 46-5-402(4) (now repealed) applied only if the officer had reason to suspect that Krause was armed and dangerous, as provided by 46-5-402(1) (now repealed), asserting that this was an investigative stop governed by this section rather than a stop and frisk governed by 46-5-402 (now repealed), and that because this section does not contain the same information requirement as 46-5-402 (now repealed), it was not necessary that the officer inform Krause as required in 46-5-402(4) (now repealed). The Supreme Court agreed with Krause. By it terms, the stop and frisk statute clearly and unambiguously applies to the investigative stop statute as well. Therefore, a peace officer is also required to give the warning contemplated in 46-5-402(4) (now repealed) when a person is stopped for a DUI investigation, even when there is no intention to frisk, and the District Court erred when it did not suppress statements made by Krause prior to the officer giving the warning. (See 2003 amendment.) St. v. Krause, 2002 MT 63, 309 M 174, 44 P3d 493 (2002).

Insufficient Particularized Suspicion of Crime to Justify Investigative Stop — To Pee or Not to Pee: On the night of November 16, 1999, officers came up behind a vehicle parallel parked legally beside a frontage road. As they passed the vehicle, they noticed a man standing by the passenger door on the side farthest from the road, apparently urinating. The man had taken steps so as not to expose himself to passers-by. The officers proceeded on, but decided to return and warn the man about the impropriety of his conduct. Upon reaching the vehicle, there was no longer anyone standing by it, but Kleinsasser was in the driver's seat making a call on a cell phone, another person was in the passenger seat, and another was lying down on the back seat. All three denied standing by the vehicle and denied knowing who had been doing so. The officers also smelled alcohol emanating from the vehicle, and asked Kleinsasser to perform field sobriety tests, which he failed. Kleinsasser was arrested for DUI, but refused to take a breath test, so his driver's license was seized and suspended. The District Court denied Kleinsasser's petition challenging the license suspension, and Kleinsasser appealed. The only relevant issue for the District Court to consider was whether the officer had reasonable grounds to believe that Kleinsasser was driving under the influence. The reasonable grounds requirement in 61-8-403 is equivalent to the requirement for particularized suspicion to make an investigative stop in this section, which requires the state to show objective data from which an experienced officer could make certain inferences, and a resulting suspicion that the occupant of a certain vehicle is or has been engaged in wrongdoing or was a witness to criminal activity. When the totality of the circumstances does not support a particularized suspicion, an investigative stop is not justified. The state argued that the observed activity constituted disorderly conduct. The Supreme Court disagreed. Kleinsasser's act did not create a hazardous condition, and the court found it hard to imagine any act that serves a more legitimate purpose than answering nature's call. Further, the behavior was not considered physically offensive in this case because it occurred at night, in a rural location where there were no overhead lights or other traffic at the time. There was no evidence that the act disturbed anyone other than the officers, and neither officer was so disturbed that he considered giving the individual a citation; therefore, an allegation of disorderly conduct was unfounded. Absent a particularized suspicion to justify an investigative stop, the subsequent seizure of Kleinsasser's driver's license was invalid. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court's error in denying Kleinsasser's petition for reinstatement of his license. Kleinsasser v. St., 2002 MT 36, 308 M 325, 42 P3d 801 (2002).

Authority of Game Warden to Approach Boat to Promote Safety — Particularized Suspicion Unnecessary: Initially concerned for the safety of the occupants of a seemingly unoccupied watercraft, a game warden looked into the live well of Boyer's boat and in the process found unlawfully killed game fish. Boyer contended that the warden had initiated an investigatory stop without the requisite particularized suspicion of wrongdoing, as required in this section, and that the evidence was therefore unlawfully seized. The Supreme Court disagreed. The warden was acting within his express authority to enforce outdoor recreation laws, including the safety of persons and property connected with the use of watercraft, and thus the warden's approach of Boyer's boat was lawful. St. v. Boyer, 2002 MT 33, 308 M 276, 42 P3d 771 (2002).

Particularized Suspicion of Wrongdoing Not Required for Game Warden to Step on Boat Transom in Effort to Inspect Angler's Catch When Reasonable Suspicion Exists for Investigatory Stop: Initially concerned for the safety of the occupants of a seemingly unoccupied watercraft, a game warden discovered that Boyer was fishing and asked to see Boyer's license and catch. Boyer produced several fish, and the warden requested to see what else was in Boyer's live well. Boyer suggested that the warden could look later when Boyer came to shore, but the warden declined, and after tethering the boats together, the warden stepped onto the transom of Boyer's boat to look into the open live well, and found several unlawfully killed game fish. Boyer suggested that the warden's act of stepping onto the boat transom constituted an illegal search in violation of Boyer's reasonable expectation of privacy. The Supreme Court disagreed. Boyer had no legitimate expectation of privacy in the rear platform of his boat, and the act of stepping on the transom—an exterior platform readily accessible to the public—did not constitute a search. The nature of the intrusion was so minimal as not to violate any privacy expectation that Boyer might have had. Whether or not probable cause existed at that point was irrelevant, because Boyer's behavior gave the warden a reasonable suspicion that an offense had occurred, and it is the presence of reasonable suspicion that allowed the warden to proceed with the investigative stop. St. v. Boyer, 2002 MT 33, 308 M 276, 42 P3d 771 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Elison, 2000 MT 288, 302 M 228, 14 P3d 456 (2000).

Driver Stopped at Flashing Red Light Over Twenty-Five Seconds Sufficient to Warrant Investigative Stop: About 1 a.m. on a Sunday morning, an officer observed a vehicle stopped at a flashing red light. The officer performed a U-turn and pulled in behind the vehicle. Although there was no other traffic, the vehicle remained stopped for at least 10 more seconds, then the officer honked his horn in an effort to get the vehicle to proceed. The vehicle remained stopped for an additional 10 to 15 seconds and then proceeded through the intersection. By that point, the officer was concerned that the driver was impaired by alcohol, so an investigative stop was made. Cook was tested and arrested for DUI and convicted. Cook moved for suppression of the evidence on grounds that the only information that the officer had upon which to base the stop was that Cook stopped at the light for what the officer believed to be an unusual length of time and that, pursuant to St. v. Reynolds, 272 M 46, 899 P2d 540 (1995), the information was not sufficient to create a particularized suspicion that a criminal offense was being committed to justify an investigative stop. On the other hand, the officer testified that an officer is more likely to encounter an impaired driver during weekend time, such as when Cook was observed, and that a driver's observably slow response to traffic signals is one of a number of visual indicators that a driver may be impaired. The Supreme Court applied the test for particularized suspicion in St. v. Anderson, 275 M 344, 912 P2d 801 (1996), and affirmed. The court distinguished Reynolds, noting that Cook was stopped more than twice as long as Reynolds and that nothing in Reynolds indicated that the officer in that case relied on training and experience to interpret the pause at the intersection as indicative of impaired driving. Based on the totality of the circumstances, the officer had sufficient objective data from which to make inferences regarding Cook's possible impairment that created a particularized suspicion that Cook was committing an offense and to conduct the investigative stop. Missoula v. Cook, 2001 MT 237, 307 M 39, 36 P3d 414 (2001).

Failure to Use Turn Signal Not Grounds for Traffic Stop: An officer responded to an anonymous complaint reporting a careless driver and observed a vehicle matching the description in a restaurant parking lot, but observed no activity that would justify a stop. The officer followed the vehicle when it departed and stopped it after the driver failed to signal a right-hand turn at an intersection, in violation of 61-8-336. Grindeland was subsequently arrested for DUI, but petitioned for reinstatement of his driving privileges on grounds that his failure to use turn signals did not violate the law and that the stop was thus not supported by a particularized suspicion of a criminal offense. The District Court agreed and reinstated Grindeland's driving privileges. The state appealed. The Supreme Court noted that under 61-8-336(1), a driver is required to use a turn signal only when there is other traffic that might be affected by the turn. Although there were other vehicles in the area, there was insufficient objective data by which the officer could infer that the other vehicles may have been affected by Grindeland's turn, so the turn could not be considered illegal. Absent that objective data, the officer lacked a particularized suspicion upon which to make the stop, so the stop was illegal, and reinstatement of Grindeland's driving privileges was affirmed. Grindeland v. St., 2001 MT 196, 306 M 262, 32 P3d 767 (2001), distinguished in St. v. Meza, 2006 MT 210, 333 M 305, 143 P3d 422 (2006).

Introduction of Results of Horizontal Gaze Nystagmus Test — Explanation of Underlying Scientific Basis of Correlation Between Alcohol Consumption and Nystagmus Required: At Van Kirk's DUI trial, the District Court allowed the arresting officer to testify regarding Van Kirk's performance on a horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) test. Van Kirk contended that the state failed to lay the proper foundation for admitting the test results. The Supreme Court agreed. Pursuant to Hulse v. St., 1998 MT 108, 289 M 1, 961 P2d 75 (1998), in order to lay the proper foundation, the state must establish a scientific basis for the reliability of the test results and in addition show that the test was properly administered. This requires that a qualified expert explain the underlying scientific basis of the correlation between alcohol consumption and nystagmus. In this case, the arresting officer had a bachelor's degree in medical technology, had worked as a lab supervisor and technician at the state hospital, was certified to administer the HGN test, and testified that the test was properly administered to Van Kirk. However, nothing in the evidence established that the officer was specially trained or educated or had adequate knowledge to qualify as an expert able to explain the underlying scientific basis of the HGN test. Thus, the District Court erred in permitting the officer to offer the test results into evidence without the state first establishing the requisite foundation. However, the error was not prejudicial to Van Kirk, so the DUI conviction was affirmed. St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001).

Search of Probationer's Residence or Vehicle — Reasonable Grounds and Probable Cause Distinguished: One condition of Kriesel's probation was a provision that Kriesel be subject to search and seizure of his residence, person, or vehicle upon the request of his probation officer at any time with or without a warrant and with or without probable cause. Kriesel was arrested for violating probation and released to await revocation proceedings but failed to report to his probation officer, so a bench warrant was issued for his arrest. Following a vehicle stop based on an informant's description of his car, Kriesel was arrested on the outstanding warrant and methamphetamine and drug paraphernalia were found in the car. Kriesel tested positive for marijuana and amphetamine. On appeal, Kriesel moved to suppress the evidence found in the search, alleging that the informant supplied information that was not sufficiently corroborated and that there was thus insufficient particularized suspicion to stop his vehicle, as required under this section. However, in this case, the stop was initiated to detain Kriesel under the authority of a valid outstanding warrant, satisfying the probable cause requirement of 46-6-201, and as a result, the particularized suspicion requirement was satisfied. Further, under St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154 (1998), a search of a probationer's residence or vehicle does not require probable cause, but rather reasonable grounds as determined by the totality of the circumstances. The reasonable grounds standard requires substantially less than the probable cause standard because of a probationer's diminished expectation of privacy and the superior position of the probation officer to determine what level of supervision is necessary to provide rehabilitation and community safety. The District Court found that given Kriesel's status as a probationer, the search of his vehicle was properly executed. Given the evidence that there was probable cause for the stop and reasonable grounds for the search, the court's findings were not clearly erroneous, were correctly applied as a matter of law, and thus were affirmed. St. v. Kriesel, 2000 MT 144, 300 M 44, 2 P3d 831, 57 St. Rep. 564 (2000).

Test for Sufficient Cause for Investigative Stop: Because an investigative stop of a person must be justified by some objective manifestation that the person stopped might be engaged in some criminal activity, the test for determining whether an officer had sufficient cause to stop a person is that the state must show objective data from which an experienced officer could make certain inferences and must show a resulting suspicion that the person is or has been engaged in wrongdoing or was a witness to criminal activity. Anderson v. St., 275 M 259, 912 P2d 212, 53 St. Rep. 125 (1996), followed in Hulse v. St., 1998 MT 108, 289 M 1, 961 P2d 75, 55 St. Rep. 415 (1998). See also Rupp v. St., 279 M 247, 927 P2d 1, 53 St. Rep. 1136 (1996). The test was applied in St. v. Gilder, 1999 MT 207, 295 M 483, 985 P2d 147, 56 St. Rep. 808 (1999).

Vehicular Stop Based on Information From Flyer or Bulletin: A law enforcement officer may make a vehicular stop if the officer has a reasonable suspicion, grounded in specific and articulable facts, that a person was involved in or is wanted in connection with a completed felony. This suspicion may be based on information obtained from a flyer or bulletin if the bulletin was issued on the basis of articulable facts supporting a reasonable suspicion. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990), followed in St. v. Grimes, 1999 MT 145, 295 M 22, 982 P2d 1037, 56 St. Rep. 571 (1999). See also U.S. v. Hensley, 469 US 221, 83 L Ed 2d 604, 105 S Ct 675 (1985).

Inapplicability of Stop and Frisk Statutes: Where the defendant in a criminal case was stopped by police and asked investigatory questions designed to identify him as a witness or a suspect and was not frisked or searched, the stop and frisk statutes did not apply. St. v. Graves, 191 M 81, 622 P2d 203, 38 St. Rep. 9 (1981).

Hearsay Admissible to Establish Probable Cause: Testimony of a police officer regarding a radio dispatch received regarding a motorcycle theft, introduced to establish the officer's probable cause for stopping the vehicle in which defendant was riding and subsequently arresting him, was not hearsay in this context and was properly admitted. St. v. White, 185 M 213, 605 P2d 191 (1980).

TOTALITY OF CIRCUMSTANCES AND OBJECTIVE FACTS

Stopping Short of and Subsequent Failure to Stop at Game Check Station — Particularized Suspicion Justifying Traffic Stop: A game warden observed Clark stopping short of a game check station, exiting the vehicle, then reentering the vehicle and driving past the check station. Based on Clark's actions, the warden suspected that Clark might have stopped to hide or change something before reaching the check station, so wardens stopped Clark's vehicle. Clark exhibited signs of intoxication and was subsequently arrested by the Highway Patrol for DUI. Clark contended that wardens had no particularized suspicion to stop the vehicle for a possible fish and game violation and that evidence from the vehicle search should be suppressed. The District Court denied Clark's suppression motion, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The game warden possessed a reasonable suspicion based on articulable facts and experience from which to draw an inference that Clark might have committed a game violation sufficient to warrant stopping Clark's vehicle. St. v. Clark, 2009 MT 327, 353 M 1, 218 P3d 483 (2009).

Criteria of Particularized Suspicion or Reasonable Grounds for Peace Officer to Make Investigative Stop — Officer's Experience and Training as Factor in Totality of Circumstances: For a peace officer to have particularized suspicion or reasonable grounds for an investigatory stop, the officer must be possessed of (1) objective data and articulable facts from which to make certain reasonable inferences; and (2) a resulting suspicion that the person to be stopped is committing or is about to commit an offense. Although the peace officer's experience and training may be a factor in determining what sort of reasonable inferences the officer is entitled to make based on the officer's observations, experience, and training, they are not necessarily the defining element of the test. Rather, courts should look at the facts and the totality of the circumstances of each case. Here, the officer was possessed of objective data and articulable facts that Brown's vehicle was barely moving along a public highway at 2:51 a.m. with its lights on and that it suddenly pulled over, came to a stop, and shut off its lights. Given that this sort of conduct can be indicative of intoxicated driving, the officer could reasonably suspect that the driver was DUI. On approaching the vehicle, the officer detected the odor of alcohol coming from Brown's vehicle, and observed Brown's slurred and slow speech, slow and staggered exit from the vehicle, and explanation of a recently absent passenger when no other person was in the vicinity, and these objective observations allowed the officer's particularized suspicion to escalate into probable cause for a DUI arrest. Brown v. St., 2009 MT 64, 349 M 408, 203 P3d 842 (2009), clarifying St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293 (1981), St. v. Schatz, 194 M 59, 634 P2d 1193 (1981), and St. v. Morsette, 201 M 233, 654 P2d 503 (1982), and followed in St. v. Cybulski, 2009 MT 70, 349 M 429, 204 P3d 7 (2009). See also U.S. v. Cortez, 449 US 411 (1981), and St. v. Hilgendorf, 2009 MT 158, 350 M 412, 208 P3d 401 (2009).

Particularized Suspicion Under Totality of Circumstances to Justify Traffic Stop: Ditton contended that there was no particularized suspicion justifying a traffic stop because his driving behavior did not violate any laws, he stayed within his lane, and he was not speeding. The Supreme Court disagreed. Particularized suspicion is based on the totality of the circumstances. In this case, Ditton's car was parked late at night at an odd angle in a bar parking lot with its lights on and engine running. When Ditton drove away, the car was observed weaving within its lane and crossing both the right fog line and the center line. Ditton signaled for a right turn but missed the intersection and drove partially off the roadway onto the shoulder, at which point Ditton backed up, drove forward and struck a stop sign post, then backed up again and drove forward about one car length before coming to a stop. Even if Ditton's driving was technically legal, the totality of circumstances provided a sufficient basis for particularized suspicion to justify a traffic stop. St. v. Ditton, 2009 MT 57, 349 M 306, 203 P3d 806 (2009).

Sufficient Particularized Suspicion for Investigative Stop: Defendant was swerving within her lane so as to touch dividing and fog lines, cross the dividing line, and strike the curb when executing a right-hand turn. Thus the court's conclusions of law in denial of the motion to suppress evidence in a DUI case were correct. St. v. Ross, 2008 MT 369, 346 M 460, 197 P3d 937 (2008).

Driving Without Properly Functioning Brake Lights Constitutes Sufficient Particularized Suspicion for Investigative Stop: Operating a motor vehicle that is not equipped with functional brake lights is a misdemeanor offense, and thus deputy's decision to pull over defendant's vehicle was supported by a particularized suspicion. St. v. Faber, 2008 MT 368, 346 M 449, 197 P3d 941 (2008).

Sufficient Probabilities Supporting Particularized Suspicion to Justify Investigative Stop — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: McMaster was stopped for investigation after an officer observed apparent traffic violations and erratic driving. The officer was called to make the stop following a police officer's observations of McMaster's possible drug trafficking activities at the Conrad Town Pump. McMaster moved to suppress the fruits of the search on grounds that the officer lacked particularized suspicion to make the investigative stop. The motion was denied, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The determination whether particularized suspicion supports an investigative stop does not deal with hard certainties, but rather with probabilities. In this case, McMaster was known by officers to be involved in drug deals, and his furtive conduct at the Town Pump led officers to believe that a possible drug deal was in progress. McMaster was identified as the probable driver of the vehicle through a personalized license plate and by physical description. This evidence, coupled with McMaster's apparent traffic violations and erratic driving, constituted sufficient particularized suspicion that McMaster was involved in criminal activity to justify the investigative stop. St. v. McMaster, 2008 MT 294, 345 M 408, 191 P3d 443 (2008). See also St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293 (1981).

Sufficient Objective Data to Justify Particularized Suspicion Warranting Investigative Stop on Remote Mountain Road Following Burglary: Deputies investigated a break-in and burglary at a cabin in a remote mountain area in winter. There were several cabins in the area, none of which were occupied, but the deputies discovered that another cabin had also been burglarized. The deputies confirmed that all access roads but one in the area were closed by snow. Items left outside the cabin indicated that the burglar would likely return to retrieve the items, so the deputies surmised that the burglar was probably still in the area. When Flemings was observed driving the only vehicle on the only accessible road later that night, a deputy stopped Flemings' vehicle. Flemings was arrested on an outstanding warrant in another county and subsequently made incriminating statements regarding the burglaries. With a warrant, officers searched Flemings' vehicle and residence and seized evidence related to the burglaries, and Flemings was charged with 10 counts of felony burglary, 7 counts of felony theft, 4 counts of misdemeanor theft, and 2 counts of misdemeanor mischief. At trial, Flemings moved to suppress all evidence and statements on grounds that the deputy lacked a particularized suspicion to make the investigative stop. The trial court denied the motion, and Flemings was convicted and appealed. The Supreme Court considered the totality of the circumstances and affirmed. Based on their experience and training, the deputies reasonably inferred that the burglary suspect was still in the area and would return to complete the theft. The deputies observed no other vehicles on the only accessible road. There were no businesses or occupied homes in the area, and there was no reason for persons to be in the area at night at that time of year. Thus, a deputy had sufficient objective data from which to infer that the driver coming down the road at 2 a.m. was or had been engaged in wrongdoing, resulting in a particularized suspicion justifying the investigative stop of Flemings' vehicle. St. v. Flemings, 2008 MT 229, 344 M 360, 188 P3d 1020 (2008), distinguishing St. v. Jarman, 1998 MT 277, 291 M 391, 967 P2d 1099 (1998), and St. v. Fisher, 2002 MT 335, 313 M 274, 60 P3d 1004 (2002).

Particularized Suspicion to Confirm Identity of Vehicle Owner Based on Information From License Plate Search on Probationer's Vehicle: A Deputy Sheriff noticed a woman sitting in a vehicle parked in front of the residence of a known drug dealer who was on probation for drug violations. When the woman acted suspiciously, the deputy ran the vehicle's license plate through dispatch. Dispatch confirmed that the vehicle belonged to Thomas, who was also on probation. After 5 minutes, the deputy drove past the vehicle again, and the woman acted furtively. The deputy tried unsuccessfully to contact Thomas's probation officer to inquire about Thomas's status and then approached the vehicle to question the woman. The woman confirmed that she was Thomas and that she was on probation. The deputy returned to his car and successfully reached Thomas's probation officer, who informed the deputy that Thomas was not to have contact with any other person on probation and had recently failed a urinalysis test. The probation officer requested that the deputy search Thomas's vehicle, and the deputy found a drug pipe that later tested positive for methamphetamine. Thomas was charged with felony drug possession but moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the search was illegal because the deputy lacked particularized suspicion. The motion was denied, Thomas was convicted and appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. As an experienced officer, the deputy could reasonably infer that Thomas was engaged in some sort of criminal activity based on the fact that the deputy knew Thomas was on probation and that Thomas was observed parked in front of the residence of another probationer whom the deputy knew to be a drug dealer. This information, coupled with the deputy's knowledge of the drug history of the resident, comprised the totality of the circumstances and supported the determination that particularized suspicion existed for the deputy's initial investigatory stop of Thomas. Denial of the motion to suppress was affirmed. St. v. Thomas, 2008 MT 206, 344 M 150, 186 P3d 864 (2008), followed in St. v. Neil, 2009 MT 128, 350 M 268, 207 P3d 296 (2009).

No Particularized Suspicion for Stop to Investigate Couple Engaged in Romantic but Not Criminal Behavior — Community Caretaker Doctrine Inapplicable Absent Indication of Citizen in Peril: While on routine patrol, an officer observed a vehicle parked on a pullout adjacent to a public road. The officer thought perhaps the driver was experiencing vehicle problems and drove by to investigate. However, the occupants were not having vehicle problems but were kissing, and the female passenger was observed attempting to "mount" the male driver. Concerned that the occupants were engaged in inappropriate sexual behavior, the officer circled back, parked behind the vehicle and activated the emergency lights, and approached the vehicle with the intent to discourage the couple from engaging in their behavior and to move them along. The officer discovered a cold, sweaty beer can outside the driver's door and also discovered the couple in various states of undress. Upon questioning the couple about what they were doing, the officer noticed that they both appeared intoxicated. The driver, Graham, was tested and subsequently arrested for DUI. Graham moved to suppress the evidence of the DUI on grounds that the officer did not have authority to make an investigative stop or, if that authority did exist, that the officer exceeded the scope of an investigative stop. The District Court agreed that the officer did not have a sufficient particularized suspicion to make an investigative stop, but nevertheless allowed the DUI evidence on grounds that the community caretaker doctrine provided a legal justification for the stop. On appeal, the Supreme Court first noted that if particularized suspicion was absent and no other exception to the warrant requirement applied, the search and seizure were unconstitutional. In this case, once the officer activated the emergency lights, Graham would not have felt free to walk away, so a seizure occurred. The Supreme Court agreed that the totality of the circumstances did not give rise to a particularized suspicion that a crime was occurring or was about to occur. Graham committed no traffic offense, and the couple's conduct was not criminal and did not indicate that a crime was about to occur. Any particularized suspicion occurred only after Graham was seized. The officer did not approach the vehicle because of a belief that a crime was being committed, but rather to discourage the couple from engaging in their behavior and to move them along, so the requisite particularized suspicion of a crime was absent. The Supreme Court also held that the community caretaker doctrine did not apply because under the criteria developed in St. v. Lovegren, 2002 MT 153, 310 M 358, 51 P3d 471 (2002), the first step in determining whether the doctrine applies is whether there are objective, specific, and articulable facts from which an experienced officer would suspect that a citizen is in need of help or is in peril. No such facts existed in this case, and the court declined to extend the doctrine to allow law enforcement officers equipped with nothing more than personal dissatisfaction of a person's otherwise lawful conduct to detain that person without any intention of providing community care or assistance. Dismissal of Graham's motion to suppress the evidence was reversed, and the case was remanded. St. v. Graham, 2007 MT 358, 340 M 366, 175 P3d 885 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Nelson, 2004 MT 13, 319 M 250, 84 P3d 25 (2004), St. v. Seaman, 2005 MT 307, 329 M 429, 124 P3d 1137 (2005), and St. v. Litschauer, 2005 MT 331, 330 M 22, 126 P3d 456 (2005).

Truant Smelling of Alcohol — Particularized Suspicion for Arrest — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: A 14-year-old boy's mother called his school, reported that he had not returned home the previous night, and requested that he be picked up. The school resource officer notified police and asked that the boy be brought to school if found. An officer later found the boy on the street smelling of alcohol and took the boy to the police station where it was discovered that several town businesses had been burglarized during the night, including a bowling alley where money and liquor had been stolen. Money and liquor were found on the youth, and his shoes were taken as evidence to see if they matched prints found at the bowling alley. The youth moved that all evidence be suppressed, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Based on the fact that the officer smelled alcohol on the youth, the officer's particularized suspicion that the youth had been drinking developed into probable cause to believe that the youth committed the offense of consuming or possessing alcohol. Because the officer had probable cause to make an immediate arrest, including the fact that the boy had been reported missing from home and was truant from school, it was constitutionally permissible to take the boy into custody pursuant to 41-5-321 and reasonable to conduct a search pursuant to that arrest for the youth's safety. In re Z.M., 2007 MT 122, 337 M 278, 160 P3d 490 (2007).

Sufficient Particularized Suspicion for Investigative DUI Stop Under Totality of Circumstances: Luckett asserted that the officer who arrested him for DUI did not have sufficient particularized suspicion to make an investigative stop. The Supreme Court disagreed. Luckett contended that the various circumstances surrounding the stop, when considered separately, did not provide adequate suspicion, but the court considers the totality of the circumstances. The officer, who had over 4 years' experience and had completed numerous training courses, including DUI detection, observed Luckett and several other persons drinking beer at a truck stop, watched Luckett enter a vehicle, and followed the vehicle onto the interstate. The driver, who turned out to be Luckett, drove abnormally slow for the conditions, and the vehicle weaved along the highway and crossed the fog line twice. Under the totality of these circumstances, the officer had a reasonable suspicion that Luckett was engaged in wrongdoing, and the District Court's finding that the officer had a particularized suspicion for conducting an investigative stop was not erroneous. St. v. Luckett, 2007 MT 47, 336 M 140, 152 P3d 1279 (2007).

Erratic U-Turn Sufficient Particularized Suspicion for Investigative Stop: After an officer observed Trombley make an erratic U-turn, drift over the fog line, fail to signal when switching lanes, and straddle the center line, Trombley was stopped and cited for DUI. Trombley contended, and the District Court agreed, that state law did not prohibit the U-turn, but under the totality of the circumstances, Trombley's actions rose to the level of particularized suspicion sufficient to warrant the investigative stop. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed. Trombley's erratic driving was enough for the officer to suspect that Trombley was engaged in wrongdoing and gave the officer a particularized suspicion to justify the investigative stop under the totality of the circumstances. Trombley's motion to dismiss was properly denied. St. v. Trombley, 2005 MT 174, 327 M 507, 116 P3d 771 (2005), following St. v. Steen, 2004 MT 343, 324 M 272, 102 P3d 1251 (2004).

Erratic Driving and Occupants Switching Drivers — Sufficient Particularized Suspicion to Justify Investigative Stop: The fact that an officer observed that the occupants had switched drivers during the time that the officer lost sight of a vehicle and that the vehicle was driving in the center of a gravel road constituted a sufficient particularized suspicion under the totality of the circumstances, including the officer's 27 years of experience, to warrant an investigative stop. St. v. Britt, 2005 MT 101, 327 M 1, 111 P3d 217 (2005).

Investigatory Stop Based on Suspicion of Impersonation of Police Officer: Police stopped Bar-Jonah in the early hours of the morning near a school wearing a police-style jacket and stocking cap. The officer had prior knowledge of Bar-Jonah's history of crimes against children. Bar-Jonah asserted that he was simply walking a few blocks from his home, minding his own business, that the officer lacked a particularized suspicion of criminal activity to warrant the investigatory stop in violation of Bar-Jonah's right against unreasonable search and seizure, and that any evidence should thus be suppressed. The District Court denied the motion to suppress, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Relying on Fla. v. Bostick, 501 US 429 (1991), the District Court found that the initial stop was not an investigatory stop but merely a police-citizen encounter, but the Supreme Court held that the stop was not a mere police-citizen encounter because Bar-Jonah had no reason to believe that he could leave. Nevertheless, the officer reasonably suspected that Bar-Jonah had impersonated or was about to impersonate a police officer, and coupled with the officer's knowledge of Bar-Jonah's criminal history, the officer had a particularized suspicion of criminal activity warranting the investigative stop. Once Bar-Jonah was lawfully detained, a search of Bar-Jonah's person was justified based on Bar-Jonah's statement that he was carrying a stun gun. St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

Improper Left Turn Sufficient Particularized Suspicion for Investigative Stop: At about 1:10 a.m., an officer observed Steen make a wide left-hand turn at an intersection and swerve to straddle the center of two eastbound lanes. The officer stopped Steen for violating 61-8-333 and subsequently arrested Steen for DUI. Steen contended that the officer lacked a particularized suspicion to make an investigative stop and moved to suppress the evidence. The motion was denied, and Steen was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Steen's erratic driving was enough for the officer to suspect that Steen was engaged in wrongdoing and gave the officer a particularized suspicion to justify the investigative stop under the totality of the circumstances. Steen's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Steen, 2004 MT 343, 324 M 272, 102 P3d 1251 (2004). See also Moore v. St., 2002 MT 315, 313 M 126, 61 P3d 746 (2002).

Particularized Suspicion for Investigative Stop of Suspect Vehicle in Area of Crime Under Totality of Circumstances: Following a theft at a grocery store, officers observed a blue Camaro circling the area. Given that almost an hour had elapsed since the reported theft and that the Camaro had the same county license plates as the robbers' suspected truck, officers conducted an investigative stop of the Camaro. Based on inconsistent stories presented by the Camaro's occupants and the fact that a theft had recently occurred in the area, officers requested to search Fellers' Camaro. Fellers signed a written consent to search, and officers discovered drugs and paraphernalia in Fellers' possession. Fellers appealed his conviction on grounds that the officers lacked a particularized suspicion to make the investigative stop. Pursuant to St. v. Bauer, 2001 MT 248, 307 M 105, 36 P3d 892 (2001), for an investigative stop to be reasonable, an officer must have objective data from which to make certain inferences and a resulting suspicion that the person stopped is or has been engaged in wrongdoing. The officer need not actually personally observe illegal activity in order to have a particularized suspicion to justify an investigatory stop, but support for a particularized suspicion must be viewed in light of the totality of the circumstances. Here, the officer had sufficient objective data from which to infer that the occupants of the Camaro were engaged in wrongdoing and a resulting suspicion of illegal activity. Under the totality of the circumstances, the investigative stop was justified, and Fellers' conviction was affirmed. St. v. Fellers, 2004 MT 321, 324 M 62, 101 P3d 764 (2004).

Lack of Exigent Circumstances Justifying Warrantless Search of Fanny Pack — Motion to Suppress Evidence Properly Granted: After Lanegan was arrested for obstructing a peace officer and handcuffed, the officer proceeded to conduct a warrantless search of Lanegan's fanny pack and discovered drugs and drug paraphernalia. Lanegan was then charged with drug crimes. Lanegan moved to suppress the evidence, and the motion was granted. The state appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. A search incident to arrest may be conducted under the conditions in 46-5-102, but in this case, none of the conditions were present. The search would not have protected the officer or prevented Lanegan's escape because Lanegan was already handcuffed, nor would the search have resulted in discovery of anything that could have been used in or fruits of the crime of obstructing a peace officer. Warrantless searches are per se unreasonable, but one exception is when there are exigent circumstances that would cause a reasonable person to believe that prompt action is necessary to prevent physical harm, destruction of relevant evidence, escape, or some other consequence improperly frustrating legitimate law enforcement efforts. However, the search in this case did not rise to the level of exigent circumstances to allow a warrantless search, and the motion to suppress was properly granted. St. v. Lanegan, 2004 MT 134, 321 M 349, 91 P3d 578 (2004).

Sufficient Objective Police Data to Warrant Investigative Stop of Burglary Suspect — Motion to Suppress Evidence Properly Denied: Following a tip from a former parole officer and a background check, Eixenberger became a potential suspect in a string of burglaries in Kalispell area casinos. Eixenberger had received two citations while driving a red Thunderbird in the area and became a primary suspect when the car was seen about 200 yards from a casino about 9 minutes before the casino was burglarized. The car was subsequently spotted several times, with either Eixenberger or a friend driving, during early morning hours when the burglaries occurred. One early morning, a casino was burglarized. Police checked Eixenberger's friend's residence and found neither Eixenberger nor the car and then stopped Eixenberger in the car a short distance from and within minutes of another casino burglary. Police found rocks and tools consistent with the burglaries. Eixenberger moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the police lacked a particularized suspicion to make the investigative stop, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the totality of circumstances in this case, the police had sufficient objective data to support a suspicion that Eixenberger was or had engaged in wrongdoing, so the investigative stop was appropriate. St. v. Eixenberger, 2004 MT 127, 321 M 298, 90 P3d 453 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Lafferty, 1998 MT 247, 291 M 157, 967 P2d 363 (1998).

Reasonable Cause for Investigative Stop and Pat-Down Search — Motion to Suppress Evidence Properly Denied: An officer discovered a youth behind a car about 11 p.m., apparently working on the vehicle's license plate. The officer suspected that the youth was removing the plate, but when asked, the youth claimed to be installing it. The officer recognized the youth from prior law enforcement contacts and knew that the youth did not live at the residence or own a car. Based on these circumstances, the officer conducted a pat-down search and discovered a marijuana pipe. At about that time, the youth's girlfriend came out of the residence and told the officer that she had requested that the youth put the license plate on the vehicle. The youth later moved to suppress the drug paraphernalia on grounds that the officer did not have a particularized suspicion to make the investigative stop, exceeded the scope of the investigative stop, and did not have probable cause to conduct a frisk. The Supreme Court affirmed denial of the motion to suppress. Applying the two-part test from St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293 (1981), the court held that the officer had sufficient objective data to form a particularized suspicion that the youth was engaged in wrongdoing to justify the investigative stop. Then, once the officer recognized the youth, suspicions were heightened, so the pat-down search remained within the context of the initial stop, and the officer did not exceed the scope of the stop. Finally, because of the officer's prior dealings with the youth and knowing that the youth did not live at the residence or own a car, the officer had reasonable cause: (1) to believe that the youth was committing an offense and might be armed; (2) for concern for the officer's safety; and (3) to conduct a frisk. The officer did not have to accept the youth's seemingly innocent explanation of why he was working behind the car late at night. In re D.R.B., 2004 MT 90, 320 M 516, 88 P3d 808 (2004). See also St. v. Collard, 286 M 185, 951 P2d 56 (1997), and St. v. Dawson, 1999 MT 171, 295 M 212, 983 P2d 916 (1999).

Sufficient Particularized Suspicion to Justify Investigative Stop of Vehicle Containing Suspected Drug Lab: Officers received a tip from Olson's estranged husband that a methamphetamine lab was being operated in Olson's garage. The officers placed the garage under surveillance and saw equipment being loaded into Olson's car that same day. The officers stopped the car for an investigative stop. Olson contended that the stop was not supported by a particularized suspicion. The Supreme Court applied the two-part test in Grindeland v. St., 2001 MT 196, 306 M 262, 32 P3d 767 (2001), to determine whether a particularized suspicion existed to make the stop. Although the behavior observed by the officers did not, by itself, raise a particularized suspicion of criminal activity, when combined with the informant's report that a drug lab had been observed in Olson's garage the same day, the behavior may have given rise to a particularized suspicion when examined in the totality of the circumstances. Because probable cause existed to search the vehicle, it was axiomatic that a particularized suspicion existed to stop the same vehicle. St. v. Olson, 2003 MT 61, 314 M 402, 66 P3d 297 (2003).

Display of License Plate in Windshield Rather Than on Bumper in Compliance With Law — Suppression of Evidence Proper Based on Illegal Investigatory Stop: A Deputy Sheriff observed a truck that appeared to have no front license plate pulling onto the highway, and the officer performed an investigatory stop based on a suspected violation of 61-3-301, which requires that license plates be conspicuously displayed and securely fastened on the front and rear of a vehicle. Lacasella's front license plate was secured with duct tape to the inside lower driver's side corner of the windshield, rather than fastened to the bumper. As a result of the stop, Lacasella was arrested for DUI and for driving with a suspended or revoked license. Lacasella pleaded guilty, but reserved the right to appeal the denial of his motion to suppress evidence based on the allegation that the arresting officer had no particularized suspicion to make the stop. The District Court held that the inside of the front windshield did not constitute the front of the vehicle and that the license plate was not unobstructed from plain view when displayed in the window because glare could prevent the license plate from being viewed at night. The court also concluded that even if the officer had seen the license plate in the window, the officer was still permitted to make an investigatory stop to ensure that the license plate was securely fastened to the vehicle. The Supreme Court considered the issue and reversed. Under the plain language of 61-3-301, Lacasella's license plate was clearly and conspicuously displayed and unobstructed from plain view. In believing that the license plate must be secured to the bumper, the officer misconstrued 61-3-301, and observations made by an officer who does not understand the law are not objectively grounded in law and cannot be the basis of a particularized suspicion. Thus, the officer did not have the objective data necessary to justify the investigatory stop, and the evidence obtained subsequent to the illegal stop should have been suppressed. Further, the District Court's conclusion that even if the officer had seen the license plate in the window, the officer was still permitted to make an investigatory stop to ensure that the license plate was securely fastened to the vehicle was also erroneous. Such a holding would justify an investigatory stop of every vehicle in Montana. Law enforcement is not permitted to make an investigatory stop unless an officer observes objective data that gives rise to an inference that an individual is engaged in wrongdoing, and that objective data did not exist in this case. St. v. Lacasella, 2002 MT 326, 313 M 185, 60 P3d 975 (2002).

Sufficient Evidence to Support Particularized Suspicion to Justify Investigatory Stop — Petition for Reinstatement of Driver's License Properly Denied: A highway patrol officer observed a vehicle swerve and hit the guardrail. The vehicle did not stop, so the officer followed the vehicle as it exited the freeway. The officer believed, in part, that the driver violated 61-7-108, failing to report an accident causing damage of $500 or more, so the officer stopped the vehicle and subsequently arrested Moore for DUI. When Moore refused a breath test, the officer seized Moore's driver's license. Moore petitioned for reinstatement of the license, arguing that the officer could formulate no suspicion that Moore was involved in wrongdoing that would warrant an investigative stop because the officer could not have known whether Moore was going to report the accident by the quickest means, which was for Moore to drive home and call. The District Court denied the petition, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The officer testified that the damage to the guardrail alone exceeded $500 and that Moore passed up at least two opportunities to stop and use a pay telephone to report the accident before the investigatory stop. Although the evidence conflicted, it was within the province of the District Court to determine the weight of the evidence and credibility of the witnesses. The officer testified credibly, and there was sufficient evidence in the record to indicate that the officer had the requisite particularized suspicion to justify the investigatory stop. Therefore, denial of Moore's petition to reinstate the driver's license was properly denied. Moore v. St., 2002 MT 315, 313 M 126, 61 P3d 746 (2002), followed in St. v. Schulke, 2005 MT 77, 326 M 390, 109 P3d 744 (2005).

Lack of Physical Description Not Precluding Particularized Suspicion Warranting Investigatory Stop — Defendant in Proximity to Suspects at Crime Scene: A convenience store clerk called police to report a possible theft and gave physical descriptions of two suspects. When a police officer arrived at the scene, he observed three people nearby, two of whom matched the physical description. Niles did not match the description, but was standing with those who did. The officer cornered one of the persons described by the clerk, after which Niles and the other person began walking away. When ordered to stop, the two tried to flee but were apprehended and arrested. Niles was charged with obstructing a peace officer and with possession of alcohol by a minor. During criminal proceedings, Niles moved to suppress evidence based on the contention that the officer lacked a particularized suspicion to detain. The motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although Niles was not physically described in the police report, he nevertheless was clearly associated with the two described suspects near the area of the crime, and although Niles did not initially run away from the officer, he did walk away in the presence of a suspect and in a manner that, under the totality of the circumstances, the officer could form a particularized suspicion that Niles was engaged in or had been engaged in criminal wrongdoing. St. v. Niles, 2002 MT 282, 312 M 453, 59 P3d 1129 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Broken Rope, 278 M 427, 925 P2d 1157 (1996), and St. v. Bauer, 2001 MT 248, 307 M 105, 36 P3d 892 (2001).

Absence of Exigent Circumstances — Warrantless Search Unjustified: Logan was one of two passengers in a vehicle that was stopped for failure to have the rear license plate illuminated. The officer recognized the driver, who had a history of carrying weapons and of violence toward police officers, and called for backup. The officer then approached the vehicle but did not smell or observe any illegal drugs or drug paraphernalia or observe any behavior that led the officer to believe that anyone in the vehicle was under the influence of drugs. After obtaining identification from the driver and passengers, the officer ran a check for outstanding warrants on all the parties and learned that all three persons had past drug arrests and that an extreme officer caution alert was in effect for the driver. The officer then called for another officer who had a drug-sniffing dog. The dog alerted to the passenger-side door of the car, and the officer removed a purse from the back seat containing drug paraphernalia and a paper bindle. The dog entered the vehicle and indicated additional drugs. Logan was subsequently arrested for possession of dangerous drugs but moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the officer did not have a particularized suspicion of the presence of drugs to support a canine sniff search of the vehicle. The Supreme Court agreed. In St. v. Elison, 2000 MT 288, 302 M 228, 14 P3d 456 (2000), the Supreme Court held that there is no automobile exception to constitutional search warrant requirements and that the mobility of a vehicle, without more, is not sufficient to justify a warrantless search. In addition to particularized suspicion, a warrantless search of a vehicle requires probable cause and a generally applicable exception to the warrant requirement, such as plain view search, a search incident to arrest, or exigent circumstances, which was the only applicable exception at issue here. The District Court held that the exigent circumstance in this case was that allowing Logan to reenter the vehicle to retrieve the purse would have provided the opportunity to destroy the evidence. However, the officer testified that there was nothing that prevented obtaining a search warrant, and that testimony itself belied the fact that exigent circumstances existed. Because the state failed to meet the heavy burden of proving exigent circumstances, the District Court erred in denying Logan's motion to suppress, so the case was reversed. St. v. Logan, 2002 MT 206, 311 M 239, 53 P3d 1285 (2002).

Few People in Area of Early Morning Complaint, Coupled With Flight by Suspect, Sufficient to Warrant Investigative Stop: A Havre police officer responded to a 2:47 a.m. complaint that two people were "messing around with cars" and were running toward the post office, but no physical description was provided. While searching the post-office area, the officer noticed a person walking down the street. Upon seeing the police car, the person began running. Bauer was eventually found and arrested for minor in possession, second offense. During booking, Bauer was also found to be in possession of drugs but moved to suppress on grounds that the officer had no particularized suspicion to make the investigative stop. The District Court found that the stop was warranted, and the Supreme Court agreed, based on these facts: (1) it was early in the morning and there were few people walking on the streets; (2) Bauer was in close proximity to the location of the complaint; (3) there was no physical description of the two individuals available in the complaint; (4) the patrol vehicle was clearly marked with reflective striping and top lights and could be plainly seen under the street lights; and (5) Bauer ran and attempted to hide upon seeing the patrol vehicle. St. v. Bauer, 2001 MT 248, 307 M 105, 36 P3d 892 (2001).

Gravamen of Particularized Suspicion Standard — Totality of Circumstances Giving Rise to Basis for Suspecting Criminal Activity: Van Kirk pulled into a parking lot and spotted an officer and then left immediately in an apparent attempt to avoid the officer. Upon realizing that the officer had followed him, Van Kirk slowed to 7 to 10 miles an hour in a 25-mile-per-hour zone and continuously watched the officer in the rearview mirror. Van Kirk's vehicle shifted from the edge of the road to across the midpoint several times in a manner that would have impeded any oncoming traffic. The officer initiated a traffic stop, and Van Kirk was arrested for DUI. Van Kirk contended that the officer lacked a particularized suspicion to conduct the stop. The Supreme Court disagreed. Particularized suspicion does not require that an officer possess proof beyond a reasonable doubt that a crime has been or is about to be committed before initiating an investigatory stop. The gravamen of the particularized suspicion standard is that the totality of the circumstances confronting the officer at the time of the stop must give rise to a particularized and objective basis for suspecting criminal activity. In evaluating the totality of the circumstances, the Supreme Court considers the quantity or content and the quality or degree of reliability of the information available to the officer. Particularized suspicion is quantitatively different from and less stringent than probable cause to arrest or conduct a search. As set out in St. v. Gilder, 1999 MT 207, 295 M 483, 985 P2d 147 (1999), in order to show sufficient cause to stop a vehicle, the state must show both objective data from which an experienced officer can make certain inferences and a resulting suspicion that the vehicle occupant is or has been engaged in wrongdoing or was a witness to criminal activity. In this case, Van Kirk's behavior was sufficiently suspicious to give the officer a particularized suspicion to initiate an investigatory stop. St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001).

Erratic Driving at Night in Proximity to Bars — Totality of Circumstances Justifying Traffic Stop: Shortly after midnight, an officer observed Loiselle's vehicle drifting across the right traffic lane, crossing the white fog line, making several turns without signaling, and weaving. The officer pulled Loiselle over for an investigative stop, which resulted in a DUI charge. At trial, Loiselle moved to suppress evidence obtained during the stop, but the motion was denied, and Loiselle appealed. To make an investigatory stop, an officer must have a particularized and objective basis for suspecting criminal activity, and whether particularized suspicion exists is a question of fact determined by considering the totality of the circumstances. In this case, the totality of the circumstances justified the stop. Loiselle did not merely touch the fog line, but actually drove over it and proceeded on the shoulder of the road for at least 3 seconds. The behavior was preceded by erratic driving that caught the officer's attention and that occurred late at night in the proximity of several nearby bars. Irrespective of Loiselle's failure to use turn signals, to a 5-year veteran of the Sheriff's office, there was sufficient objective data from which the officer could suspect that the occupant of the vehicle had engaged in wrongdoing and commence an investigatory stop. St. v. Loiselle, 2001 MT 174, 306 M 166, 30 P3d 1097 (2001).

Grounds for Investigative Stop of Vehicle — Knowledge Owner Is Unlicensed Is Sufficient — No Need to Determine Owner Not Licensed Elsewhere: To make an investigative stop of a pickup, the officer needed only a reasonable or particularized suspicion, based on objective data, that an offense was being committed. After the officer observed that a pickup was oscillating between 50 and 60 miles an hour on a freeway and that the plate was new and shiny, in contrast to the rest of the pickup, he had dispatch do a license check and was informed that the pickup owner's license was expired. Knowledge that the pickup owner's license was expired was enough to validate the officer's stop of the pickup because it gave the officer a particularized suspicion that an offense was being committed. The officer did not have to also ascertain, before the stop, that the pickup owner did not have a valid license from another state. St. v. Hatler, 2001 MT 38, 304 M 211, 19 P3d 822A (2001).

Missing Vehicle Headlight Constituting Objective and Particularized Suspicion of Wrongdoing to Justify Investigative Stop: Officers conducting surveillance of a house where drug activities were suspected noticed that a vehicle leaving the area was missing a headlight. The officers believed that the driver, Farabee, may have just completed a drug transaction at the house and pulled over the vehicle, based on the fact that the vehicle appeared to be in violation of 61-9-104, which requires two working headlights. Upon receiving permission and searching the vehicle, the officers discovered marijuana and paraphernalia. On appeal, Farabee argued that the officer who stopped him did not have a particularized suspicion that Farabee was committing an offense because the stop occurred at 1:30 p.m., in broad daylight, and Farabee's headlights were turned off, so the officers could only speculate that the headlight was inoperable. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that the officers' suspicions were particularized. From the objective and particularized data that the vehicle appeared to be missing a headlight, the officers made the reasonable inference that the headlight was inoperable. Particularized suspicion does not require certainty on the part of an officer; thus, the District Court's conclusion that Farabee was engaged in wrongdoing that justified an investigative stop was not clearly erroneous. St. v. Farabee, 2000 MT 265, 302 M 29, 22 P3d 175, 57 St. Rep. 1106 (2000), distinguishing Grinde v. St., 249 M 77, 813 P2d 473 (1991), and St. v. Reynolds, 272 M 46, 899 P2d 540 (1995).

Traffic Stop of Illegally Operated Vehicle Not Considered Pretext for Search of Vehicle for Narcotics: Officers conducting surveillance of a house where drug activities were suspected noticed that a vehicle leaving the area was missing a headlight. The officers believed that the driver, Farabee, may have just completed a drug transaction at the house and pulled over the vehicle, based on the fact that the vehicle appeared to be in violation of 61-9-104, which requires two working headlights. Upon receiving permission and searching the vehicle, the officers discovered marijuana and paraphernalia. On appeal, Farabee argued that the evidence should be suppressed because the officers used the equipment violation as a pretext to stop him and investigate their hunch, in violation of Art. II, sec. 10 and 11, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court disagreed, applying the rationale in Whren v. U.S., 517 US 806 (1996), that an officer's motive for a traffic stop does not render an objectively reasonable stop invalid. The constitutional reasonableness of a traffic stop does not depend on the subjective motivations of the individual officers involved. In this case, based on the objective and particularized data that the vehicle appeared to be missing a headlight, the officers made the reasonable inference that the headlight was inoperable, so the totality of the circumstances justified the investigative stop. Farabee's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Farabee, 2000 MT 265, 302 M 29, 22 P3d 175, 57 St. Rep. 1106 (2000), distinguishing St. v. Lahr, 172 M 32, 560 P2d 527 (1977).

Random Recovery and Examination of Items Not Allowed Pursuant to Stop and Frisk — Premise of Plain Feel Doctrine: Heath was charged with possession of drugs and drug paraphernalia discovered during a warrantless pat-down search for weapons conducted during a stop and frisk. Heath moved for suppression of the evidence on grounds that a small leather coin purse and a 2-inch glass pipe could not reasonably have been mistaken for weapons, but the motion was denied. The state contended that the pat down was permissible and that the drug evidence found during the search was lawfully seized under the plain feel doctrine. Pursuant to St. v. Stubbs, 270 M 364, 892 P2d 547, 52 St. Rep. 232 (1995), the state must satisfy two criteria for a stop and frisk to be valid at its inception: (1) the officer must have objective data from which an experienced officer can make certain inferences; and (2) the officer must have a resulting suspicion that the occupant of a vehicle was engaged in wrongdoing or was a witness to criminal activity. The frisk is to search for potential weapons, and the officer must suspect an object to be a weapon, or if the officer detects other contraband during the pat down for weapons, its incriminating character must be immediately apparent. The District Court determined that the small leather coin purse could not be mistaken for a weapon, but nevertheless concluded that it could have contained a weapon. However, that conclusion exceeded the permissible scope of a pat-down search, and the Supreme Court found no justification in removing the coin purse on the blanket assumption that it could contain a weapon. The court also found no basis for concluding that the glass pipe's incriminating nature was immediately apparent, and thus there was no basis for invoking the plain feel doctrine. An officer cannot randomly recover items from a suspect's clothing and proceed to examine them pursuant to a stop and frisk and then, after the fact, argue that the objects might have contained a weapon or were immediately apparent as contraband. Here, the warrantless search was per se unreasonable, and the state failed to prove that the search came within the reasonable scope of a stop and frisk. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court's denial of Heath's motion to suppress and remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Heath, 2000 MT 94, 299 M 230, 999 P2d 324, 57 St. Rep. 387 (2000), distinguishing St. v. Lamere, 226 M 323, 735 P2d 511 (1987).

Particularized Suspicion That Suspect Involved in Burglary Sufficient to Justify Investigatory Stop: Based on the objective data and totality of the circumstances, the District Court did not err in concluding that an investigating officer had a particularized suspicion to stop Collard. The officer's experience and training led him to believe that Collard may have been connected to a robbery, based on the following facts: (1) the officer knew that the crime had been committed by a male who was acting alone; (2) Collard was first observed only a few blocks from the crime scene; (3) Collard's vehicle was the only vehicle moving about just after the crime was committed; (4) Collard was the only person in the vehicle; (5) Collard was driving in a hurried manner away from the crime scene; and (6) Collard surprised the officer by pulling over unexpectedly. St. v. Collard, 286 M 185, 951 P2d 56, 54 St. Rep. 1366 (1997).

INVESTIGATIVE STOP OF ANOTHER DURING LAWFUL SEARCH

Standard of Review of Denial of Motion to Suppress Evidence of Investigatory Stop: The Supreme Court reviews the denial of a motion to suppress evidence from an investigatory stop to determine whether the trial court's finding that the officer involved had a particularized suspicion to justify the investigatory stop was clearly erroneous. The trial court's conclusions of law are reviewed to determine whether the court's interpretation of the law was correct. St. v.

Lovegren, 2002 MT 153, 310 M 358, 51 P3d 471 (2002), followed in St. v. Nelson, 2004 MT 13, 319 M 250, 84 P3d 25 (2004).

Requisite Objective Data and Resulting Suspicion for Lawful Stop and Frisk in Motel Room: Officers were lawfully searching Roehr's motel room when Dawson knocked on the door. An officer opened the door, and Dawson entered, asking for Roehr. The officer told Dawson that he was going to conduct a pat-down search for weapons and asked Dawson if he possessed any weapons, drugs, or needles. Dawson said that he had no weapons. The officer repeated the question. Dawson motioned toward his coat pocket and said that he had some "smoke" in there. The "smoke" turned out to be methamphetamine and drug paraphernalia. Dawson sought to suppress the evidence, contending that the search was illegal because the officer had no articulable, reasonable suspicion that Dawson had engaged in criminal activity. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that Roehr was a known criminal and that his room had been under surveillance for suspected drug activity. The officer had probable cause to believe that Roehr was conducting transactions involving dangerous drugs and stolen property in the room. When Dawson appeared, asking for Roehr, the officer had a particularized suspicion, based on the totality of the circumstances, to believe that Dawson had committed or was about to commit an offense. Thus, sufficient cause existed to detain Dawson. Further, in the officer's experience, people involved in drug offenses frequently carry weapons. The officer had no prior dealings with Dawson to help him determine whether Dawson was armed and did not know whether Dawson presented a danger to the officers conducting the search of the room, so reasonable cause existed to suspect that Dawson was armed and dangerous. Therefore, the officer possessed the requisite objective data and resulting suspicion to lawfully stop and frisk Dawson, and denial of the motion to suppress the fruits of the search was not error. St. v. Dawson, 1999 MT 171, 295 M 212, 983 P2d 916, 56 St. Rep. 668 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Anderson, 1999 MT 60, 293 M 490, 977 P2d 983, 56 St. Rep. 252 (1999).

LEGAL BUT UNUSUAL DRIVING OR OTHER BEHAVIOR OR CIRCUMSTANCES

Slow Operation of Vehicle and Buildup of Traffic Behind Vehicle Establishing Particularized Suspicion That Driver Impeding Traffic — Stop Warranted: Benders was driving between 25 and 40 miles an hour in a 50-mile-an-hour zone and continued to drive at the reduced speed when the speed limit increased to 70 miles an hour. No vehicles were in front of Benders, but at least four vehicles were following, and additional vehicles were quickly approaching. An officer was concerned that Benders' slow driving was creating a dangerous situation even though there was nothing to indicate a need to drive at a reduced speed. The officer stopped Benders for impeding traffic pursuant to 61-8-311, and Benders was subsequently arrested for DUI. Benders moved to suppress all evidence relating to the initial stop, but the motion was denied. On appeal, Benders asserted that the motion should have been granted because the officer did not have a particularized suspicion to justify the stop. The Supreme Court affirmed. The combination of slow speed and the buildup of vehicles provided the officer with sufficient information that Bender was impeding traffic, justifying the stop. Benders also argued that the state failed to establish the minimum speed required under 61-8-311 and thus failed to show that his speed was slow enough to violate the law. However, the relevant determination under 61-8-311 is not the speed of the vehicle, but the effect of the slow speed on the flow of traffic. Benders also claimed that a violation of 61-8-311 requires a showing that a defendant has created unsafe driving conditions and an increased risk of an accident. However, such a showing is not required under the statute, and it would be inappropriate to conclude that an officer must wait for an unsafe driving condition to arise before concluding that traffic was being impeded. St. v. Benders, 2006 MT 275, 334 M 231, 146 P3d 751 (2006).

Objective Manifestation to Support Investigation Following Traffic Stop — Time of Stop Extended: Following a traffic stop and observation of Nelson's behavior, officers conducted a DUI investigation, performed field sobriety tests and arrested Nelson for DUI, and then searched Nelson's car and discovered drugs and paraphernalia. Nelson contended that the fruits of the search should be suppressed because the officers did not give the stop advisory required in former 46-5-402 (repealed 2003) or a Miranda advisory and because the DUI investigation at the scene exceeded the scope of the investigative stop. The motion to suppress was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The stop advisory issue was not contested, and the Supreme Court declined to address it. Nelson was not entitled to a Miranda warning because the Miranda protections are afforded during a custodial interrogation but do not apply to an investigative stop. In addition, as in St. v. Henderson, 1998 MT 233, 291 M 77, 966 P2d 137 (1998), the initial investigatory stop took on the quality of an escalating situation in which additional information gave rise to further suspicions and enlarged the scope of the investigation to that of a possible DUI. The officers had a particularized suspicion to conduct the DUI investigation, properly extending the time of the stop. Although the Supreme Court has not established specific time parameters to which an officer must adhere when conducting an investigative stop, the 24 minutes taken to conduct the investigative stop in this case was reasonable and not excessive. St. v. Nelson, 2004 MT 310, 323 M 510, 101 P3d 261 (2004).

Unusual but Legal Driving and Unsupported Tip Insufficient Grounds for Particularized Suspicion to Make Investigative Stop: An officer received a tip concerning suspicious activity in a high crime area of Billings. The officer observed Fisher's car in the area and followed the car. The officer observed that the vehicle had a temporary sticker, which could not be read, but no license plate. The vehicle made several turns and ended up on the street where the officer originally saw it. The officer then stopped the vehicle, and Fisher was subsequently arrested for possession of drugs and drug paraphernalia. Fisher moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the officer had no particularized suspicion to make the stop. The motion was denied, and Fisher was convicted and appealed. The state initially claimed that the officer had a particularized suspicion that Fisher was in violation of vehicle registration laws, but the state waived that argument when the officer did not testify to that effect. Further, none of the information in the anonymous tip was connected to Fisher; rather, the officer stated that he wanted to obtain the identity of the vehicle occupants for later investigation of the tip. However, under St. v. Anderson, 258 M 510, 853 P2d 1245 (1993), an investigative stop is not justified in order to corroborate a tip. Last, Fisher maintained an appropriate speed, violated no traffic laws, and made no unusual turns, and Fisher's driving was not headlong flight or evasive. The simple fact that Fisher drove back to the original street where the officer saw the vehicle, absent more objective data, was insufficient for the officer to form a particularized suspicion that Fisher was engaged in criminal activity based on operation of the vehicle. Thus, the stop violated Fisher's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure, and the Supreme Court reversed. St. v. Fisher, 2002 MT 335, 313 M 274, 60 P3d 1004 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Henderson, 1998 MT 233, 291 M 77, 966 P2d 137 (1998), and Ill. v. Wardlow, 528 US 119 (2000), and distinguished in St. v. Flemings, 2008 MT 229, 344 M 360, 188 P3d 1020 (2008).

One Taillight Brighter Than Other — Not Grounds for Investigative Stop: An investigative stop of a motor vehicle was not justified by the fact that one taillight burned brighter than the other when both lights, including the running lights, brake lights, and turn signals, worked. A variance in the illuminating qualities of taillights on a vehicle is not a violation of Montana law if each emits a red light plainly visible from a distance of 1,000 feet to the rear. The Supreme Court held that all evidence gathered as a result of the stop must be suppressed. St. v. Kaufman, 2002 MT 294, 313 M 1, 59 P3d 1166 (2002).

Insufficient Particularized Suspicion of Crime to Justify Investigative Stop — To Pee or Not to Pee: On the night of November 16, 1999, officers came up behind a vehicle parallel parked legally beside a frontage road. As they passed the vehicle, they noticed a man standing by the passenger door on the side farthest from the road, apparently urinating. The man had taken steps so as not to expose himself to passers-by. The officers proceeded on, but decided to return and warn the man about the impropriety of his conduct. Upon reaching the vehicle, there was no longer anyone standing by it, but Kleinsasser was in the driver's seat making a call on a cell phone, another person was in the passenger seat, and another was lying down on the back seat. All three denied standing by the vehicle and denied knowing who had been doing so. The officers also smelled alcohol emanating from the vehicle, and asked Kleinsasser to perform field sobriety tests, which he failed. Kleinsasser was arrested for DUI, but refused to take a breath test, so his driver's license was seized and suspended. The District Court denied Kleinsasser's petition challenging the license suspension, and Kleinsasser appealed. The only relevant issue for the District Court to consider was whether the officer had reasonable grounds to believe that Kleinsasser was driving under the influence. The reasonable grounds requirement in 61-8-403 is equivalent to the requirement for particularized suspicion to make an investigative stop in this section, which requires the state to show objective data from which an experienced officer could make certain inferences, and a resulting suspicion that the occupant of a certain vehicle is or has been engaged in wrongdoing or was a witness to criminal activity. When the totality of the circumstances does not support a particularized suspicion, an investigative stop is not justified. The state argued that the observed activity constituted disorderly conduct. The Supreme Court disagreed. Kleinsasser's act did not create a hazardous condition, and the court found it hard to imagine any act that serves a more legitimate purpose than answering nature's call. Further, the behavior was not considered physically offensive in this case because it occurred at night, in a rural location where there were no overhead lights or other traffic at the time. There was no evidence that the act disturbed anyone other than the officers, and neither officer was so disturbed that he considered giving the individual a citation; therefore, an allegation of disorderly conduct was unfounded. Absent a particularized suspicion to justify an investigative stop, the subsequent seizure of Kleinsasser's driver's license was invalid. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court's error in denying Kleinsasser's petition for reinstatement of his license. Kleinsasser v. St., 2002 MT 36, 308 M 325, 42 P3d 801 (2002).

Petitioner's Driver's License Reinstated on Basis That No Grounds Existed to Justify Officer's Particularized Suspicion for Stopping Petitioner's Vehicle: Officer Van Every observed Morris's vehicle drift and touch the fog line. Believing that Morris might be driving under the influence, the officer stopped Morris and ultimately arrested him when he refused to provide a sample of his breath. The lower court reinstated Morris's license on the basis that there was no particularized suspicion for the traffic stop. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's decision, ruling that merely touching or crossing the fog line while driving is not a traffic infraction and in itself is insufficient to create a particularized suspicion of wrongdoing that would justify a traffic stop. The Supreme Court in dicta clarified that the present case and St. v. Lafferty, 1998 MT 247, 291 M 157, 967 P2d 363 (1998), were not to be construed as requiring a traffic violation as necessary to create a particularized suspicion prior to a traffic stop. Morris v. St., 2001 MT 13, 304 M 114, 18 P3d 1003 (2001).

Slow Driving Not Grounds for Stop: Driving slowly, about 15 miles an hour in a 25-mile-an-hour zone, did not justify a stop by a Deputy Sheriff, and evidence arising from the stop should have been suppressed. St. v. Gilder, 1999 MT 207, 295 M 483, 985 P2d 147, 56 St. Rep. 808 (1999).

No Particularized Suspicion — Stop Illegal — Evidence Suppressed: At 3:30 a.m. on a cold morning in a high-crime area, a police officer who was searching for a participant in a domestic disturbance observed defendant talking on a pay phone. When the police officer drove back by the phone, the phone was off the hook and defendant was gone. When he spotted defendant leaving a parking lot in the area, the police officer made a traffic stop and discovered a knife in plain view on the front seat of the car and illegal drugs and a gun on defendant's person. Defendant moved to suppress all the evidence. The District Court denied the motion. The Supreme Court reversed. A person's presence in a high-crime area does not alone give the police a particularized suspicion to stop the person. The facts did not rise to the level of a reasonable and articulable suspicion that defendant was, had been, or was about to engage in criminal activity. Because the stop was illegal, all evidence must be suppressed. St. v. Jarman, 1998 MT 277, 291 M 391, 967 P2d 1099, 55 St. Rep. 1133 (1998), distinguished in St. v. Flemings, 2008 MT 229, 344 M 360, 188 P3d 1020 (2008).

Inability to Verify Temporary Vehicle Purchase Sticker and Failure to Promptly Respond to Signal to Stop — Particularized Suspicion to Stop Vehicle: An officer observed Henderson driving a motor vehicle without license plates, noticed what appeared to be a temporary tag in the rear window, but was unable to verify the validity of the tag from a distance because of dark window tinting. For two and one-half blocks, Henderson failed to respond to the officer's signal to pull over. Once the vehicle was stopped, one of the passengers attempted to exit, further raising the officer's suspicions. Rather than immediately checking the tag, the officer proceeded to the driver side window and asked Henderson for license, registration, and proof of insurance. The officer then became aware of a strong odor of alcohol emanating from the vehicle and observed that Henderson's speech was slurred and thick. The officer performed field sobriety tests and a breath test, which Henderson failed. Henderson was arrested, and a subsequent search of the vehicle revealed alcohol and drugs in the passenger compartment. Following the arrest, the officer discovered that the temporary tag was valid. The District Court suppressed the evidence on the grounds that the officer lacked a particularized suspicion to stop the vehicle. The Supreme Court held that the inability to identify the tag gave rise to a particularized suspicion as to the proper registration of the vehicle. The suspicion was further bolstered by Henderson's unusual behavior in failing to promptly respond to the signal to pull over, by the attempt of a passenger to exit, and by the officer's inability to see into the vehicle. At that point, the officer's suspicion was reasonably broadened to include a particularized suspicion that the driver might be impaired. From the moment that the officer noted the smell of alcohol and Henderson's slurred speech, the initial investigatory stop took on the quality of an escalating situation in which the additional information gave rise to further suspicions and enlarged the scope of the investigation to that of a possible DUI. The District Court erred in suppressing the evidence on grounds that the officer exceeded the scope of the investigation, and the case was reversed. St. v. Henderson, 1998 MT 233, 291 M 77, 966 P2d 137, 55 St. Rep. 980 (1998), distinguishing St. v. Farley, 775 P2d 835 (Oreg. 1989), and People v. Redinger, 906 P2d 81 (Colo. 1995).

Evidence Insufficient to Support Finding of Particularized Suspicion of Engagement in Criminal Activity — Suppression of Evidence Seized in Investigative Search: Belgarde and Broken Rope were observed traveling in a vehicle registered to Belgarde. A records check revealed an outstanding warrant on Belgarde for fish and game violations. When the two stopped at a convenience store, the officer observed them acting nervous, using the telephone, moving around the store parking lot, watching the officer, and putting their hands in their pockets. Following the subsequent arrest of Belgarde on the outstanding warrant, the officer also searched Broken Rope, finding weapons and drugs. In light of the requirement that some objective manifestation must exist to support a particularized suspicion that a person is engaged in criminal activity before a stop may be made, the Supreme Court held that the evidence seized in the search of Broken Rope should have been suppressed because, despite the officer's training and experience, Broken Rope did nothing inherently suspicious to form the basis for inferences resulting in a particularized suspicion that he was engaged in criminal activity. St. v. Broken Rope, 278 M 427, 925 P2d 1157, 53 St. Rep. 987 (1996). See also St. v. Reynolds, 272 M 46, 899 P2d 540 (1995), and St. v. Carlson, 2000 MT 320, 302 M 508, 15 P3d 893, 57 St. Rep. 1348 (2000).

Particularized Suspicion Not Supported by Totality of Circumstances — Investigatory Stop Unjustified: An investigatory stop must be justified by some objective manifestation that the person stopped is or is about to be engaged in criminal activity, and the totality of the circumstances must give the police a particularized and objective basis for suspecting the person of criminal activity. The issue of whether a particularized suspicion exists in order to justify an investigative stop is factually driven. When the totality of the circumstances does not support a particularized suspicion, the investigatory stop is unjustified. Citing numerous applicable Montana cases, the Supreme Court, in this instance, noted the fact that Reynolds had moved through an intersection "bordering on traveling too fast" for conditions, but not necessarily breaking the law critically or technically and exhibiting no patterns consistent with a person driving under the influence of alcohol or erratically. The possible traffic violation could not be combined with any other objective data to support a particularized suspicion that Reynolds was engaged in wrongdoing. Therefore, the subsequent investigatory stop was unwarranted. Reynolds' motion to dismiss DUI charges based on the unlawful stop was granted. St. v. Reynolds, 272 M 46, 899 P2d 540, 52 St. Rep. 600 (1995), followed in In re Bauer v. St., 275 M 119, 910 P2d 886, 53 St. Rep. 65 (1996), and St. v. Roberts, 1999 MT 59, 293 M 476, 977 P2d 974, 56 St. Rep. 245 (1999), and distinguished in Seyferth v. St., 277 M 377, 922 P2d 494, 53 St. Rep. 698 (1996), and Missoula v. Cook, 2001 MT 237, 307 M 39, 36 P3d 414 (2001). See also St. v. Gilder, 1999 MT 207, 295 M 483, 985 P2d 147, 56 St. Rep. 808 (1999).

Unprivileged Use of Force: When the plaintiff claimed to have knowledge material to an investigation and was at the scene of the crime 20 hours after the crime was committed, a law enforcement officer was not privileged to use force to stop the plaintiff. Luciano v. Ren, 180 M 187, 589 P2d 1005 (1979).

FREEDOM TO LEAVE

Legal Detention Following Traffic Stop — Voluntary Consent to Search Vehicle — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Case was stopped for a traffic violation, and drugs were found in Case's car after Case allegedly consented to a search of the vehicle. Following conviction, Case appealed on grounds that evidence of the search should have been suppressed because the officer exceeded the scope of the initial stop by detaining Case and continuing to question him after issuing traffic citations. The Supreme Court concluded that under the circumstances, Case remained under police control during questioning and could not have reasonably concluded that he was free to leave. Because Case was not involved in a voluntary exchange, Case was in fact "seized" when he gave permission to search the vehicle. The court then examined whether particularized suspicion existed to continue the investigatory stop past the issuance of traffic citations and whether Case's consent to the search was voluntary. In this case, Case was legally detained because additional information, including Case's questionable behavior, his multiple connections with drugs, and confusion whether Case was in fact another person named Case who had skipped town, gave rise to further suspicions that served to properly enlarge the scope of the investigation. The only circumstance that Case claimed affected the voluntariness of his consent to search the vehicle was that the detention was illegal. Having concluded that the detention was legal, the court further concluded that Case's consent was voluntary and that the motion to suppress the fruits of the search was properly denied. St. v. Case, 2007 MT 161, 338 M 87, 162 P3d 849 (2007). See also St. v. Roberts, 1999 MT 59, 293 M 476, 977 P2d 974 (1999), and St. v. Hurlbert, 2009 MT 221, 351 M 316, 211 P3d 869 (2009).

Particularized Suspicion Sufficient Justification for Request for Consent to Search Vehicle — No Illegal Detention — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Snell was stopped for speeding and was also cited for failure to carry proof of insurance. While writing out the citation in the patrol car, the officer asked Snell if he could search the vehicle, and Snell consented. The officer discovered drugs, and Snell was charged with possession and intent to distribute marijuana. Snell moved to suppress the evidence. Snell conceded that he had voluntarily consented to the search, and the state conceded that the officer did not have probable cause. The motion to suppress was denied, and Snell appealed. The Supreme Court considered both the consent and illegal detention issues. First, the court reasoned that the officer had particularized suspicion to stop the vehicle and that Montana law does not require additional justification for requesting consent, so Snell's voluntary consent was sufficient to justify the warrantless search of the vehicle (see St. v. Parker, 1998 MT 6, 287 M 151, 953 P2d 692 (1998)). Second, the court concluded that because the officer did not coerce or restrain Snell, order him to stay, or prevent Snell from exiting the patrol car, a reasonable person would have felt free to leave the patrol car upon completion of the traffic stop, so the poststop interaction between Snell and the officer was a voluntary exchange rather than an illegal detention or unlawful seizure (see St. v. Merrill, 2004 MT 169, 322 M 47, 93 P3d 1227 (2004), and St. v. Hill, 2004 MT 184, 322 M 165, 94 P3d 752 (2004)). Snell's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Snell, 2004 MT 269, 323 M 157, 99 P3d 191 (2004).

No Privacy Interest in Rental Car by Unauthorized Driver Who Disavows Ownership of Contents: Hill was stopped for speeding and ticketed. After the stop was completed, the officer engaged Hill in small talk, inquiring where Hill was going and where his traveling clothes were. Hill replied that it was a quick trip, so no extra clothes were needed. Although no bags or clothes were in sight, the officer asked if Hill was carrying anything illegal. Hill said no, and the officer asked if Hill would consent to a search of the vehicle, to which Hill initially consented. In going over the terms of the consent form, Hill related that the car had been rented by a friend and that a search of the trunk was probably not a good idea because Hill did not know what the friend might have placed there. The officer then checked on the origin of the car and discovered that it had been acquired through a rental agency, but that the car was 2 days late in being returned, and that Hill was not an authorized driver. The agency asked that the car be impounded and gave permission for a search. The officers found two bags in the trunk, but Hill disclaimed ownership of the bags. A search of the bags revealed drugs and Hill's cell phone charger. Hill was then charged with drug crimes and later moved to suppress the evidence, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Hill had no reasonable expectation of privacy in the car's contents because he was not an authorized driver, had no relation to the car's owner or renter, and voluntarily disclaimed knowledge and ownership of anything in the car. Hill could not expect privacy in a car he illegally possessed, and once Hill waived control over the bags, he implicitly granted permission for the bags to be accessed. The search of the trunk was reasonable because permission was granted by the car owner, and the trunk contents were effectively surrendered by Hill, making the car owner's permission to search the vehicle sufficient to permit a full search of items found in the car. St. v. Hill, 2004 MT 184, 322 M 165, 94 P3d 752 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Elison, 2000 MT 288, 302 M 228, 14 P3d 456 (2000), and St. v. Tackitt, 2003 MT 81, 315 M 59, 67 P3d 295 (2003).

Search Incident to Conversation After Traffic Stop Concluded Considered Voluntary — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Officers stopped Merrill for investigation following an improper lane change. A license plate check showed that Merrill was not the vehicle owner. However, the vehicle was owned by a person suspected by one of the officers to be involved with dangerous drugs. The officer told Merrill that he was just giving her a verbal warning and that she was free to go. Stepping away from the vehicle, the officer noticed that Merrill seemed unusually nervous. Suspicious about the report regarding the vehicle owner, the officer again approached the vehicle and asked Merrill if he could talk to her. Merrill answered affirmatively. The officer then asked if he could search the vehicle. Merrill again answered affirmatively. Merrill stepped out of the car, and the officer asked if he could search her person, including her pockets. Merrill again answered affirmatively, and the officer discovered drugs in her pocket. Merrill contended that she had been unlawfully detained subsequent to an investigatory stop and that the evidence should be suppressed. The trial court concluded that the search was voluntary and denied the suppression motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Once the officer completed the investigation of the improper lane change, the investigatory stop was concluded and Merrill was free to leave. What followed was neither a subsequent investigatory stop nor an extension of the first stop, but rather a voluntary exchange, and nothing prevents an officer from engaging a citizen in a voluntary conversation. A purely voluntary conversation intrudes on no constitutionally protected interest, so Merrill was accorded no constitutional protection related to the search and seizure, and denial of the motion to suppress was appropriate. St. v. Merrill, 2004 MT 169, 322 M 47, 93 P3d 1227 (2004), followed in St. v. Hill, 2004 MT 184, 322 M 165, 94 P3d 752 (2004).

Voluntary Encounter Versus Investigative Stop: Officers received a report from a citizen that a vehicle had been observed being driven erratically on the interstate and that the driver had pulled over at a convenience store and staggered into the building. When officers arrived, they found an unoccupied vehicle that matched the informant's description and observed Wagner inside on the telephone. The officers initiated contact with Wagner, noticing immediately that he appeared intoxicated, and requested that Wagner speak with them outside. Wagner acceded, voluntarily admitted that he had been drinking, failed field sobriety tests, and was arrested for DUI. Wagner subsequently asserted that the officers lacked a particularized suspicion to make the investigative stop because the informant's report was not sufficiently corroborated and moved to dismiss. The motion was denied, and Wagner appealed. The Supreme Court noted that if the telephone encounter constituted an investigative stop, it would be necessary to determine whether the officers obtained the requisite particularized suspicion, but if the encounter did not constitute a stop, it must be determined whether officers obtained the requisite particularized suspicion after initiating contact but prior to conducting a stop. Here, the court cited U.S. v. Mendenhall, 446 US 544 (1980), and held that Wagner was not "seized" because in view of all the circumstances surrounding the incident, Wagner would not have believed that he was not free to leave. Following the initial approach, the officers then obtained the evidence of Wagner's intoxication through consensual means, providing the requisite particularized suspicion to conduct the ensuing investigative stop. St. v. Wagner, 2003 MT 120, 315 M 498, 68 P3d 840 (2003). See also St. v. Jenkins, 192 M 539, 629 P2d 761 (1981), St. v. Roberts, 1999 MT 59, 293 M 476, 977 P2d 974 (1999), and St. v. Clayton, 2002 MT 67, 309 M 215, 45 P3d 30 (2002).

Traffic Stop Based on Drug Tip Considered Custodial Interrogation — Miranda Warning Required: Officers received a tip from Olson's estranged husband that a methamphetamine lab was being operated in Olson's garage. The officers placed the garage under surveillance and saw equipment being loaded into Olson's car that same day. The officers stopped the car for an investigative stop, and an officer informed Olson that he knew that lab equipment was in the trunk. Olson initially denied it, but when the officer expressed concern for Olson and her son, she made incriminating statements and confessed that the lab was in the car. Olson later sought to suppress the statements because she was not read her Miranda rights before she made the statements. The question was whether Olson was subject to a custodial interrogation that entitled her to receive the Miranda warnings. The District Court held that an interrogation did not occur because Olson was not asked any direct questions. The Supreme Court concluded that although Olson was not under arrest at the time that the statements were made, she was nevertheless subjected to a custodial interrogation. Olson was not free to leave during the conversation, the officer's questions were directed specifically at Olson, no other party was privy to the conversation, and the officer should have known that under the circumstances, his statements were reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response. Because Olson did not receive Miranda warnings before she was interrogated, the statements that she made were in violation of her constitutional right against self-incrimination and should have been suppressed. St. v. Olson, 2003 MT 61, 314 M 402, 66 P3d 297 (2003), followed in St. v. McKee, 2006 MT 5, 330 M 249, 127 P3d 445 (2006). See also St. v. Staat, 251 M 1, 822 P2d 643 (1991), and St. v. Flack, 260 M 181, 860 P2d 89 (1993).

Person's Belief in Inability to Leave Constituting Seizure: Roberts was reported to be driving under the influence and was followed home by an officer who pulled into Roberts' driveway behind Roberts' car, effectively blocking Roberts' exit. Even though Roberts voluntarily pulled into the driveway and could have simply ignored the officer's presence and walked into his house, in this instance, the officer's actions nevertheless constituted an investigatory stop. Citing U.S. v. Mendenhall, 446 US 544, 64 L Ed 2d 497, 100 S Ct 1870 (1980), and U.S. v. Kerr, 817 F2d 1384 (9th Cir. 1987), the Supreme Court held that a person has been "seized" within the context of the constitution only if, in view of all the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that the person was not free to leave. When the officer blocked Roberts' means and direction of travel, the officer precipitated an investigative stop amounting to a seizure of Roberts. St. v. Roberts, 1999 MT 59, 293 M 476, 977 P2d 974, 56 St. Rep. 245 (1999), following St. v. Pratt, 286 M 156, 951 P2d 37, 54 St. Rep. 1349 (1997), and distinguishing St. v. Lee, 282 M 391, 938 P2d 637 (1997).

UNSUPPORTED TIP

Unusual but Legal Driving and Unsupported Tip Insufficient Grounds for Particularized Suspicion to Make Investigative Stop: An officer received a tip concerning suspicious activity in a high crime area of Billings. The officer observed Fisher's car in the area and followed the car. The officer observed that the vehicle had a temporary sticker, which could not be read, but no license plate. The vehicle made several turns and ended up on the street where the officer originally saw it. The officer then stopped the vehicle, and Fisher was subsequently arrested for possession of drugs and drug paraphernalia. Fisher moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the officer had no particularized suspicion to make the stop. The motion was denied, and Fisher was convicted and appealed. The state initially claimed that the officer had a particularized suspicion that Fisher was in violation of vehicle registration laws, but the state waived that argument when the officer did not testify to that effect. Further, none of the information in the anonymous tip was connected to Fisher; rather, the officer stated that he wanted to obtain the identity of the vehicle occupants for later investigation of the tip. However, under St. v. Anderson, 258 M 510, 853 P2d 1245 (1993), an investigative stop is not justified in order to corroborate a tip. Last, Fisher maintained an appropriate speed, violated no traffic laws, and made no unusual turns, and Fisher's driving was not headlong flight or evasive. The simple fact that Fisher drove back to the original street where the officer saw the vehicle, absent more objective data, was insufficient for the officer to form a particularized suspicion that Fisher was engaged in criminal activity based on operation of the vehicle. Thus, the stop violated Fisher's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure, and the Supreme Court reversed. St. v. Fisher, 2002 MT 335, 313 M 274, 60 P3d 1004 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Henderson, 1998 MT 233, 291 M 77, 966 P2d 137 (1998), and Ill. v. Wardlow, 528 US 119 (2000).

Citizen Information Lacking Objective Data — No Particularized Suspicion of Wrongdoing to Warrant Investigative Traffic Stop: An anonymous citizen informant telephoned to notify police that a purple Chevrolet Camaro with a tan convertible top, driven by David Lee, was heading north toward Glasgow on the Fort Peck highway. The informant stated the belief that Lee was speeding and driving under the influence of alcohol. Officer Collins located the described vehicle on the indicated route and checked the vehicle's speed with radar. Lee was driving 52 miles an hour in a 55-mile-an-hour zone. Collins made a U-turn and speeded up behind the Camaro, at which point Lee slowed down to 35 miles an hour. Collins stopped the Camaro, determined that the driver was the person described in the dispatch report, and arrested Lee for driving under the influence. Relying on St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293 (1981), the Supreme Court noted that while an anonymous citizen tip can establish a basis for a particularized suspicion of wrongdoing when corroborated by independent observation of wrongdoing or illegality by an officer, in the absence of other objective data, an anonymous tip alone does not support a particularized suspicion. Lee was not speeding and did not show obvious signs of driving under the influence. Merely slowing down after observing a police car make a U-turn and speed up to come within a few car lengths behind one's vehicle is not illegal and provides no evidence of wrongdoing. Because the investigative stop was not justified, the Supreme Court reversed Lee's conviction and dismissed the case. St. v. Lee, 282 M 391, 938 P2d 637, 54 St. Rep. 401 (1997), followed in St. v. Williamson, 1998 MT 199, 290 M 321, 965 P2d 231, 55 St. Rep. 843 (1998), and St. v. Reiner, 2003 MT 243, 317 M 304, 77 P3d 210 (2003).

Uncorroborated Tip Not Basis for Particularized Suspicion for Traffic Stop: After the Lincoln County Sheriff's Office received a tip that Anderson would be traveling from Idaho to Montana with a large amount of marijuana, officers stopped Anderson's truck and conducted a pat-down search of Anderson's passenger. After finding a marijuana pipe, the passenger was arrested, the vehicle was impounded, a warrant was obtained, and additional marijuana was discovered in the truck. Anderson was convicted of possession with intent to sell. The Supreme Court reversed, citing St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293 (1981), and holding that the officers who stopped the truck had no particularized suspicion that Anderson was engaged in illegal activity. The tip received by the Sheriff's office could not serve as the basis for the stop because an uncorroborated and unreliable tip is not the objective data contemplated by the Gopher case. Because the initial stop was unlawful, the Supreme Court ordered that all of the evidence seized be suppressed. St. v. Anderson, 258 M 510, 853 P2d 1245, 50 St. Rep. 637 (1993).

Probable Cause to Stop: The stop of the defendant's automobile and subsequent events were without probable cause when based solely on conjecture and speculation of another officer transmitted by radio to the arresting officer not present at the scene of the "suspicious" activity. St. v. Marshall, 174 M 278, 570 P2d 909 (1977).

GROUNDS FOR BELIEF IN DUI

Defendant's Prior DUI Conviction Properly Used for Sentencing Enhancement Purposes: Regularity of an earlier proceeding was proven by the state by a preponderance of the evidence when defendant's certified driving record of all his convictions, a signed waiver of rights form from defendant's 2000 conviction, and a signed waiver of rights form from defendant's 2002 conviction were entered into evidence and the court took testimony from the same justice of the peace who took defendant's pleas in 2000, 2001, and 2002 that her course and practice in 2001 was to advise DUI defendants of their right to counsel and have them sign forms acknowledging the same even though defendant's 2001 form could not be located. St. v. Faber, 2008 MT 368, 346 M 449, 197 P3d 941 (2008).

Officer's Observations Sufficient to Establish Particularized Suspicion of DUI Following Caretaker Stop: Vaughn pulled part way off the road, and an officer stopped to see if assistance was needed. The District Court concluded that under the community caretaker doctrine, the officer was justified in stopping to make sure Vaughn was all right. However, Vaughn asserted that once he assured the officer that no assistance was needed, the scope of the doctrine ended and that because the officer had no other justification for the stop, the officer's further questioning and request for field sobriety tests constituted an unlawful seizure, requiring suppression of all evidence gathered. The Supreme Court disagreed. When the officer approached the vehicle, he noticed an open can of beer between the front seats, and when asking about Vaughn's situation, he observed that Vaughn's speech was slurred and that his eyes were bloodshot and watery. Thus, the officer's observations were sufficient to establish a particularized suspicion that Vaughn may have been DUI, justifying further investigation once the purpose of the initial stop was accomplished. It was not error for the trial court to dismiss Vaughn's motion to suppress the evidence. St. v. Vaughn, 2007 MT 164, 338 M 97, 164 P3d 873 (2007).

Observation of Traffic Violation Constituting Objective Data of Wrongdoing — Investigative Stop Justified: Thompson contended that because an officer did not observe Thompson speeding, driving erratically, or causing an accident or near accident and because the officer did not charge Thompson with any driving offense other than DUI, the officer did not have reasonable cause to justify an investigative stop. The Supreme Court disagreed. The officer testified that Thompson's vehicle made a wide turn and crossed over the centerline into the oncoming lane of traffic and that after Thompson overcorrected, Thompson continued to swerve in his own driving lane, rode the centerline, and swerved off the right side of the road, which led the officer to believe that Thompson might be intoxicated. The officer's observations constituted objective data from which an experienced officer could infer that the occupant of the vehicle was engaged in wrongdoing that was sufficient to justify the investigative stop. St. v. Thompson, 2006 MT 274, 334 M 226, 146 P3d 756 (2006), following St. v. Steen, 2004 MT 343, 324 M 272, 102 P3d 1251 (2004), and distinguishing St. v. Lafferty, 1998 MT 247, 291 M 157, 967 P2d 363 (1998), and Morris v. St., 2001 MT 13, 304 M 114, 18 P3d 1003 (2001).

Admissibility of DUI Suspect's Spontaneous Statements: An officer stopped Damon for investigatory purposes, but the officer failed to recite the advisories for investigative stops. Damon answered several questions and then spontaneously said "Just give me a DUI" and "I'm already drunk." Damon contended that all of his statements should be disallowed because the officer failed to give the advisories. The District Court disallowed all of Damon's statements that were given in response to the officer's questions, but allowed Damon's spontaneous statements. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Nelson, 2004 MT 310, 323 M 510, 101 P3d 261 (2004), it is an officer's questioning that triggers the advisories. Damon's spontaneous utterances were not in response to specific questioning and were therefore admissible. St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 M 276, 119 P3d 1194 (2005).

Violation of City Ordinances Constituting Particularized Suspicion for Investigative Stop: An officer saw Todd drive into a closed city park and exit his vehicle with an open beer. When the officer approached Todd's vehicle to inform him that the park was closed and that the city had an open container ordinance, the officer observed that Todd appeared to be intoxicated, and Todd was arrested for DUI. Todd moved to dismiss on grounds that the officer lacked a particularized suspicion to investigate because Todd had not broken any driving laws. The Supreme Court disagreed. A particularized suspicion exists if an officer believes that a person or occupant of a vehicle has committed, is committing, or is about to commit an offense, including a violation of a city ordinance. Thus, Todd's violation of the city ordinances was sufficient to provide the officer with a particularized suspicion of an offense to obtain or verify an account of Todd's presence or conduct, and based on the officer's subsequent observations of objective data indicating Todd's intoxication, the investigative stop was justified. Todd's motion to dismiss was properly denied, and Todd's DUI conviction was affirmed. St. v. Todd, 2005 MT 108, 327 M 65, 111 P3d 677 (2005).

Officer's Testimony and Videotape Sufficient Evidence of Reasonable Grounds for DUI Stop: Clark's driver's license was suspended after he refused to take a breath test when arrested for DUI. In petitioning for reinstatement of the license, Clark contended that the arresting officer lacked a particularized suspicion to make a stop and failed to articulate a reason for the stop at the hearing on the license suspension. The Supreme Court applied the reasonable grounds test in St. v. Brander, 2004 MT 150, 321 M 484, 92 P3d 1173 (2004), and held that the trial court properly concluded, on the basis of the officer's testimony that Clark hit a curb and swerved across lanes, coupled with a videotape of the stop, that the officer had reasonable grounds to investigate Clark for DUI. The trial court properly analyzed the factors in 61-8-403, and the analysis was not clearly erroneous. Denial of the petition to reinstate Clark's license was affirmed. Clark v. State ex rel. Driver Improvement Bureau, 2005 MT 65, 326 M 278, 109 P3d 244 (2005).

Crossing Centerline Sufficient Particularized Suspicion for Investigative Stop: An officer observed Loney crossing the centerline several times, and Loney was stopped for a traffic violation and subsequently charged with DUI. The District Court granted Loney's motion to dismiss for lack of particularized suspicion, citing Morris v. St., 2001 MT 13, 304 M 114, 18 P3d 1003 (2001). The state appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Morris was distinguishable because in that case, defendant was stopped only for DUI and not for driving in a manner justifying a traffic stop, while Loney violated 61-8-321. Crossing the centerline constituted a sufficient particularized suspicion to justify the stop, and the case was remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Loney, 2004 MT 204, 322 M 305, 95 P3d 691 (2004), following Widdicombe v. State ex rel. LaFond, 2004 MT 49, 320 M 133, 85 P3d 1271 (2004), and followed in St. v. Otto, 2004 MT 338, 324 M 217, 102 P3d 522 (2004).

Sufficient Reasonable Cause to Suspect DUI Following Justified Traffic Stop — Refusal to Reinstate License Proper: Muri was initially stopped for expired license plates and then failed DUI field tests. Upon refusal to submit to a blood alcohol test, Muri's driver's license was seized and suspended. Muri petitioned for reinstatement of the license on grounds that the totality of circumstances occurring after the stop did not support a finding of reasonable cause for the officer to believe that Muri was DUI because the only indication of intoxication was the odor of alcohol emanating from the vehicle and the officer could not state with certainty whether the odor came from Muri or from a passenger. The petition was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Contrary to Muri's assertions, the odor was not the only indication of possible intoxication. Muri swerved in the driving lane at least once; the officer smelled a strong odor of alcohol when speaking with Muri; Muri could not produce a driver's license upon request, and when asked to recite her Social Security number, Muri could not do so at first and then recited it with slurred speech; the stop occurred at the approximate time when bars were closing; and Muri admitted consuming some alcohol. Given the officer's numerous observations, the officer had reasonable grounds to believe, prior to requesting field sobriety tests, that Muri was DUI, and the petition to reinstate Muri's license was properly denied. Muri v. St., 2004 MT 192, 322 M 219, 95 P3d 149 (2004), following Anderson v. St., 275 M 259, 912 P2d 212 (1996), and distinguishing Bramble v. St., 1999 MT 132, 294 M 501, 982 P2d 464 (1999). See also Brewer v. St., 2004 MT 193, 322 M 225, 95 P3d 163 (2004).

Sufficient Particularized Suspicion for DUI Stop Based on Anonymous Tip and Officer's Observations: An officer received an anonymous tip that Brander was driving while intoxicated. The tipster named Brander, described the vehicle, including a license number and model, and gave Brander's direction of travel and suspected destination. The officer encountered a vehicle that mostly matched the description and followed, observing that the vehicle was moving slowly, meandering in its lane, crossing the fog line, partially crossing into the left lane without signaling, and then moving back into the right lane. The officer initiated a stop and noticed a number of cases of beer in the back of the truck that were both opened and unopened. Brander failed field sobriety tests and was arrested. Brander contended that the officer did not have reasonable grounds for making the stop based on the anonymous tip and moved to suppress the DUI evidence. The suppression motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Brander's argument failed because the stop was not based solely on the tip with no independent observation of suspicious activity. In fact, the officer was not even initially sure if the vehicle that he was stopping was the one described in the tip, but based on the officer's training and experience, the erratic driving supported a particularized suspicion that the driver was under the influence sufficient to warrant the stop and the administration of field sobriety tests. St. v. Brander, 2004 MT 150, 321 M 484, 92 P3d 1173 (2004), followed in St. v. Schulke, 2005 MT 77, 326 M 390, 109 P3d 744 (2005). See also Hulse v. St., 1998 MT 108, 289 M 1, 961 P2d 75 (1998), and St. v. Waite, 2006 MT 216, 333 M 365, 143 P3d 116 (2006).

Reliability of Citizen's Tip — Totality of Circumstances Justifying Investigative Stop: A citizen called in a suspected DUI, giving a detailed description of Hall and his vehicle. The report by the named informant was bolstered by a store clerk who personally observed Hall's behavior. An officer spotted Hall's vehicle minutes after receiving the report, matched it to the detailed description, and corroborated the report after observing Hall's actions. Hall contended that the officer nevertheless had insufficient information to support a particularized suspicion of DUI and that the subsequent investigative stop was illegal. The Supreme Court applied the factors in St. v. Pratt, 286 M 156, 951 P2d 37 (1997), to evaluate the totality of the circumstances. The court noted that an officer in the field must be able to rely on reports and dispatches from other officers without having to conduct a cross-examination as to the basis of the report, but when an officer has acted on dispatched information, it is appropriate to include information known to the dispatching or reporting officer. Here, the initial tip and the corroboration gave a high indicia of reliability that, when coupled with the officer's observations, satisfied the Pratt factors for a justified investigative stop made pursuant to a tip. St. v. Hall, 2004 MT 106, 321 M 78, 88 P3d 1273 (2004).

Issues for Consideration in Petition for Review of Seizure of Driver's License: As established in Bush v. Dept. of Justice, 1998 MT 270, 291 M 359, 968 P2d 716 (1998), the three issues to be determined by a District Court in a petition for review of a seizure of a driver's license are whether: (1) the arresting officer had a particularized suspicion that a person was driving or in actual control of a vehicle on the ways of this state while under the influence of alcohol or drugs; (2) the petitioner was lawfully under arrest, including the existence of probable cause; and (3) the petitioner in fact declined to submit to a breath test. In this case, Widdicombe contested the first two determinations, but the Supreme Court affirmed. While leaving town on a two-lane highway, the arresting officer and another officer in the patrol car observed Widdicombe crossing the center lane three times, in violation of 61-8-321, and this fact was corroborated by videotape evidence. Thus, Widdicombe failed to meet the burden of proving a lack of particularized suspicion for the initial stop. Further, it was not necessary for the arresting officer to testify to probable cause when another officer witnessed the event and testified. Thus, Widdicombe failed to prove that the officers did not have probable cause for the arrest. Widdicombe v. State ex rel. LaFond, 2004 MT 49, 320 M 133, 85 P3d 1271 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Lafferty, 1998 MT 247, 291 M 157, 967 P2d 363 (1998).

DUI Reasonable Grounds Test Equivalent to Search and Seizure Law Investigative Stop Particularized Suspicion Test: The reasonable grounds test for the issue of whether a peace officer had reasonable grounds to believe that a person was driving or in actual physical control of a vehicle while under the influence of alcohol or drugs is the equivalent of particularized suspicion, as defined in this section, which provides that in order to verify an account of a person's presence or conduct or to determine whether to arrest the person, a peace officer may stop any person or vehicle that is observed in circumstances that create a particularized suspicion that the person or an occupant of a vehicle has committed, is committing, or is about to commit an offense. Hulse v. St., 1998 MT 108, 289 M 1, 961 P2d 75, 55 St. Rep. 415 (1998), followed in Bramble v. St., 1999 MT 132, 294 M 501, 982 P2d 464, 56 St. Rep. 532 (1999).

Field Sobriety Tests Constitute Search — Particularized Suspicion Needed: Field sobriety tests are not merely observations of a person's physical behavior but constitute a search under the fourth amendment to the United States Constitution and Art. II, sec. 11, Mont. Const., because an individual's constitutionally protected privacy interests are implicated in both the process of conducting the tests and in the information disclosed by the tests. An officer observes certain aspects of an individual's physical and psychological condition that would not otherwise be observable. A compelling state interest is needed to invade privacy interest. Montana has a compelling state interest in removing drunk drivers from the road. The officer's observation of such traits as the manner of walking to and from the squad car, height and weight, speech, appearance, and smell is distinguished and does not constitute a search because an individual has no reasonable expectation of privacy as to the traits. An investigatory stop and field sobriety tests are constitutional if based upon particularized suspicion. The particularized suspicion for the investigatory stop may also serve as the particularized suspicion for the field sobriety tests if the basis for the stop leads the officer to believe that the driver is intoxicated. Part or all of the grounds for the particularized suspicion for the field sobriety tests may arise after the investigatory stop when the officer, in the present case, observed defendant drive from a bar at night with her headlights off, he activated his overhead lights, she did not respond, he activated his siren, she stopped in half a block, he smelled alcohol on her breath and saw bloodshot eyes, she had difficulty in producing her license, and he asked her to perform three field sobriety tests. Administration of the tests was a constitutionally permissible search arising from a particularized suspicion that was based on the officer's observations after the investigatory stop. The lower court properly found that the officer had reasonable grounds to believe that defendant was driving under the influence. Hulse v. St., 1998 MT 108, 289 M 1, 961 P2d 75, 55 St. Rep. 415 (1998), followed in St. v. Steinmetz, 1998 MT 114, 288 M 527, 961 P2d 95, 55 St. Rep. 450 (1998), and Bramble v. St., 1999 MT 132, 294 M 501, 982 P2d 464, 56 St. Rep. 532 (1999).

Three-Part Test Adopted to Determine Whether Officer's Reliance on Informant's Tip Justified: Pratt argued that the officer who stopped him did not have a sufficient basis to form a particularized suspicion to justify an investigative stop to see if Pratt was driving under the influence. The arresting officer stopped Pratt after receiving a call from the radio dispatcher who relayed that he had been called by the manager of a convenience store who reported that Pratt had just stopped at the store and appeared to be intoxicated. The convenience store manager gave a description of Pratt's vehicle and the name of the street that Pratt had driven away on. The Supreme Court stated that it was adopting the test used by the Oregon Court of Appeals in St. v. Villegas-Varela, 887 P2d 809 (Oreg. 1994). In determining whether an officer has the basis for a particularized suspicion to justify an investigative stop based on information provided by a third person, a court should consider: (1) whether the citizen informant identifies the informant to law enforcement and thus exposes the informant to criminal and civil liability if the report is false; (2) whether the report is based on personal observations of the informant; and (3) whether the officer's own observations corroborate the informant's information. In the present case, the Supreme Court held that the stop was justified based on the totality of the facts and also held that the facts relayed to the dispatcher by the informant could appropriately form a basis for a particularized suspicion for the arresting officer even if the arresting officer was not fully aware of all those facts. St. v. Pratt, 286 M 156, 951 P2d 37, 54 St. Rep. 1349 (1997), following St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293 (1981), with respect to the knowledge of one officer held to be the knowledge of the arresting officer, and distinguishing St. v. Lee, 282 M 391, 938 P2d 637, 54 St. Rep. 401 (1997). Pratt was followed in St. v. White Clay, 1998 MT 244, 291 M 147, 967 P2d 370, 55 St. Rep. 1014 (1998), St. v. LACK OF PROOF BY PROSECUTION Presence of Arresting Officer Needed to Prove Particularized Suspicion: A highway patrol officer stopped Angeline on suspicion of violating the basic rule and subsequently arrested him for driving under the influence. Angeline moved to suppress any evidence obtained after the stop on the basis that the arresting officer had no grounds to make the initial stop. At the suppression hearing, the state presented no witnesses, not even the arresting officer. Angeline presented evidence as to why he believed that his actions in passing two cars at 80 miles an hour on a two-way road did not violate the basic rule. The lower court held that Angeline's testimony was sufficient to demonstrate the facts that the arresting officer relied upon to achieve a particularized suspicion that Angeline had violated the basic rule. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that without the arresting officer's testimony, the lower court could only speculate as to the objective data that the officer may have observed before the investigatory stop and further that no evidence was introduced regarding the officer's experience and training that would allow the court to evaluate his observations, inferences, and resulting suspicions that led to the stop. St. v. Angeline, 1998 MT 139, 289 M 222, 961 P2d 1251, 55 St. Rep. 556 (1998), followed in St. v. Gilder, 1999 MT 207, 295 M 483, 985 P2d 147, 56 St. Rep. 808 (1999).

STOP OUTSIDE OFFICER'S JURISDICTION

City Police Officer Making Arrest Outside Territorial Jurisdiction — Probable Cause Required: A city police officer, investigating a phone call reporting a suspected drunk driver, pursued Williamson outside city limits and arrested him, although the officer observed no erratic driving or other indicators of alcohol impairment prior to stopping Williamson's truck. Williamson moved to suppress all the evidence on the basis that the officer did not have probable cause to make the stop, contending that probable cause was necessary because the officer was acting outside his territorial jurisdiction as a city police officer and that the information within the officer's knowledge at the time of the stop did not rise to the level of probable cause. Williamson's motion was denied. Clarifying the difference between the probable cause necessary to effectuate a valid arrest and the particularized suspicion necessary to justify an investigative stop, the Supreme Court noted that although an officer ordinarily needs only a particularized suspicion for a traffic stop, under these circumstances, the officer was outside his jurisdiction when the stop was made and was thus not acting within the scope of his authority as a peace officer. The criminal procedures in 46-6-311 and this section were not available to the officer. Rather, as a peace officer acting outside his territorial jurisdiction, his authority was limited to that provided to private citizens under 46-6-502, so probable cause was required. The citizen informant's telephone report was not sufficient to establish probable cause because the relayed report was devoid of information as to why the informant believed that Williamson was intoxicated and the officer did not inquire into the basis of the report before stopping Williamson's truck. The report created, at most, a suspicion that an offense was being committed, but that suspicion alone was insufficient to establish probable cause. Even if the informant had sufficient information to establish probable cause for a citizen's arrest of Williamson, that information was not relayed to the officer, who thus did not possess sufficient information to make the stop. The judgment was reversed because the District Court erred in refusing to suppress the evidence. St. v. Williamson, 1998 MT 199, 290 M 321, 965 P2d 231, 55 St. Rep. 843 (1998), distinguishing St. v. Schoffner, 248 M 260, 811 P2d 548 (1991), and followed in St. v. Reiner, 2003 MT 243, 317 M 304, 77 P3d 210 (2003), and St. v. Ellington, 2006 MT 219, 333 M 411, 143 P3d 119 (2006).

COMMUNITY CARETAKER DOCTRINE

No Negligence in Officers' Response to Robbery Call or in Brief Detention of Robbery Victim: Plaintiff worked at a convenience store when a person entered the store, held a knife to plaintiff's throat, and robbed the store. Plaintiff managed to dial 9-1-1, but could not speak with police. Officers determined where the call came from and surrounded the store. However, even though officers could see two people inside, it was not possible to determine who was involved in the robbery. Meanwhile, plaintiff was taken to a back room and raped. Officers arrested the perpetrator immediately after he left the store and then ordered any other persons inside to exit. Plaintiff then left the store and was subdued and handcuffed for about 30 seconds before officers determined that she was an employee and had been raped. Plaintiff subsequently sued the county, law enforcement agencies, and several individual officers for negligently responding to the situation, allowing plaintiff to be raped, and improperly arresting plaintiff when she left the store. The District Court granted summary judgment for defendants and plaintiff appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the circumstances, the officers responded quickly and professionally and got plaintiff to a safe position and to medical care as immediately as possible. The officers did not have custody or control of either the plaintiff or the robber at the time the rape occurred and therefore were in no position to undertake specific actions to protect the plaintiff until she came out of the store and her identity and role in the events were established. Additionally, the brief detention of plaintiff was justified and provided no cause of action against defendants. Gonzales v. Bozeman, 2009 MT 277, 352 M 145, 217 P3d 487 (2009).

No Particularized Suspicion for Stop to Investigate Couple Engaged in Romantic but Not Criminal Behavior — Community Caretaker Doctrine Inapplicable Absent Indication of Citizen in Peril: While on routine patrol, an officer observed a vehicle parked on a pullout adjacent to a public road. The officer thought perhaps the driver was experiencing vehicle problems and drove by to investigate. However, the occupants were not having vehicle problems but were kissing, and the female passenger was observed attempting to "mount" the male driver. Concerned that the occupants were engaged in inappropriate sexual behavior, the officer circled back, parked behind the vehicle and activated the emergency lights, and approached the vehicle with the intent to discourage the couple from engaging in their behavior and to move them along. The officer discovered a cold, sweaty beer can outside the driver's door and also discovered the couple in various states of undress. Upon questioning the couple about what they were doing, the officer noticed that they both appeared intoxicated. The driver, Graham, was tested and subsequently arrested for DUI. Graham moved to suppress the evidence of the DUI on grounds that the officer did not have authority to make an investigative stop or, if that authority did exist, that the officer exceeded the scope of an investigative stop. The District Court agreed that the officer did not have a sufficient particularized suspicion to make an investigative stop, but nevertheless allowed the DUI evidence on grounds that the community caretaker doctrine provided a legal justification for the stop. On appeal, the Supreme Court first noted that if particularized suspicion was absent and no other exception to the warrant requirement applied, the search and seizure were unconstitutional. In this case, once the officer activated the emergency lights, Graham would not have felt free to walk away, so a seizure occurred. The Supreme Court agreed that the totality of the circumstances did not give rise to a particularized suspicion that a crime was occurring or was about to occur. Graham committed no traffic offense, and the couple's conduct was not criminal and did not indicate that a crime was about to occur. Any particularized suspicion occurred only after Graham was seized. The officer did not approach the vehicle because of a belief that a crime was being committed, but rather to discourage the couple from engaging in their behavior and to move them along, so the requisite particularized suspicion of a crime was absent. The Supreme Court also held that the community caretaker doctrine did not apply because under the criteria developed in St. v. Lovegren, 2002 MT 153, 310 M 358, 51 P3d 471 (2002), the first step in determining whether the doctrine applies is whether there are objective, specific, and articulable facts from which an experienced officer would suspect that a citizen is in need of help or is in peril. No such facts existed in this case, and the court declined to extend the doctrine to allow law enforcement officers equipped with nothing more than personal dissatisfaction of a person's otherwise lawful conduct to detain that person without any intention of providing community care or assistance. Dismissal of Graham's motion to suppress the evidence was reversed, and the case was remanded. St. v. Graham, 2007 MT 358, 340 M 366, 175 P3d 885 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Nelson, 2004 MT 13, 319 M 250, 84 P3d 25 (2004), St. v. Seaman, 2005 MT 307, 329 M 429, 124 P3d 1137 (2005), and St. v. Litschauer, 2005 MT 331, 330 M 22, 126 P3d 456 (2005).

Elements of Community Caretaker Doctrine — Particularized Suspicion Not Required in Case of Safety Stop: About 3:05 a.m., an officer on routine patrol stopped to investigate a vehicle parked beside a highway with its lights out but with its motor running. Lovegren was in the driver's seat and appeared to be asleep, but he did not respond when the officer knocked on the window. When the officer opened the door, Lovegren awoke and stated, "I was drinking." The officer noticed that Lovegren's eyes were bloodshot and smelled alcohol. The officer had Lovegren perform field sobriety tests, which Lovegren failed, and arrested Lovegren for DUI. Lovegren moved to suppress all evidence, claiming that the search was illegal because the officer had no particularized suspicion of any wrongdoing. The District Court denied the motion on grounds that a particularized suspicion was not necessary because the officer had a duty to investigate for Lovegren's own safety. Lovegren appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed pursuant to the community caretaker doctrine. The court applied the following test to determine whether an officer's actions fall under the doctrine: (1) as long as there are objective, specific, and articulable facts from which an experienced officer would suspect that a citizen is in need of help or is in peril, the officer has a right to stop and investigate; (2) if the citizen is in need of aid, the officer may take appropriate action to render assistance or mitigate the peril; and (3) once the officer is assured that the citizen is not in peril and is not in need of assistance or that the peril has been mitigated, any actions beyond that constitute a seizure implicating constitutional protections afforded by the right of privacy and the right against illegal search and seizure. In this case, when the officer opened the door to check on Lovegren's well-being and Lovegren awoke and voluntarily stated that he had been drinking, the officer then noticed other signs of intoxication that constituted a particularized suspicion to make a further investigative stop that eventually developed into probable cause for an arrest. It would have been a dereliction of the officer's duty if, after knocking on the window and receiving no response, the officer had walked away and continued on patrol. Thus, the escalation of events leading to Lovegren's arrest was proper, and denial of the motion to suppress the evidence of the investigation was not erroneous. St. v. Lovegren, 2002 MT 153, 310 M 358, 51 P3d 471 (2002), following Grinde v. St., 249 M 77, 813 P2d 473 (1991), and Hulse v. St., 1998 MT 108, 289 M 1, 961 P2d 75 (1998), and followed in St. v. Reiner, 2003 MT 243, 317 M 304, 77 P3d 210 (2003), St. v. Litschauer, 2005 MT 331, 330 M 22, 126 P3d 456 (2005), St. v. Wheeler, 2006 MT 38, 331 M 179, 134 P3d 38 (2006), and St. v. Vaughn, 2007 MT 164, 338 M 97, 164 P3d 873 (2007). The Lovegren community caretaker doctrine was also applied in St. v. Seaman, 2005 MT 307, 329 M 429, 124 P3d 1137 (2005). See also Henry v. U.S., 361 US 98 (1959), Terry v. Ohio, 392 US 1 (1968), and Cady v. Dombrowski, 413 US 433 (1973).

Plain Feel Doctrine Adopted — Incidental to Investigatory Stop: Collard contended that ski goggles that were felt in his pant leg during a pat search conducted pursuant to an investigatory stop were wrongfully seized because the goggles were not in plain view and their identity was not readily apparent, and therefore the goggles were improperly introduced into evidence. Applying Minn. v. Dickerson, 508 US 366, 124 L Ed 2d 334, 113 S Ct 2130 (1993), the Supreme Court adopted the "plain feel" corollary to the "plain view" doctrine. The plain feel doctrine states that if a police officer lawfully pats down a suspect's outer clothing and feels an object of a contour or mass that makes its identity immediately apparent, there has been no invasion of the suspect's privacy beyond that already authorized by the officer's search for weapons. If the object is contraband, its warrantless seizure is justified by the same practical considerations that inhere in the plain view context. In the present case, the ski goggles had a shape that could be immediately identifiable when touched, and the officer did not need to manipulate the object or touch it more than a few seconds to know what it was. The robbery suspect had reportedly worn ski goggles, and the officer's seizure of Collard's goggles was thus justified. St. v. Collard, 286 M 185, 951 P2d 56, 54 St. Rep. 1366 (1997).

Plain View Doctrine Justifying Seizure of Contraband Pipe During Stop and Frisk Search for Weapons: After Stubbs was stopped on a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity, including speeding, reckless or careless driving, and eluding a peace officer, the officer noticed numerous weapons in the vehicle, providing a reasonable justification for searching Stubbs on the scene. During a pat-down search of Stubbs' clothing, the officer thought that a lump in Stubbs' pocket might be a deadly weapon. After removing the item to make sure that it was not a weapon, the item was in plain view and the incriminating character of the object, a brass pipe, was apparent. Absent any indication that the search was used as a pretext to discover illicit drugs or paraphernalia, the discovery of the pipe was inadvertent and seizure of the contraband was justified. St. v. Stubbs, 270 M 364, 892 P2d 547, 52 St. Rep. 232 (1995), overruled in part in St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996).

Frisk Incident to Investigatory Stop: A peace officer may frisk an individual for weapons incident to making an investigatory stop. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990), following Terry v. Ohio, 392 US 1, 20 L Ed 2d 889, 88 S Ct 1868 (1968), and followed in St. v. Stubbs, 270 M 364, 892 P2d 547, 52 St. Rep. 232 (1995).

When Probable Cause to Arrest May Occur: A founded suspicion to stop for investigative detention may ripen into probable cause to arrest through the occurrence of facts or incidents after the stop (citing U.S. v. Medina-Gasca, 739 F2d 1451 (9th Cir. 1984)). St. v. Sharp, 217 M 40, 702 P2d 959, 42 St. Rep. 1009 (1985), followed in St. v. Morris, 230 M 311, 749 P2d 1379, 45 St. Rep. 234 (1988).

46-5-403. Duration of stop.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute establishes a new rule for the duration of an investigative stop. As previously codified, an investigative stop should be no longer than necessary and not more than 30 minutes. See 1987 MCA 46-5-402(4) [now repealed]. The statute adopts a more general statement providing that the stop last no longer than is necessary to effectuate the purpose of the stop. The statute is better suited to the nature of an investigative stop and reflects recent Supreme Court decisions. See Fla. v. Royer, 460 US 491, 500 (1983). What is important is whether the length of the stop is reasonable under the circumstances. See U.S. v. Sharpe, 105 S Ct 1568, 1575, 1576 (1985). The statute removes the 30-minute limitation but should not create any significant changes in established procedure.

Case Notes

Legal Detention Following Traffic Stop — Voluntary Consent to Search Vehicle — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Case was stopped for a traffic violation, and drugs were found in Case's car after Case allegedly consented to a search of the vehicle. Following conviction, Case appealed on grounds that evidence of the search should have been suppressed because the officer exceeded the scope of the initial stop by detaining Case and continuing to question him after issuing traffic citations. The Supreme Court concluded that under the circumstances, Case remained under police control during questioning and could not have reasonably concluded that he was free to leave. Because Case was not involved in a voluntary exchange, Case was in fact "seized" when he gave permission to search the vehicle. The court then examined whether particularized suspicion existed to continue the investigatory stop past the issuance of traffic citations and whether Case's consent to the search was voluntary. In this case, Case was legally detained because additional information, including Case's questionable behavior, his multiple connections with drugs, and confusion whether Case was in fact another person named Case who had skipped town, gave rise to further suspicions that served to properly enlarge the scope of the investigation. The only circumstance that Case claimed affected the voluntariness of his consent to search the vehicle was that the detention was illegal. Having concluded that the detention was legal, the court further concluded that Case's consent was voluntary and that the motion to suppress the fruits of the search was properly denied. St. v. Case, 2007 MT 161, 338 M 87, 162 P3d 849 (2007). See also St. v. Roberts, 1999 MT 59, 293 M 476, 977 P2d 974 (1999), and St. v. Hurlbert, 2009 MT 221, 351 M 316, 211 P3d 869 (2009).

Objective Manifestation to Support Investigation Following Traffic Stop — Time of Stop Extended: Following a traffic stop and observation of Nelson's behavior, officers conducted a

DUI investigation, performed field sobriety tests and arrested Nelson for DUI, and then searched Nelson's car and discovered drugs and paraphernalia. Nelson contended that the fruits of the search should be suppressed because the officers did not give the stop advisory required in former 46-5-402 (repealed 2003) or a Miranda advisory and because the DUI investigation at the scene exceeded the scope of the investigative stop. The motion to suppress was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The stop advisory issue was not contested, and the Supreme Court declined to address it. Nelson was not entitled to a Miranda warning because the Miranda protections are afforded during a custodial interrogation but do not apply to an investigative stop. In addition, as in St. v. Henderson, 1998 MT 233, 291 M 77, 966 P2d 137 (1998), the initial investigatory stop took on the quality of an escalating situation in which additional information gave rise to further suspicions and enlarged the scope of the investigation to that of a possible DUI. The officers had a particularized suspicion to conduct the DUI investigation, properly extending the time of the stop. Although the Supreme Court has not established specific time parameters to which an officer must adhere when conducting an investigative stop, the 24 minutes taken to conduct the investigative stop in this case was reasonable and not excessive. St. v. Nelson, 2004 MT 310, 323 M 510, 101 P3d 261 (2004).

Particularized Suspicion Sufficient Justification for Request for Consent to Search Vehicle — No Illegal Detention — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Snell was stopped for speeding and was also cited for failure to carry proof of insurance. While writing out the citation in the patrol car, the officer asked Snell if he could search the vehicle, and Snell consented. The officer discovered drugs, and Snell was charged with possession and intent to distribute marijuana. Snell moved to suppress the evidence. Snell conceded that he had voluntarily consented to the search, and the state conceded that the officer did not have probable cause. The motion to suppress was denied, and Snell appealed. The Supreme Court considered both the consent and illegal detention issues. First, the court reasoned that the officer had particularized suspicion to stop the vehicle and that Montana law does not require additional justification for requesting consent, so Snell's voluntary consent was sufficient to justify the warrantless search of the vehicle (see St. v. Parker, 1998 MT 6, 287 M 151, 953 P2d 692 (1998)). Second, the court concluded that because the officer did not coerce or restrain Snell, order him to stay, or prevent Snell from exiting the patrol car, a reasonable person would have felt free to leave the patrol car upon completion of the traffic stop, so the poststop interaction between Snell and the officer was a voluntary exchange rather than an illegal detention or unlawful seizure (see St. v. Merrill, 2004 MT 169, 322 M 47, 93 P3d 1227 (2004), and St. v. Hill, 2004 MT 184, 322 M 165, 94 P3d 752 (2004)). Snell's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Snell, 2004 MT 269, 323 M 157, 99 P3d 191 (2004). See also St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 419, 347 M 354, 198 P3d 809 (2008).

Search Incident to Conversation After Traffic Stop Concluded Considered Voluntary — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Officers stopped Merrill for investigation following an improper lane change. A license plate check showed that Merrill was not the vehicle owner. However, the vehicle was owned by a person suspected by one of the officers to be involved with dangerous drugs. The officer told Merrill that he was just giving her a verbal warning and that she was free to go. Stepping away from the vehicle, the officer noticed that Merrill seemed unusually nervous. Suspicious about the report regarding the vehicle owner, the officer again approached the vehicle and asked Merrill if he could talk to her. Merrill answered affirmatively. The officer then asked if he could search the vehicle. Merrill again answered affirmatively. Merrill stepped out of the car, and the officer asked if he could search her person, including her pockets. Merrill again answered affirmatively, and the officer discovered drugs in her pocket. Merrill contended that she had been unlawfully detained subsequent to an investigatory stop and that the evidence should be suppressed. The trial court concluded that the search was voluntary and denied the suppression motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Once the officer completed the investigation of the improper lane change, the investigatory stop was concluded and Merrill was free to leave. What followed was neither a subsequent investigatory stop nor an extension of the first stop, but rather a voluntary exchange, and nothing prevents an officer from engaging a citizen in a voluntary conversation. A purely voluntary conversation intrudes on no constitutionally protected interest, so Merrill was accorded no constitutional protection related to the search and seizure, and denial of the motion to suppress was appropriate. St. v. Merrill, 2004 MT 169, 322 M 47, 93 P3d 1227 (2004), followed in St. v. Hill, 2004 MT 184, 322 M 165, 94 P3d 752 (2004).

Evaluation of Reliability of Confidential Tip — Unreliable Tip as Only Grounds for Investigative Stop — Infringement of Right to Privacy: Following weeks of surveillance instigated by a confidential tip intimating drug activities, the Billings police observed no suspicious drug-related activities conducted by defendants, but after receiving a confidential tip that defendants would be driving from Billings to Bozeman to sell marijuana, officers stopped and searched defendants' vehicle and arrested defendants for drug possession. Defendants contended that insufficient objective data inferring criminality existed to justify the investigative stop. The Supreme Court applied the analysis in St. v. Pratt, 286 M 156, 951 P2d 37 (1997), to evaluate the reliability of the informant's tip. The court distinguished between a concerned citizen who reports a chance encounter with crime as a civic duty and a confidential informant who works with police by reporting on the illegal activities of others. A citizen informant is presumed to be telling the truth, but a confidential informant does not enjoy the same presumption of veracity. Further, for a tip to support a finding of probable cause, police must know the identity of the informant, trust from experience or presumption that the informant is telling the truth, and discern that the informant's information about the alleged crime derives from the informant's personal observations. Officers must then evaluate the veracity, reliability, and basis of knowledge of the informant to determine whether the report supports reasonable suspicion. If a tip is anonymous and lacks any indication of the basis for the informant's opinion, the tip must be corroborated through the observation of suspicious activity that alerts officers to the possibility of a violation. Corroboration of a tip with innocent information may lend an unknown or untested tipster some credibility, but this indicia of reliability does not obviate the relevance of the tipster's basis of knowledge as a factor in the evaluation. In the context of particularized suspicion, because the quantum of suspicion is less, an unreliable tip requires corroboration that supports an inference of criminality by direct police observation of suspicious activity and consideration of the modes of patterns of operation of certain kinds of lawbreakers, and mere police corroboration of innocent facts is insufficient. Here, defendants engaged in no observed criminal activity, and their travel plans were equally consistent with innocent behavior. Although the traffic stop was initially made to check a temporary sticker on the vehicle, once the sticker was found to be valid, grounds for the stop ended and no further police intrusion was warranted. St. v. Martinez, 2003 MT 65, 314 M 434, 67 P3d 207 (2003), following St. v. Henderson, 1998 MT 233, 291 M 77, 966 P2d 137 (1998), and distinguishing Ala. v. White, 496 US 325 (1990). See also St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83 (2000).

Justifiable Stop for Daytime Check of Temporary Window Sticker Warranted — Further Police Intrusion Not Warranted Once Limited Purpose of Stop Accomplished: Following weeks of surveillance instigated by a confidential tip intimating drug activities, the Billings police observed no suspicious drug-related activities conducted by defendants, but after receiving a tip that defendants would be driving from Billings to Bozeman to sell marijuana, officers stopped defendants' vehicle because there were no license plates displayed, although a temporary sticker could be seen but not read in the tinted rear window. When the officers approached the vehicle, they noticed that the temporary sticker properly displayed in the window was current. Nevertheless, in a short time, additional officers arrived with a drug-sniffing dog. The dog indicated the presence of drugs, the vehicle was searched, marijuana was found, and defendants were arrested. Defendants contended that the evidence should be suppressed because there was no particularized suspicion to make the stop. The Supreme Court agreed that the investigative stop was warranted because the officers' inability to read the expiration date on the temporary sticker provided an objective basis to infer that the sticker was not valid. However, a quick check of the properly displayed sticker in bright daylight confirmed the sticker's validity. Defendants had committed no traffic offense or violated any other criminal law of which the officers were aware. An investigative stop is a temporary detention that may not last longer than necessary to effectuate the purpose of the stop. Once the limited purpose of the investigative stop was accomplished, no further police intrusion was warranted, and the investigative stop related to drug possession was not justified. The District Court committed reversible error in refusing to suppress the evidence of the subsequent vehicle search. St. v. Martinez, 2003 MT 65, 314 M 434, 67 P3d 207 (2003), following St. v. Henderson, 1998 MT 233, 291 M 77, 966 P2d 137 (1998).

Requisite Objective Data and Resulting Suspicion for Lawful Stop and Frisk in Motel Room: Officers were lawfully searching Roehr's motel room when Dawson knocked on the door. An officer opened the door, and Dawson entered, asking for Roehr. The officer told Dawson that he was going to conduct a pat-down search for weapons and asked Dawson if he possessed any weapons, drugs, or needles. Dawson said that he had no weapons. The officer repeated the question. Dawson motioned toward his coat pocket and said that he had some "smoke" in there. The "smoke" turned out to be methamphetamine and drug paraphernalia. Dawson sought to suppress the evidence, contending that the search was illegal because the officer had no articulable, reasonable suspicion that Dawson had engaged in criminal activity. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that Roehr was a known criminal and that his room had been under surveillance for suspected drug activity. The officer had probable cause to believe that Roehr was conducting transactions involving dangerous drugs and stolen property in the room. When Dawson appeared, asking for Roehr, the officer had a particularized suspicion, based on the totality of the circumstances, to believe that Dawson had committed or was about to commit an offense. Thus, sufficient cause existed to detain Dawson. Further, in the officer's experience, people involved in drug offenses frequently carry weapons. The officer had no prior dealings with Dawson to help him determine whether Dawson was armed and did not know whether Dawson presented a danger to the officers conducting the search of the room, so reasonable cause existed to suspect that Dawson was armed and dangerous. Therefore, the officer possessed the requisite objective data and resulting suspicion to lawfully stop and frisk Dawson, and denial of the motion to suppress the fruits of the search was not error. St. v. Dawson, 1999 MT 171, 295 M 212, 983 P2d 916, 56 St. Rep. 668 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Anderson, 1999 MT 60, 293 M 490, 977 P2d 983, 56 St. Rep. 252 (1999).

Part 5
Roadblocks

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: The 1987 code governing the establishment of a roadblock by any law enforcement agency attempted to provide specific requirements for roadblocks. See 1987 MCA 46-5-501, et seq. The Commission determined that these requirements were too restrictive and recommended the adoption of two general statutes to govern the roadblock procedure. The key to the proper roadblock under this part is the satisfaction of due process and the safety of the motorist.

Part Case Notes

Officer's Knowledge of Vehicle Owner's Revoked License Sufficient Basis for Suspicion of Criminal Activity to Warrant Stopping Vehicle: Deputy Keintz observed a vehicle displaying a distinctive personalized license plate being driven by a female south of Missoula. The officer recognized the license plate, recalled the prior arrest and license suspension of the vehicle owner, and initiated a traffic stop. Halvorson was the owner and driver of the vehicle and was ticketed for driving with a suspended license. On appeal, Halvorson contended that the officer did not have sufficient information to form a particularized suspicion that the occupant of the vehicle was or had been engaged in criminal activity to justify stopping the vehicle. Applying the criteria in St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293 (1981), the Supreme Court followed St. v. Pike, 551 NW 2d 919 (Minn. 1996), in holding that an officer's knowledge that the owner of a vehicle has a revoked driver's license is enough to form the basis of a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity when the officer observes the vehicle being driven, as long as the officer remains unaware of any facts that would render unreasonable an assumption that the owner is driving the vehicle. St. v. Halvorson, 2000 MT 56, 299 M 1, 997 P2d 751, 57 St. Rep. 270 (2000), followed in Billings v. Costa, 2006 MT 181, 333 M 84, 140 P3d 1070 (2006). Costa was followed in St. v. Neil, 2009 MT 128, 350 M 268, 207 P3d 296 (2009).

Seizure of Evidence in Auto After Arrest on a "Particularized Suspicion": Seizure of evidence that was in plain view in defendant's car as he was arrested after a "particularized suspicion", meeting the test adopted in St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293 (1981), was valid because the arrest was a lawful arrest. St. v. Schatz, 194 M 59, 634 P2d 1193, 38 St. Rep. 1687 (1981).

Stop and Frisk Procedure Applicable to Automobiles: Where, upon investigating a possible burglary, the investigating officer stopped a suspicious looking automobile and noticed what appeared to be stolen property in the back seat of the car, which was driven off at a high rate of speed in the middle of the investigation, the District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to suppress the stolen property recovered from the automobile. The dictum in St. v. Rader, 177 M 252, 581 P2d 437 (1978), that stop and frisk principles do not apply to automobiles must be abandoned in light of the principle most recently announced in U.S. v. Cortez, 449 US 411, 66 L Ed 2d 621, 101 S Ct 690 (1981), that an assessment of whether a crime has been committed must be based upon all relevant circumstances and the evidence evaluated in light of the knowledge of a trained law enforcement officer. When a trained police officer has a particularized suspicion that the occupant of a vehicle is or has been engaged in criminal activity or is a witness thereto, a limited and reasonable investigatory stop and search is justified. St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293, 38 St. Rep. 1078 (1981), followed in St. v. Lee, 232 M 105, 754 P2d 512, 45 St. Rep. 903 (1988), St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154, 55 St. Rep. 1235 (1998), St. v. Halvorson, 2000 MT 56, 299 M 1, 997 P2d 751, 57 St. Rep. 270 (2000), and St. v. Herbenson, 2001 MT 75, 305 M 68, 22 P3d 1128 (2001).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute reflects, with some amendment, 1987 MCA 46-5-502. The introductory clause has been changed to read: "Any law enforcement agency of this state". This amendment is solely for clarification and is not intended to be a change in established procedure. The phrase "vehicle registration and insurance" has been added to reflect established procedure. Any indication that the roadblock is to be conducted for the apprehension of criminals has been deleted. The Commission felt that in emergency situations, other statutes would apply and that the roadblock should not be used for routine searches for apprehension of criminal offenders.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: At beginning substituted "Any law enforcement agency of this state is authorized to establish within its jurisdiction" for "The duly elected or appointed law enforcement officers of this state and their deputies are hereby authorized to establish, in their respective jurisdictions or in other jurisdictions within the state" and at end inserted "vehicle registration, and insurance"; and made minor changes in style.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is intended to designate the principal factors to be considered in establishing roadblocks. The provisions recognize that each agency should tailor roadblocks to its specific needs. Some considerations in developing specific rules for roadblocks are present in Commonwealth v. Trumble, 483 NE 2d 1102, 1108-10 (Mass. 1985).

CHAPTER 6
ARREST

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

Chapter Case Notes

No Reasonable Grounds to Believe Defendant DUI — Sole Testimony of Defendant Sufficient to Prove No DUI Occurred: Eustance drove to the airport to pick up his daughter and grandson who were arriving on a flight. Because of hip pain, it was more comfortable to wait in his car. Eustance parked in the lot of a nearby car rental agency and fell asleep. Eustance was later awakened by a Deputy Sheriff who requested that Eustance perform field sobriety tests and a breath test, but Eustance refused to perform both tests, so his license was seized and suspended. At a hearing on a petition for reinstatement of his license, Eustance was the only witness. He testified that he had been operating his vehicle in a safe and legal manner prior to arrest, that his ability to drive was not impaired, and that he did not believe there was reasonable suspicion or probable cause to justify his arrest. The District Court agreed and granted the petition reinstating the license. On appeal, the state cited Hunter v. St., 264 M 84, 869 P2d 787 (1994), contending that Eustance had not met the burden of establishing that suspension of the license was improper because without the deputy's testimony, Eustance's own testimony was self-serving and insufficient to meet the burden. The Supreme Court disagreed. The testimony of one witness is sufficient to prove any fact. Nowhere in Hunter was it held that a petitioner in a license reinstatement hearing cannot meet the burden of proof without testimony from the arresting officer or that a petitioner's testimony, without more, is insufficient to meet the burden of proof. Thus, the District Court was entitled to accept Eustance's uncontradicted testimony as true. Absent evidence supporting the state's position, Eustance met the burden of proof and his license was properly reinstated. Eustance v. St., 2005 MT 34, 326 M 77, 107 P3d 478 (2005).

Warrantless Entry and Arrest Not Bar to Criminal Prosecution: Where a defendant suspected of robbery was arrested at his home without a warrant 4 days after committing the robbery, the District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to dismiss the charges against him. Payton v. N.Y., 445 US 573, 63 L Ed 2d 639, 100 S Ct 1371 (1980), relied on by the defendant, dealt only with the issue of whether evidence seized incidental to an unlawful arrest was admissible and not whether the defendant must stand trial. In this case, the defendant concedes that evidence seized at his home under a search warrant was properly admitted. St. v. Ritchson, 193 M 112, 630 P2d 234, 38 St. Rep. 1015 (1981).

Identification Shortly After Commission of Crime — Defendant in Police Car — Not Unlawfully Suggestive: The identification of defendant while in custody and sitting in the rear seat of a police car by the victim of a robbery that occurred the same night is not a showup that is unlawfully suggestive. If the identification occurs shortly after the commission of a crime, it is not an unnecessarily suggestive confrontation; hence, its introduction at a trial does not deny the defendant due process. Spurlock v. Crist, 188 M 449, 614 P2d 498 (1980).

Jury Instruction — Presumption of Innocence: In a criminal prosecution based on theft of an automobile in which the defendant timely requested and was twice denied an instruction on presumption of innocence, it was per se reversible error to deny the instruction. The purpose of the instruction is to caution the jury against conclusions based only on the arrest and prosecution of the defendant, and an instruction on the State's burden of proof can therefore not supplant the instruction requested. St. v. Williams, 184 M 111, 601 P2d 1194 (1979).

Part 1
General Provisions

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: This part sets forth the general provisions that apply in all instances in which an individual is arrested, whether with or without a warrant. Section 46-6-104 preserves the 1987 code's standards concerning the method of arrest. Section 46-6-105 describes when an arrest may be made, reflecting the restrictions previously found in 1987 MCA 46-6-105. The exemptions from arrest are constitutional matters that need not be restated in statutory form.

As with all statutes governing arrest, all definitions have been moved to the general definition section. For example, "arrest", as defined in 1987 MCA 46-6-101(1), is found in 46-1-202.

Part Case Notes

No Negligence in Officers' Response to Robbery Call or in Brief Detention of Robbery Victim: Plaintiff worked at a convenience store when a person entered the store, held a knife to plaintiff's throat, and robbed the store. Plaintiff managed to dial 9-1-1, but could not speak with police. Officers determined where the call came from and surrounded the store. However, even though officers could see two people inside, it was not possible to determine who was involved in the robbery. Meanwhile, plaintiff was taken to a back room and raped. Officers arrested the perpetrator immediately after he left the store and then ordered any other persons inside to exit. Plaintiff then left the store and was subdued and handcuffed for about 30 seconds before officers determined that she was an employee and had been raped. Plaintiff subsequently sued the county, law enforcement agencies, and several individual officers for negligently responding to the situation, allowing plaintiff to be raped, and improperly arresting plaintiff when she left the store. The District Court granted summary judgment for defendants and plaintiff appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the circumstances, the officers responded quickly and professionally and got plaintiff to a safe position and to medical care as immediately as possible. The officers did not have custody or control of either the plaintiff or the robber at the time the rape occurred and therefore were in no position to undertake specific actions to protect the plaintiff until she came out of the store and her identity and role in the events were established. Additionally, the brief detention of plaintiff was justified and provided no cause of action against defendants. Gonzales v. Bozeman, 2009 MT 277, 352 M 145, 217 P3d 487 (2009).

Defendant's Volunteering of Information Inconsistent With Request for Attorney — Miranda Claims Properly Denied: Stombaugh contended that she was never read her Miranda rights and did not waive the right to an attorney. The arresting officer and a witness both testified that the officer read Stombaugh's Miranda rights from a card at the time of the arrest. The District Court resolved the conflicting testimony by noting that Stombaugh would not have requested an attorney at the same time that she was volunteering information about drug paraphernalia in her vehicle. The Supreme Court concluded that Stombaugh's Miranda claims were properly denied. St. v. Stombaugh, 2007 MT 105, 337 M 147, 157 P3d 1137 (2007).

Reasonable Mistake in Arrest of Misidentified Person and Subsequent Seizure of Incriminating Evidence — Admissibility of Evidence: The landlady of a rental apartment asked police to come and talk to her about her tenant, whom she identified as Thomas Bateman, and gave the officers Bateman's physical description, approximate age, and a description of Bateman's suspicious activity. The officer radioed in for an outstanding warrant check on Thomas Bateman and discovered that Thomas Bateman had an outstanding warrant for misdemeanor possession of dangerous drugs. The warrant information matched the description provided by the landlady. When officers knocked on Bateman's door and asked if he was Thomas Bateman, Bateman replied affirmatively. The officers said they had a warrant for his arrest and attempted to handcuff Bateman, and Bateman dropped a bag of Gummy Bears and what appeared to be a marijuana pipe. Bateman then told the officers that there was another Thomas Bateman and that there had been police confusion regarding them in the past. Officers checked Bateman's identification, radioed to dispatch for further information, and determined that although their ages and physical descriptions were similar, the arrestee was indeed not the Thomas Bateman with the outstanding warrant. Because the officers saw Bateman drop the marijuana pipe and noticed the odor of smoke and other drug paraphernalia in the living room, they had probable cause at that point to arrest him. Also in the apartment was another man who did have an outstanding warrant. Officers then obtained a warrant to search the apartment and discovered a methamphetamine lab in the crawl space. Bateman moved to dismiss the charges because the evidence resulted from an illegal arrest. The motion was denied, and Bateman appealed. Citing Hill v. Calif., 401 US 797 (1971), the Supreme Court affirmed. The officers acted reasonably, albeit mistakenly, in arresting Bateman. Because the arrest was reasonable, the subsequent discovery of incriminating evidence was legal and admissible. St. v. Bateman, 2004 MT 281, 323 M 280, 99 P3d 656 (2004).

Elements of Thornton Reasonable Person Test Met — Arrest Unlawful: An officer received a report that the driver of a vehicle similar to Van Dort's had failed to pay for gasoline before leaving a service station. The officer pulled over Van Dort's vehicle and ran a warrant check on Van Dort and his passenger, discovering that the passenger had an outstanding warrant. By mistake, the officer arrested Van Dort but then released him and arrested the passenger. The officer called for backup for assistance in securing the vehicle so that a search could be conducted for contraband. While conducting a pat-down search of the passenger, drugs and paraphernalia were discovered. The passenger was placed in one patrol car, and Van Dort, still in handcuffs, was placed in a second patrol car. Van Dort was told that he was not under arrest, but the vehicle occupants were nevertheless transported to the Sheriff's office, and Van Dort was placed in an interview room. An officer told Van Dort that he was free to go, but that the officer wanted to ask Van Dort a few questions. Van Dort was then read his Miranda rights and questioned for 2 hours, at which time he admitted using methamphetamine earlier in the day. Van Dort was then charged with drug possession and subsequently moved to suppress the confession and evidence on grounds that his detention amounted to an unlawful arrest, but the motion was denied, and Van Dort appealed. The Supreme Court applied the test in St. v. Thornton, 218 M 317, 708 P2d 273 (1985), to determine whether an arrest occurred. The test involves three elements: (1) authority to arrest; (2) assertion of that authority to effect an arrest; and (3) restraint of the person arrested. The District Court found that because the officer informed Van Dort that he was not under arrest, the second element of the test was not satisfied. The Supreme Court found this reasoning too restrictive, focusing solely on the officer's words to the exclusion of the officer's conduct and the circumstances of Van Dort's detention. In U.S. v. Bravo, 295 F3d 1002 (9th Cir. 2002), it was held that an officer cannot negate a custodial situation simply by telling a suspect that the suspect is not under arrest because such an affirmation is only one factor within the totality of the circumstances to be considered in the analysis of an arrest. Further, under Thornton, an arrest has been accorded a broad definition that applies if a reasonable person, innocent of any crime, would have felt free to walk away under the circumstances. In this case, a reasonable person would have believed that the person was under arrest, despite the officer's statement to the contrary. All the Thornton factors being met, Van Dort was in fact placed under arrest. The court then considered whether the arrest was lawful based on probable cause and concluded that the facts and circumstances were insufficient for the officer to believe that Van Dort was committing or had committed an offense. The officer may have suspected that Van Dort had used drugs and used that suspicion to take Van Dort in for purposes of eliciting a confession, but at the time of the arrest, there was no evidence to support a reasonable belief of Van Dort's drug use sufficient to establish probable cause, so Van Dort's arrest was unlawful. St. v. Van Dort, 2003 MT 104, 315 M 303, 68 P3d 728 (2003), followed in St. v. Ellington, 2006 MT 219, 333 M 411, 143 P3d 119 (2006).

Sufficient Evidence to Support Finding That Fleeing Suspect in Detention for Purpose of Proving Escape: Martin was convicted of escape after shooting a police officer who was in pursuit following Martin's attempt to cash a forged check. Martin contended that the evidence was insufficient to support the conviction because he was never placed in official detention and thus could not have formed the requisite mental state for escape. The Supreme Court noted that, pursuant to St. v. Thornton, 218 M 317, 708 P2d 273 (1985), actual restraint does not require physical restraint. It was inconceivable that Martin did not recognize the officer's command to halt or stop as an assertion of the officer's authority to effect Martin's arrest or that Martin believed that he was free to walk away. Therefore, the evidence was sufficient to support the jury's finding that Martin was placed in official detention and to support Martin's conviction for escape. St. v. Martin, 2001 MT 83, 305 M 123, 23 P3d 216 (2001).

Public Duty Doctrine as Applied to Law Enforcement Personnel — Exception in Cases of Special Relationship: Trina admitted that she had been drinking when stopped in her vehicle by Officer Driscoll, who nevertheless believed that sufficient probable cause did not exist to arrest the woman. Instead, thinking Trina might be impaired, the officer suggested a ride home or that Trina walk the 2-mile distance and warned Trina about returning to the vehicle. Trina decided instead to walk to a phone and call for a ride and was killed in traffic. Trina's husband brought suit for civil damages under 42 U.S.C. 1983, claiming that the officer breached the duty to protect, in violation of Trina's due process rights. The District Court summarily dismissed the claim, holding that because no probable cause existed for Trina's arrest, the officer had no duty to protect Trina from harm and that without a duty, the action failed. The public duty doctrine provides that a police officer's duty to protect and preserve the peace is owed to the public at large rather than to a particular person, unless a special relationship exists, thus giving rise to a special duty that is more particular than that owed to the public. A special relationship is established: (1) by a statute intended to protect a specific class of persons, of which the plaintiff is a member, from a particular type of harm; (2) when a government agent undertakes specific action to protect a person or property; (3) by governmental actions that reasonably induce detrimental reliance by a member of the public; and (4) under certain circumstances when the agency has actual custody of the plaintiff or of a third person who harms the plaintiff. Relying on Stewart v. Standard Publishing Co., 102 M 43, 55 P2d 694 (1936), the Supreme Court agreed that although the officer may not have initially owed Trina a duty to protect, that duty was assumed as a matter of law when the officer prevented the woman from driving her car and ensured that she did not attempt to drive. The question of whether the duty to protect was breached is a question of fact for the jury, so summary dismissal was improper. Nelson v. Driscoll, 1999 MT 193, 295 M 363, 983 P2d 972, 56 St. Rep. 744 (1999), clarifying and distinguishing Phillips v. Billings, 233 M 249, 758 P2d 772 (1988), and followed in Massee v. Thompson, 2004 MT 121, 321 M 210, 90 P3d 394 (2004). Nelson was followed, as to elements of exception to the public duty doctrine (nonlaw enforcement case), in Orr v. St., 2004 MT 354, 324 M 391, 106 P3d 100 (2004), and Prosser v. Kennedy Enterprises, Inc., 2008 MT 87, 342 M 209, 179 P3d 1178 (2008). See also Krieg v. Massey, 239 M 469, 781 P2d 277, 46 St. Rep. 1839 (1989), and Busta v. Columbus Hosp. Corp., 276 M 342, 916 P2d 122 (1996).

Intent to Arrest Formed After Person Physically Restrained After Failing to Stop as Requested — Investigative Stop, Not Arrest: An officer had authority to arrest Anderson, whose walking and driving led her to believe that he was DUI. The officer restrained him with a "gooseneck hold" when he failed to stop as requested. She testified without contradiction that it was not until after he resisted her hold and she could clearly identify the odor of intoxicants that she decided to arrest him for DUI. The request to stop and use of the gooseneck hold constituted an investigative stop, not an arrest. Anderson v. St., 275 M 259, 912 P2d 212, 53 St. Rep. 125 (1996).

Three Elements of Arrest: An arrest occurs when there is authority to arrest, when that authority is asserted with the intention to effect an arrest, and when the person is restrained. Anderson v. St., 275 M 259, 912 P2d 212, 53 St. Rep. 125 (1996).

Actual Restraint of Suspect Necessary for Arrest: The defendant had opened the door to his home and had one foot inside when the officer told him to stop. The Supreme Court held that this constituted an arrest because a reasonable person would not have felt free to walk away under the circumstances. Billings v. Whalen, 242 M 293, 790 P2d 471, 47 St. Rep. 706 (1990).

Undisputed Facts Surrounding Arrest — Question of Law: Defendant argued that the question of whether probable cause existed for his arrest was a question of fact entitling him to a jury trial and precluding summary judgment. However, where facts were undisputed, the question of whether an arrest was legal or illegal became a question of law for the court. Wright v. St., 231 M 324, 752 P2d 748, 45 St. Rep. 652 (1988).

Escape From Arresting Officer — Physical Restraint Not Prerequisite of Arrest: A valid arrest is an underlying element of "official detention" as that term is used in 45-7-306 and is therefore also an underlying element of the offense of escape. A valid arrest occurred when a Department of Highways (now Department of Transportation) enforcement officer stopped a truck to weigh it and a passenger began to unload it, threatened the officer when he was told to stop unloading, and was twice told he was under arrest. Actual physical restraint of the passenger is not a prerequisite to a valid arrest. The standard for an arrest when there is no physical restraint is whether a reasonable person, innocent of any crime, would have felt free to walk away under the circumstances. The passenger was properly charged with and convicted of the offense of escape. St. v. Thornton, 218 M 317, 708 P2d 273, 42 St. Rep. 1614 (1985).

Privileged Entry — No Arrest Warrant: The opening of the defendant's apartment door to the limit of the night latch to determine what had caused a raging man to fall silent was a privileged entry. St. v. Lukus, 149 M 45, 423 P2d 49 (1967).

Paragraph [(1)] is a statement and the traditional statutory exemption formerly stated in R.C.M. 1947, section 23-308, but placed here for purposes of centralization and codification. Paragraph [(2)] is a codification of Montana Constitution [1889], Article V, section 15 [now Art. V, sec. 8, 1972 Mont. Const.]. The word "militia" as used in paragraph [(3)] is intended to include the state militia (see section 77-1213(b) [repealed]). The language as to the home guard is not changed. Paragraph [(4)] is a new provision and should cover an officer with a prisoner in his custody (see R.C.M. 1947, section 94-5918 which referred to arrest by civil process).

1991 Comment: This statute retains the substance of 1987 MCA 46-6-104. Subsection (1) states how an arrest may be effected—either through actual restraint or submission to custody. Subsection (2) reflects the need, at times, for reasonable force to effect an arrest. Subsection (3) allows that entry onto private property may be made to effect an arrest.

These provisions adopt the 1987 code almost verbatim. The 1967 Commission's comments are appropriate:

[Subsections (1) and (2)] . . . purport to establish standards for making an arrest for determining if an arrest has been made in a reasonable manner. . . . The officer may use all necessary means to effect the arrest if the person to be arrested either flees or forcibly resists, if he unnecessarily assaults him he is criminally liable for assault. (State v. Prlja, 57 Mont. 461, 189 Pac. 64.)

[Subsection (3)] is a restatement of the existing law, except no distinction is made between a private person and a peace officer as is the case under the present code. The only requirement is that the arrest be "authorized" . . . .

[Subsections (1) and (2)] continue the present law (see R.C.M. 1947, sections 94-6002 and 94-6010[)] and purport to establish standards for making an arrest for determining if an arrest has been made in a reasonable manner. These standards must ultimately guide the courts, attorneys and arresting officers. The officer may use all necessary means to effect the arrest if the person to be arrested either flees or forcibly resists, if he unnecessarily assaults him he is criminally liable for assault. (State v. Prlja, 57 Mont. 461, 189 Pac. 64.)

[Subsection (3)] is a restatement of the existing law, except no distinction is made between a private person and a peace officer as is the case under the present code. The only requirement is that the arrest be "authorized" as provided by [46-6-210, 46-6-402, 46-6-502, and 46-6-503 (now repealed)]. It is contemplated that the same amount of force to gain entry or exit is permissible as under the old code.

Case Notes

Elements of Thornton Reasonable Person Test Met — Arrest Unlawful: An officer received a report that the driver of a vehicle similar to Van Dort's had failed to pay for gasoline before leaving a service station. The officer pulled over Van Dort's vehicle and ran a warrant check on Van Dort and his passenger, discovering that the passenger had an outstanding warrant. By mistake, the officer arrested Van Dort but then released him and arrested the passenger. The officer called for backup for assistance in securing the vehicle so that a search could be conducted for contraband. While conducting a pat-down search of the passenger, drugs and paraphernalia were discovered. The passenger was placed in one patrol car, and Van Dort, still in handcuffs, was placed in a second patrol car. Van Dort was told that he was not under arrest, but the vehicle occupants were nevertheless transported to the Sheriff's office, and Van Dort was placed in an interview room. An officer told Van Dort that he was free to go, but that the officer wanted to ask Van Dort a few questions. Van Dort was then read his Miranda rights and questioned for 2 hours, at which time he admitted using methamphetamine earlier in the day. Van Dort was then charged with drug possession and subsequently moved to suppress the confession and evidence on grounds that his detention amounted to an unlawful arrest, but the motion was denied, and Van Dort appealed. The Supreme Court applied the test in St. v. Thornton, 218 M 317, 708 P2d 273 (1985), to determine whether an arrest occurred. The test involves three elements: (1) authority to arrest; (2) assertion of that authority to effect an arrest; and (3) restraint of the person arrested. The District Court found that because the officer informed Van Dort that he was not under arrest, the second element of the test was not satisfied. The Supreme Court found this reasoning too restrictive, focusing solely on the officer's words to the exclusion of the officer's conduct and the circumstances of Van Dort's detention. In U.S. v. Bravo, 295 F3d 1002 (9th Cir. 2002), it was held that an officer cannot negate a custodial situation simply by telling a suspect that the suspect is not under arrest because such an affirmation is only one factor within the totality of the circumstances to be considered in the analysis of an arrest. Further, under Thornton, an arrest has been accorded a broad definition that applies if a reasonable person, innocent of any crime, would have felt free to walk away under the circumstances. In this case, a reasonable person would have believed that the person was under arrest, despite the officer's statement to the contrary. All the Thornton factors being met, Van Dort was in fact placed under arrest. The court then considered whether the arrest was lawful based on probable cause and concluded that the facts and circumstances were insufficient for the officer to believe that Van Dort was committing or had committed an offense. The officer may have suspected that Van Dort had used drugs and used that suspicion to take Van Dort in for purposes of eliciting a confession, but at the time of the arrest, there was no evidence to support a reasonable belief of Van Dort's drug use sufficient to establish probable cause, so Van Dort's arrest was unlawful. St. v. Van Dort, 2003 MT 104, 315 M 303, 68 P3d 728 (2003), followed in St. v. Ellington, 2006 MT 219, 333 M 411, 143 P3d 119 (2006).

Use of Force in Self-Defense Distinguished From Use of Force in Resisting Arrest — Jury Instruction Proper: Courville was stopped by an officer who had reports of underage drinking in the area. When the officer tried to arrest Courville, Courville assaulted the officer. Courville claimed that his conduct was self-defense. The jury was instructed regarding the justifiable use of force and the unlawful use of force in resisting arrest. Courville contended that the instructions confused the jury by creating two classes of persons against whom the use of force is justified, in violation of equal protection. The Supreme Court disagreed. The use of self-defense applies equally to both classes of persons and depends on a reasonable belief of imminent harm based on the facts of the situation. The fact that the actor against whom the defensive conduct is directed happens to be a police officer is inapplicable to the self-defense defense. A person cannot use force to resist arrest, but can use defensive force if it is reasonably believed that force is necessary as against the imminent use of unlawful force. The claim of self-defense in justification of one's conduct is always considered within context and circumstances of the specific event at issue so that the factfinder can determine whether the accused's belief is reasonable. The jury was properly instructed, but found no merit in Courville's defense that the use of force against the officer was reasonable in this case. No substantial right of Courville was prejudiced, so the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Courville, 2002 MT 330, 313 M 218, 61 P3d 749 (2002).

Sufficient Evidence to Support Finding That Fleeing Suspect in Detention for Purpose of Proving Escape: Martin was convicted of escape after shooting a police officer who was in pursuit following Martin's attempt to cash a forged check. Martin contended that the evidence was insufficient to support the conviction because he was never placed in official detention and thus could not have formed the requisite mental state for escape. The Supreme Court noted that, pursuant to St. v. Thornton, 218 M 317, 708 P2d 273 (1985), actual restraint does not require physical restraint. It was inconceivable that Martin did not recognize the officer's command to halt or stop as an assertion of the officer's authority to effect Martin's arrest or that Martin believed that he was free to walk away. Therefore, the evidence was sufficient to support the jury's finding that Martin was placed in official detention and to support Martin's conviction for escape. St. v. Martin, 2001 MT 83, 305 M 123, 23 P3d 216 (2001).

Intent to Arrest Formed After Person Physically Restrained After Failing to Stop as Requested — Investigative Stop, Not Arrest: An officer had authority to arrest Anderson, whose walking and driving led her to believe that he was DUI. The officer restrained him with a "gooseneck hold" when he failed to stop as requested. She testified without contradiction that it was not until after he resisted her hold and she could clearly identify the odor of intoxicants that she decided to arrest him for DUI. The request to stop and use of the gooseneck hold constituted an investigative stop, not an arrest. Anderson v. St., 275 M 259, 912 P2d 212, 53 St. Rep. 125 (1996).

Three Elements of Arrest: An arrest occurs when there is authority to arrest, when that authority is asserted with the intention to effect an arrest, and when the person is restrained. Anderson v. St., 275 M 259, 912 P2d 212, 53 St. Rep. 125 (1996).

Plain View Doctrine Justifying Seizure of Contraband Pipe During Stop and Frisk Search for Weapons: After Stubbs was stopped on a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity, including speeding, reckless or careless driving, and eluding a peace officer, the officer noticed numerous weapons in the vehicle, providing a reasonable justification for searching Stubbs on the scene. During a pat-down search of Stubbs' clothing, the officer thought that a lump in Stubbs' pocket might be a deadly weapon. After removing the item to make sure that it was not a weapon, the item was in plain view and the incriminating character of the object, a brass pipe, was apparent. Absent any indication that the search was used as a pretext to discover illicit drugs or paraphernalia, the discovery of the pipe was inadvertent and seizure of the contraband was justified. St. v. Stubbs, 270 M 364, 892 P2d 547, 52 St. Rep. 232 (1995), overruled in part in St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996).

Escape From Arresting Officer — Physical Restraint Not Prerequisite of Arrest: A valid arrest is an underlying element of "official detention" as that term is used in 45-7-306 and is therefore also an underlying element of the offense of escape. A valid arrest occurred when a Department of Highways (now Department of Transportation) enforcement officer stopped a truck to weigh it and a passenger began to unload it, threatened the officer when he was told to stop unloading, and was twice told he was under arrest. Actual physical restraint of the passenger is not a prerequisite to a valid arrest. The standard for an arrest when there is no physical restraint is whether a reasonable person, innocent of any crime, would have felt free to walk away under the circumstances. The passenger was properly charged with and convicted of the offense of escape. St. v. Thornton, 218 M 317, 708 P2d 273, 42 St. Rep. 1614 (1985), followed, as to the lack of need for physical restraint, in St. v. Widenhofer, 286 M 341, 950 P2d 1383, 54 St. Rep. 1438 (1997), and St. v. Martin, 2001 MT 83, 305 M 123, 23 P3d 216 (2001).

Federal Constitutional Requirement of Search Warrant Prior to Entry Into Home to Conduct Search or Make Arrest: A search warrant cannot be obtained under 46-5-203 (renumbered 46-5-224) for the purpose of searching for and seizing a person unless that person has been kidnapped. Although subsection (3) of this section and 46-6-401(3) (renumbered 46-6-210) would have permitted entry into respondent's home to arrest a fugitive without a search warrant, entry into a home to conduct a search or make an arrest has been held by the U.S. Supreme Court in Steagald v. U.S., 451 US 204, 68 L Ed 2d 38, 101 S Ct 1642 (1981), to be unreasonable under the fourth amendment to the United States Constitution unless done pursuant to a warrant. Therefore, compliance with this section or 46-6-401 (renumbered 46-6-210) would not satisfy the requirements of the fourth amendment. St. v. O'Neill, 208 M 386, 679 P2d 760, 41 St. Rep. 420 (1984).

Use of Force — Liability: In making a lawful arrest, the officer may use all necessary means to effect the arrest if the person to be arrested either flees or forcibly resists; but if the officer unnecessarily assaults the person, he is criminally liable for such assault. St. v. Prlja, 57 M 461, 189 P 64 (1920).

46-6-105. Time of making arrest.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute retains the first sentence of 1987 MCA 46-6-105 and is the general provision establishing when an arrest may be made. The exception to this statute, cases involving domestic violence, is not included in the general statute.

The 1967 Commission aptly commented:

[A] person cannot be arrested at night in his home for a prior misdemeanor unless upon the direction of a magistrate endorsed upon a warrant of arrest. . . . This restriction was imposed to prevent the police from harassing a person or searching his home on the pretext of arresting him for a misdemeanor committed at some other time and place. Allowing the police to arrest for a misdemeanor at night can be an effective law enforcement tool provided it is not used as a sham to torment a citizen in his home.

Source: A.L.I., section 23 and R.C.M. 1947, section 94-6007.

This provision broadens the scope of arrests for misdemeanors. The existing code (R.C.M. 1947, section 94-6007) prohibits all misdemeanor arrests at night unless upon the direction of the magistrate endorsed upon the warrant. The proposed section expands this to allow arrests for all misdemeanors at night, except that a person cannot be arrested at night in his home for a prior misdemeanor unless upon the direction of a magistrate endorsed upon a warrant of arrest [or, under the 1985 amendment, unless he is arrested under 46-6-401 (renumbered 46-6-210) for domestic abuse (now partner or family member assault) or aggravated assault against a family member or household member]. This restriction was imposed to prevent the police from harassing a person or searching his home on the pretext of arresting him for a misdemeanor committed at some other time and place. Allowing the police to arrest for a misdemeanor at night can be an effective law enforcement tool provided it is not used as a sham to torment a citizen in his home. The provision for the time of making felony arrests remains unchanged.

Compiler's Comments

1995 Amendment: Chapter 350 at end substituted "partner or family member assault" for "domestic abuse".

Severability: Section 31, Ch. 350, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

1991 Amendment: Near beginning of first sentence, after "made", deleted "on any day and" and near end substituted "judge" for "magistrate" and in second sentence substituted "46-6-311" for "46-6-401(2)" and after "abuse" deleted "or aggravated assault against a family member or household member. A summons of a peace officer to the home or private dwelling by a family or household member constitutes an exigent circumstance for making an arrest pursuant to 46-6-401(2)"; and made minor changes in style.

1985 Amendment: Inserted last two sentences relating to arrest for domestic abuse.

Case Notes

Carport Not Considered Part of Home — Privacy Standard Inapplicable to DUI Search of Condominium Carport: Large was arrested for misdemeanor DUI while seated in her running car that was parked in the carport outside her condominium. Large moved to suppress the evidence because she was arrested at night at her home for a misdemeanor committed elsewhere, in violation of this section. She also contended that the arrest was in violation of her right to privacy. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although a carport may be structurally contiguous with the rest of a private house or dwelling, presence in a carport does not equate to presence in the home, and although lot lines do convey certain concrete ownership rights, the right to be free from misdemeanor arrest at night is reserved for the home, not coterminous property appurtenant to the home. Further, under 61-8-101, ways of the state open to the public include parking areas and other public or private places adapted for public travel that are in common use by the public. Large could not be considered to be in her home while sitting in a car parked in the common-area parking lot in her condominium complex where officers could see what was readily visible to any visitor without being overly intrusive. Thus, Large had no reasonable expectation of privacy that prohibited her arrest in her own carport, nor did a violation of this section occur. Whitefish v. Large, 2003 MT 322, 318 M 310, 80 P3d 427 (2003). See also St. v. Hubbel, 286 M 200, 951 P2d 971 (1997).

Bench Warrant Not in Conformance With Statute — Night Arrest in Home Unlawful: A City Court bench warrant stating that police were to arrest defendant "wherever she may be found" and that the warrant "may be served any time of the day or night" was overbroad and did not authorize the arrest of defendant in her home at night, for a misdemeanor committed at some other time and place, without the express direction of a judge endorsed on the warrant. Plumlee v. Travis, 254 M 96, 834 P2d 1386, 49 St. Rep. 648 (1992).

Defendant With One Foot Inside Doorway Considered Home: The arresting officer followed the defendant to his home, intending to give him a citation for an illegal turn. The officer stopped the defendant after the defendant had one foot inside his doorway and ordered him to return to his car that was parked in the driveway. The officer then gave the defendant field sobriety tests and charged him with driving under the influence. The Supreme Court held that the defendant was in his home because he had one foot inside his doorway and that the officer's restraining the defendant for the illegal turn constituted an illegal, warrantless arrest of the defendant in his home for a misdemeanor committed at some other place and time. The court went on to state that all evidence acquired after the illegal arrest pertaining to the DUI charge was inadmissible. Billings v. Whalen, 242 M 293, 790 P2d 471, 47 St. Rep. 706 (1990).

Warrantless Arrest in Home for Misdemeanor — Subsequent Confession Admissible: The defendant was arrested in his home on a misdemeanor charge. The arrest was affected without a warrant. He subsequently confessed to and was convicted of deliberate homicide. The defendant moved to suppress evidence of his confession on the basis it was tainted due to an unlawful incarceration. Although the United States Supreme Court has stated that, absent exigent circumstances, a warrantless arrest for a minor crime cannot be made in the defendant's home, the defendant's confession was sufficiently an act of free will to purge any original taint. The confessions obtained from the defendant were neither causally connected to the initial arrest nor involuntary. Therefore, the motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985).

Arrested Driver's Refusal of Breath Test Nontestimonial Conduct: Because the refusal of a driver to take a breath test is nontestimonial conduct, the constitutional prohibition against self-incrimination is not implicated. St. v. Slade, 2008 MT 341, 346 M 271, 194 P3d 677 (2008).

Sufficient Proof of Miranda Warning Despite Failure of Recording Equipment — Denial of Motion to Suppress Statements Proper: Following Gittens' arrest, officers attempted to memorialize the reading of Gittens' Miranda rights, but the camera equipment failed to record any audio. At trial, Gittens moved to suppress all statements that he made after the arrest on grounds that, absent recorded proof, he had not been properly informed of his Miranda rights. The trial court denied the motion, and Gittens appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Pursuant to St. v. Grey, 274 M 206, 907 P2d 951 (1995), officers should preserve a tangible record of the giving and waiver of Miranda rights when the means to do so are readily available, but the lack of a tangible record does not mandate suppression of a detainee's statements. Rather, this is simply one factor that weighs against the state in proving its burden. The proper inquiry is whether, based on all available evidence, the state met its burden of proving that the officer read the detainee the Miranda rights and whether those rights were waived. In this case, two officers testified that they had made a good faith effort to preserve a record of the reading and waiver, that one officer read the Miranda rights off of a card while the other officer observed, that Gittens verbally waived the rights and never indicated that he wished to avail himself of those rights, and that if the officers had known that the audio equipment was nonfunctional, they would have had Gittens sign a written acknowledgment and waiver. The trial court weighed the testimony of Gittens and the officers and found the officers more credible. The Supreme Court declined to disturb the trial court's decision that the state met its burden of proving that Gittens was properly advised of his rights despite the lack of a tangible record. St. v. Gittens, 2008 MT 55, 341 M 450, 178 P3d 91 (2008).

Defendant's Volunteering of Information Inconsistent With Request for Attorney — Miranda Claims Properly Denied: Stombaugh contended that she was never read her Miranda rights and did not waive the right to an attorney. The arresting officer and a witness both testified that the officer read Stombaugh's Miranda rights from a card at the time of the arrest. The District Court resolved the conflicting testimony by noting that Stombaugh would not have requested an attorney at the same time that she was volunteering information about drug paraphernalia in her vehicle. The Supreme Court concluded that Stombaugh's Miranda claims were properly denied. St. v. Stombaugh, 2007 MT 105, 337 M 147, 157 P3d 1137 (2007).

Defendant Not Subject to Interrogation When Apprehended — Miranda Warning Inapplicable to Gratuitous Statement: Defendant who was suspected of growing marijuana was not questioned by the deputy who took him into custody. Once in custody, a detective identified himself to the defendant and informed him of the execution of a search warrant for a marijuana growing operation. Although the defendant gratuitously responded that he had a "medical grow", the detective did not question the defendant about the statement. The defendant moved to suppress the gratuitous statement, claiming that it was made while he was in custody and prior to being "Mirandized". The District Court denied Zito's suppression motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that while the defendant was in custody, he was not questioned by any law enforcement officer or otherwise coerced or induced into making the statement. Without an interrogation, the gratuitous "medical grow" statement does not fall under the auspices of Miranda. St. v. Zito, 2006 MT 211, 333 M 312, 143 P3d 108 (2006).

Statements Made Prior to Miranda Warning Not in Response to Interrogation Admissible: Zito argued that a statement made by him at the time of his arrest that his marijuana operation was a "medical grow" could not be used as a basis for subsequent questioning because he had not been read his rights prior to making the statement. The Supreme Court held that even if Zito was in custody at the time of the statement, he made the remark on his own and not in response to interrogation by the police and therefore it was not elicited in violation of his rights. St. v. Zito, 2006 MT 211, 333 M 312, 143 P3d 108 (2006).

Part 2
Arrest With a Warrant

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: These arrest provisions consolidate the 1987 statutes governing the arrest of an individual under a warrant. The statutes are largely an adaptation of the 1987 code, but some minor changes have been made. In no instance, however, do the changes significantly change the established procedure concerning an arrest under a warrant.

The only code provision not carried forward in these statutes concerns the arrest of an individual outside the county in which the warrant was issued. That provision required that the defendant be brought to the "nearest and most accessible judge in the county" without unnecessary delay. See 1987 MCA 46-6-202(4). The Commission recognized that the nearest and most accessible judge may be in an adjoining county. Continuing the 1987 requirement, the Commission felt, would burden police procedure and could compromise the defendant's rights. Thus, the requirement "in the county" is not retained in these statutes. The statutes still require an initial appearance to be conducted without unnecessary delay. See Title 46, ch. 7, part 1.

This part is compatible with the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure. Both the federal rules and this part, for example, provide that an arrest warrant be shown to the defendant as soon as possible after the defendant requests to see it. Compare 46-6-203 and Rule 4(d)(3), Fed. R. Crim. P. There are also differences. The federal rule, for example, allows the government's attorney to request a summons in lieu of a warrant. See Rule 4(a), Fed. R. Crim. P. This part allows the court the discretion to issue either a summons or an arrest warrant. See 46-6-211.

46-6-201. Issuance of arrest warrant upon complaint.

Commission Comments

Commission Comment Not Divided: This section is a recodification of part of section 95-603, R.C.M. 1947. Section 46-6-202 (renumbered 46-6-214 and 46-6-215) is also derived from section 95-603. The commission comments to section 95-603 are printed in their entirety under 46-6-201.

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, section 107-9.

In general, the proposed section [46-6-201 and 46-6-215] involves no substantial changes in the present Montana law. The section does expand the chapter on Arrest by incorporating the pertinent complaint provisions from Title 94, Chapter 58 (R.C.M. 1947). Use of the complaint in this section should make the section on Issuance and Service of an Arrest warrant more meaningful since the purpose of the complaint at this point is to justify the issuance of the arrest warrant. The section presents in a systematic arrangement the procedure to be followed from the time the complaint is made until the warrant is executed. It must be noted, however, that both an information, [Title 46, ch. 11, part 2], and an indictment, [Title 46, ch. 11, part 3], may also be used as the basis of an arrest warrant. The contents of the complaint as stated in R.C.M. 1947, section 94-5801 are rewritten in [46-6-201(1)] without change in substance. The two most notable changes are the deletion of the requirement that the complaint contains the general name of the offense (see R.C.M. 1947, section 94-5801(3)[)] and the inclusion of the statement showing probable cause to believe that the accused has committed an offense. The deletion of the general name of the offense from the complaint is in conformity with most modern statutes and is sanctioned in State v. Schnell, 107 Mont. 579, 88 P.2d 19. The purpose for including a statement of probable cause is not to charge an offense but rather to establish a basis for issuing the warrant of arrest.

The present requirements of R.C.M., section 94-5803 are rewritten in [46-6-201(2), (3)] without change in substance. Thus, the magistrate is still under a duty to examine the complaint under oath, but the matter need not be as thoroughly aired as is required in the trial of the person accused, before issuing a warrant or dismissing the charge. (State ex rel. Manek v. Justice Court, 110 Mont. 550, 554, 104 P.2d 14.)

The choice provided in [46-6-201(3)] between a warrant and a summons, in the discretion of the court or county attorney, is new but is consistent with the method provided for obtaining the accused's presence in court as stated in [46-6-212(1)].

[Section 46-6-214(2)] follows the former law that bail must be established by a judicial officer rather than an administrative one. As a result the section anticipates that where bail is specified in the warrant the procedures provided for in [46-9-303 (now repealed, but see 46-9-302(2)(b))] may be utilized.

[Section 46-6-215] omits as unnecessary the service of an arrest warrant by a private person. The language of the section does not greatly expand the scope of the warrant of arrest. The existing law draws a distinction between warrants issued in justice courts and warrants issued in district or supreme courts. The section abolishes this distinction between the issuing courts and allows any peace officer to whom the warrant is directed, to execute it in any place in the state. The change is minor and since most of the warrants are issued in justice courts, the change should clarify and simplify the procedure and facilitate the process for execution of an arrest warrant.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 deleted (1) and (2) that read: "(1) A complaint, as the basis of an arrest warrant, shall be in writing.

(2) When a complaint is presented to a court charging a person with the commission of an offense, the court shall examine upon oath the complainant and may also examine any witnesses"; in first sentence, after "complainant and", inserted "from the examination of" and after "witnesses" inserted "or affidavits" and in third sentence substituted "prosecutor" for "county attorney".

Applicability of Commission Comments: Because of amendment by Ch. 184, L. 1977, applicability of the commission comments should be scrutinized.

Case Notes

Search of Probationer's Residence or Vehicle — Reasonable Grounds and Probable Cause Distinguished: One condition of Kriesel's probation was a provision that Kriesel be subject to search and seizure of his residence, person, or vehicle upon the request of his probation officer at any time with or without a warrant and with or without probable cause. Kriesel was arrested for violating probation and released to await revocation proceedings but failed to report to his probation officer, so a bench warrant was issued for his arrest. Following a vehicle stop based on an informant's description of his car, Kriesel was arrested on the outstanding warrant and methamphetamine and drug paraphernalia were found in the car. Kriesel tested positive for marijuana and amphetamine. On appeal, Kriesel moved to suppress the evidence found in the search, alleging that the informant supplied information that was not sufficiently corroborated and that there was thus insufficient particularized suspicion to stop his vehicle, as required under 46-5-401. However, in this case, the stop was initiated to detain Kriesel under the authority of a valid outstanding warrant, satisfying the probable cause requirement of this section, and as a result, the particularized suspicion requirement was satisfied. Further, under St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154 (1998), a search of a probationer's residence or vehicle does not require probable cause, but rather reasonable grounds as determined by the totality of the circumstances. The reasonable grounds standard requires substantially less than the probable cause standard because of a probationer's diminished expectation of privacy and the superior position of the probation officer to determine what level of supervision is necessary to provide rehabilitation and community safety. The District Court found that given Kriesel's status as a probationer, the search of his vehicle was properly executed. Given the evidence that there was probable cause for the stop and reasonable grounds for the search, the court's findings were not clearly erroneous, were correctly applied as a matter of law, and thus were affirmed. St. v. Kriesel, 2000 MT 144, 300 M 44, 2 P3d 831, 57 St. Rep. 564 (2000).

Probable Cause as Issue in Warrant Proceedings — Effect of Illegal Arrest on Evidence in Subsequent Prosecution: As set out in U.S. v. Harris, 403 US 573, 29 L Ed 2d 723, 91 S Ct 2075 (1971), the issue in warrant proceedings is not guilt beyond a reasonable doubt but probable cause for believing a crime has occurred. Even if the defendant's arrest has been unlawful, an illegal arrest has no impact on subsequent prosecution using evidence not tainted by illegality. St. v. Sor-Lokken, 246 M 70, 803 P2d 638, 47 St. Rep. 2264 (1990).

Illegal Pretrial Process and Procedure — State's Right to Charge and Try Case: Youth Court petition initiating proceedings did not state the facts constituting the offense youth was charged with in ordinary and concise language so as to enable a person of common understanding to know what was intended. The petition did not include a witness list. An arrest warrant was issued out of the Youth Court, although there is no provision in the Youth Court Act for issuance of an arrest warrant. Presumably the warrant was issued under 46-6-201, but there was no showing of probable cause supported by oath or affirmation reduced to writing. The youth had already been arrested in Oklahoma at the time the warrant was issued. By what process and authority he was arrested in Oklahoma was not shown, nor was it shown he was arrested by a law enforcement officer. He was subsequently transferred to the District Court for trial as an adult and convicted of two counts of deliberate homicide. The Youth Court proceedings from issuance of the warrant for arrest onward were patently defective. However, this did not preclude the State from having him transferred to the District Court, proceeding against him, and obtaining a conviction. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983), followed in St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367, 48 St. Rep. 142 (1991).

Parolee's Wallet at Scene of Homicide — Probable Cause for Arrest: There was probable cause or reasonable grounds to believe accused committed acts constituting a violation of his parole conditions where his wallet was found at the scene of a criminal homicide. Accused could not successfully contend on appeal following deliberate homicide conviction that statements made to police should be suppressed for being the result of an arrest without probable cause. St. v. Plouffe, 198 M 379, 646 P2d 533, 39 St. Rep. 1064 (1982).

Complaint Not Defective: When a complaint was issued in one county but the offense was committed in another, it was not defective, since the purpose of the complaint was not to charge the offense but to establish the basis for an arrest warrant. St. v. Benbo, 174 M 252, 570 P2d 894 (1977).

Complaint Conclusory and Complainant Not Examined: An arrest warrant was invalid and the subsequent search and seizure unlawful when the complaint of the Deputy County Attorney, under oath, disclosed nothing more than conclusion, the complainant was not examined under oath, and an undercover agent could not say that he had purchased from the defendant. State ex rel. Wicks v. District Court, 159 M 434, 498 P2d 1202 (1972), distinguished in State ex rel. Douglas v. District Court, 161 M 525, 507 P2d 1055 (1973).

Extent of Examination Before Issuing Warrant: The magistrate examining the complaint need not go into the matter as thoroughly as is required at trial. State ex rel. Vanek v. Justice Court, 110 M 550, 104 P2d 14 (1940).

Mandamus Not to Control Discretion: On an application for a Writ of Mandamus to compel a Justice of the Peace to dispose of an accusation, the Writ will issue commanding the Justice to take action by either issuing a warrant of arrest or dismissing the complaint, but it will not issue to control his discretion. State ex rel. Vanek v. Justice Court, 110 M 550, 104 P2d 14 (1940).

Duty of Justice of the Peace: Under former law it was the duty of a Justice of the Peace, when he was satisfied upon the complaint of any citizen that an offense had been committed, to issue a warrant of arrest and to have the offender brought before him for trial or examination. St. v. O'Brien, 35 M 482, 90 P 514 (1907).

Attorney General's Opinions

Power of "Accident Investigator" to Enforce Provisions of Mandatory Insurance Law: The role of an "accident investigator", who is not a peace officer, in enforcing the provisions of the mandatory insurance law is the same as that of a private person. If the accident investigator has reasonable cause to believe an offense has been committed, he must execute a sworn complaint pursuant to 46-6-201. 38 A.G. Op. 49 (1979).

46-6-204. Minor irregularities in warrant.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: Minor irregularities not affecting the substantial rights of the accused are generally acceptable in criminal processes. This statute incorporates the 1987 code language that recognized that principle.

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, section 107-10.

This section is consistent with the idea expressed throughout the code that a ministerial error should not be the basis for defeating the law. Only when the defendant's substantial rights have been prejudiced should the warrant be dismissed.

Signed Arrest Warrant Listing Wrong Offense Considered Inconsequential and Ministerial — Arrest Pursuant to Valid Warrant — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Law enforcement executed a search warrant on Torgeson's residence in Mineral County and found a meth lab. Torgeson was charged in Mineral County with operating a clandestine drug laboratory and the District Court issued a warrant for Torgeson's arrest, but the warrant incorrectly named the charged offense as a violation of bail conditions. Torgeson was subsequently located in Missoula County. Missoula County officers verified the Mineral County charges and confirmed that a warrant was outstanding, and went to Torgeson's residence to arrest him. Torgeson was arrested based on the Mineral County warrant and was read his Miranda rights. A search of the residence revealed another meth lab. Torgeson moved to dismiss or suppress statements he made after being given the Miranda warnings because the arrest was based on an invalid arrest warrant from Mineral County. The motion was denied, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Section 46-6-210 provides that a peace officer may arrest a person when the officer reasonably believes that a warrant for the person has been issued, and 46-6-204 provides that a warrant may not be dismissed because of technical irregularities that do not affect the person's substantial rights. Torgeson described no substantial right that was prejudiced by the erroneous charge stated in the Mineral County warrant. The warrant was in writing, was signed by a District Court judge, and was based on an existing felony charge of operating a clandestine drug laboratory. The name of the person to be arrested, the date of the charge, and the amount of bail were all correctly stated in writing, and a complete record of the proceedings leading to issuance of the warrant existed. The irregularity in the warrant did not affect Torgeson's substantial rights, and under these circumstances Torgeson was arrested pursuant to a valid warrant, so the motion to dismiss or suppress was properly denied. St. v. Torgeson, 2008 MT 295, 345 M 415, 191 P3d 448 (2008), distinguishing St. v. McKee, 1998 MT 110, 288 M 454, 958 P2d 700 (1998).

46-6-210. Arrest by peace officer.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-6-401(1)(a) through (1)(c). The statute establishes those instances in which an arrest may be made under a warrant, whether issued in this state or from another state. The statute's first sentence establishes the general rule regarding an arrest under a warrant.

Subsection (1) recognizes the authority of a peace officer to effect an arrest under a warrant issued within this state for any offense, whether a felony or misdemeanor. [This subsection was amended to add the exception regarding a warrant for a violation of a city ordinance in order to make this provision consistent with 46-6-215.]

Subsection (2) permits arrests on the basis of warrants issued from other states for felony offenses. The provision that arrests under warrants issued outside this state are allowed only for felony offenses is a limitation adopted in 1967 and continued in the 1987 statute.

The statute recognizes that arrests on the basis of a warrant may occur without the warrant in possession. Under 46-6-216, however, the defendant may request to see the warrant that authorized his arrest.

This statute presumes that no changes are necessary and contemplates no change in established procedure.

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, section 107-2 and R.C.M. 1947, section 94-6003.

The section states the circumstances under which a peace officer may make an arrest for either a felony or a misdemeanor with or without an arrest warrant. Subdivisions [(1)(a) and (1)(b)] relate to arrests for either a felony or misdemeanor based on a warrant of arrest issued in this state. The change suggested by these sections was made to conform with [46-6-216], to allow peace officers to arrest on a warrant which they do not have in their possession. This change was thought to be desirable in light of modern methods of communication. That is, when an officer has been informed that a warrant has been issued for the arrest of a person and he locates the suspect, it would be impractical to require that the officer go to the station and get the warrant and then return to make the arrest.

Subdivision [(1)(c)] relates to arrests based on out-of-state warrants. The commission felt that this provision should be limited to felony warrants only.

It should be noted that subdivisions [(1)(a) through (1)(c)] all relate to arrests based on arrest warrants.

Subdivision [(1)(d)] is the sole and exclusive provision for arrests for either a felony or a misdemeanor without an arrest warrant. [Under the 1985 amendment inserting subsection (2), this is no longer the case.] Under this provision the theory of arrests for a misdemeanor without a warrant would be the same as for a felony without a warrant. This is in conformity with the case law and constitutional requirements that an arrest without a warrant must be based upon reasonable (probable) cause. See, Montana Constitution [1889], Article III, section 7 [now Art. II, sec. 11, 1972 Mont. Const.], and State ex rel. Wong You v. District Court, 106 Mont. 347, 78 P.2d 353. The scope of arrests for misdemeanors has been broadened to allow an arrest for a past misdemeanor not committed in the officer's presence. This may be done without an arrest warrant but must be based on a showing of probable cause and at night can only take place outside the person's home or dwelling as stated in proposed section [46-6-105]. [Under the 1985 amendment inserting subsection (2), this is no longer the case.] Presently, the officer is often handicapped by being unable to arrest for a past misdemeanor not committed in his presence, e.g., family squabble [under the 1985 amendment inserting subsection (2), this is no longer the case] or traffic infraction.

Subdivision [(1)(d)] adopts the federal rule, and that of many other jurisdictions, that an arrest without a warrant may be made on reasonable grounds that the person has committed or is committing an offense, and not on the basis that "an offense has in fact been committed."

Compiler's Comments

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 near beginning of (1), after "except that", inserted "unless otherwise provided by law".

1991 Amendment: At end of (1) inserted "except that a warrant for violation of a city ordinance may not be acted upon unless the person is located within the limits of the city in which the violation is alleged to have occurred"; deleted (1)(d) that read: "(d) he believes on reasonable grounds that the person is committing an offense or that the person has committed an offense and the existing circumstances require his immediate arrest"; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) A peace officer may arrest a person anywhere, including his place of residence, if the peace officer has probable cause to believe the person is committing or has committed domestic abuse or aggravated assault against a family member or household member even though the offense did not take place in the presence of the peace officer. A summons of a peace officer to a place of residence by a family or household member constitutes an exigent circumstance for making an arrest. Arrest is the preferred response in domestic abuse cases involving injury to the victim, use or threatened use of a weapon, violation of a restraining order, or other imminent danger to the victim"; and made minor changes in style.

1985 Amendment: Inserted (2) relating to arrest for domestic abuse.

Applicability of Commission Comments: The applicability of the commission comments should be scrutinized with reference to the amendment made pursuant to Supreme Court order dated October 10, 1968, which added to subsection (4) the requirement that "the existing circumstances require his immediate arrest".

St. v. Torgeson, 2008 MT 295, 345 M 415, 191 P3d 448 (2008), distinguishing St. v. McKee, 1998 MT 110, 288 M 454, 958 P2d 700 (1998).

Reasonable Mistake in Arrest of Misidentified Person and Subsequent Seizure of Incriminating Evidence — Admissibility of Evidence: The landlady of a rental apartment asked police to come and talk to her about her tenant, whom she identified as Thomas Bateman, and gave the officers Bateman's physical description, approximate age, and a description of Bateman's suspicious activity. The officer radioed in for an outstanding warrant check on Thomas Bateman and discovered that Thomas Bateman had an outstanding warrant for misdemeanor possession of dangerous drugs. The warrant information matched the description provided by the landlady. When officers knocked on Bateman's door and asked if he was Thomas Bateman, Bateman replied affirmatively. The officers said they had a warrant for his arrest and attempted to handcuff Bateman, and Bateman dropped a bag of Gummy Bears and what appeared to be a marijuana pipe. Bateman then told the officers that there was another Thomas Bateman and that there had been police confusion regarding them in the past. Officers checked Bateman's identification, radioed to dispatch for further information, and determined that although their ages and physical descriptions were similar, the arrestee was indeed not the Thomas Bateman with the outstanding warrant. Because the officers saw Bateman drop the marijuana pipe and noticed the odor of smoke and other drug paraphernalia in the living room, they had probable cause at that point to arrest him. Also in the apartment was another man who did have an outstanding warrant. Officers then obtained a warrant to search the apartment and discovered a methamphetamine lab in the crawl space. Bateman moved to dismiss the charges because the evidence resulted from an illegal arrest. The motion was denied, and Bateman appealed. Citing Hill v. Calif., 401 US 797 (1971), the Supreme Court affirmed. The officers acted reasonably, albeit mistakenly, in arresting Bateman. Because the arrest was reasonable, the subsequent discovery of incriminating evidence was legal and admissible. St. v. Bateman, 2004 MT 281, 323 M 280, 99 P3d 656 (2004).

Arrest Without Warrant in Officer's Possession: Defendant attempted to suppress identification evidence on the grounds that the arrest was illegal. He argued that the arresting officer should have had an arrest warrant in his possession. The Supreme Court rejected the argument since the Kalispell police did have a warrant for the arrest of the defendant at the time of the arrest and it was not necessary that the arresting officer have it in his possession. St. v. Campbell, 219 M 194, 711 P2d 1357, 42 St. Rep. 1948 (1985).

Parking Meter Violation — Unlawful Search — Ordinance Unconstitutional: The search of the defendant's person under a warrant of arrest issued by a police magistrate for a parking meter violation was an unreasonable search since evidence at a suppression hearing did not disclose any basis for a mandatory custodial arrest. Furthermore, the city ordinance involved was unconstitutional to the extent that it precluded the defense that the defendant was not driving the vehicle when the parking violation occurred—depriving him of due process. St. v. Jetty, 176 M 519, 579 P2d 1228 (1978).

BELIEF THAT OFFENSE COMMITTED

Suspect's Conduct and Officer's Knowledge of Suspect's Criminal History Sufficient Probable Cause for Warrant to Search Vehicle for Drugs: When officers arrested Frasure on an outstanding warrant, Frasure acted jittery and nervous, spoke with choppy, accelerated speech, and was sweating. Based on their training, the officers knew Frasure's actions were consistent with a person under the influence of methamphetamine. The officers also knew from previous contact that Frasure was a methamphetamine addict who had previously been arrested for methamphetamine offenses. A pat-down search incident to the arrest revealed a marijuana pipe in Frasure's pocket. Frasure denied consent to search the vehicle that he was in when arrested, but the vehicle was impounded and a warrant was obtained to search the vehicle. The search revealed drugs and paraphernalia, and Frasure moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that there was insufficient probable cause for the search warrant. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The officers' knowledge and Frasure's conduct constituted sufficient evidence to support the officers' belief that Frasure had committed an offense, so sufficient probable cause existed to support the vehicle search, and denial of Frasure's motion to suppress was not erroneous. St. v. Frasure, 2004 MT 242, 323 M 1, 97 P3d 1101 (2004).

Officer's Knowledge of Vehicle Owner's Revoked License Sufficient Basis for Suspicion of Criminal Activity to Warrant Stopping Vehicle: Deputy Keintz observed a vehicle displaying a distinctive personalized license plate being driven by a female south of Missoula. The officer recognized the license plate, recalled the prior arrest and license suspension of the vehicle owner, and initiated a traffic stop. Halvorson was the owner and driver of the vehicle and was ticketed for driving with a suspended license. On appeal, Halvorson contended that the officer did not have sufficient information to form a particularized suspicion that the occupant of the vehicle was or had been engaged in criminal activity to justify stopping the vehicle. Applying the criteria in St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293 (1981), the Supreme Court followed St. v. Pike, 551 NW 2d 919 (Minn. 1996), in holding that an officer's knowledge that the owner of a vehicle has a revoked driver's license is enough to form the basis of a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity when the officer observes the vehicle being driven, as long as the officer remains unaware of any facts that would render unreasonable an assumption that the owner is driving the vehicle. St. v. Halvorson, 2000 MT 56, 299 M 1, 997 P2d 751, 57 St. Rep. 270 (2000), followed in Billings v. Costa, 2006 MT 181, 333 M 84, 140 P3d 1070 (2006). Costa was followed in St. v. Neil, 2009 MT 128, 350 M 268, 207 P3d 296 (2009).

Defendant's Discovery of Surveillance Grounds for Arrest: The defendant argued that the police had no basis to arrest him without a warrant. The Supreme Court upheld the arrest on the basis that the officers were aware that the defendant had learned he was under surveillance and his arrest was necessary to prevent him from destroying evidence. St. v. Sorensen, 243 M 321, 792 P2d 363, 47 St. Rep. 873 (1990).

Field Sobriety Tests Not Mandatory to Establish Probable Cause to Arrest on DUI Charge: Conducting field sobriety tests is not a requisite for determining whether probable cause exists for arrest on a DUI charge under 61-8-401. Probable cause must be based on an assessment of all relevant circumstances, and field sobriety tests are a tool that can assure the officer that the person is under the effect of intoxicating beverages. However, such tests are not mandatory and were not required as evidence in this case because the record was replete with other evidence supporting a DUI offense. Missoula v. Forest, 236 M 129, 769 P2d 699, 46 St. Rep. 237 (1989).

Citizen Informant's Report and Officers' Observations Forming Basis for Probable Cause: A citizen informant communicated the following facts, among others, to officers at the crime scene: (1) the defendant stabbed and shot at the informant; (2) defendant was intoxicated; (3) the woman in a trailer house with defendant was recently beaten by defendant; (4) the woman was terrified and believed she would be beaten again; and (5) informant believed the woman was in danger and was being held against her will. The officers observed informant's injured hand and his excited, fearful demeanor. The officers received no response in their attempts to hail the trailer occupants with a bullhorn. These circumstances constituted sufficient probable cause that an offense had been committed to justify a warrantless arrest. St. v. Hammer, 233 M 101, 759 P2d 979, 45 St. Rep. 1326 (1988).

Facts Following Stop Prompting Probable Cause: A founded suspicion to stop for investigative detention may ripen into probable cause to arrest through the occurrence of facts or incidents after the stop. St. v. Lee, 232 M 105, 754 P2d 512, 45 St. Rep. 903 (1988), citing St. v. Sharp, 217 M 40, 702 P2d 959, 42 St. Rep. 1009 (1985), and followed in St. v. Schoffner, 248 M 260, 811 P2d 548, 48 St. Rep. 424 (1991). See also Jess v. St., 255 M 254, 841 P2d 1137, 49 St. Rep. 951 (1992).

Arrest Outside City Limits by City Police Absent Local Ordinance — Arrest Lawful in Capacity as Private Citizen: The city of Eureka never enacted an ordinance giving city police jurisdiction outside the city limits pursuant to 7-32-4301, and defendant contended that his arrest for DUI and hit-and-run made 0.8 mile outside Eureka was therefore illegal and that all evidence resulting from the arrest was inadmissible. The Supreme Court found that by enacting 7-32-4301 (authorizing city police arrests within 5 miles of town), 46-6-502 (authorizing arrests by private citizens), and 46-6-411 (authorizing out-of-state officers in close pursuit to make arrests in Montana), it is clear that Montana no longer adheres to the common-law rule strictly prohibiting arrests outside an officer's jurisdiction. A police officer outside his jurisdiction has not lost his characteristics of being a private citizen; therefore, if an arrest by a private citizen would be lawful under the circumstances, the arrest by an officer outside his jurisdiction would be lawful. St. v. McDole, 226 M 169, 734 P2d 683, 44 St. Rep. 561 (1987), followed in St. v. Williamson, 1998 MT 199, 290 M 321, 965 P2d 231, 55 St. Rep. 843 (1998).

Probable Cause for Warrantless DUI Arrest: After a citizen reported a vehicle being driven recklessly, the undersheriff discovered the vehicle parked at defendant's trailer. Defendant stepped outside his trailer where he admitted driving and agreed upon request to perform field sobriety tests. Upon failing the tests, defendant was arrested and subsequently convicted of driving under the influence of alcohol. Defendant appealed, alleging that evidence had been obtained pursuant to illegal arrest. The Supreme Court affirmed the conviction, stating that the citizen's report, defendant's admissions, and the undersheriff's observations provided the undersheriff with probable cause for the arrest. Defendant had reduced privacy expectation once he stepped outside the trailer. Police may legally seize evidence likely to disappear before a warrant can be obtained. St. v. Ellinger, 223 M 349, 725 P2d 1201, 43 St. Rep. 1778 (1986), followed in Jess v. St., 255 M 254, 841 P2d 1137, 49 St. Rep. 951 (1992). See also St. v. Federal Constitutional Requirement of Search Warrant Prior to Entry Into Home to Conduct Search or Make Arrest: A search warrant cannot be obtained under 46-5-203 (renumbered 46-5-224) for the purpose of searching for and seizing a person unless that person has been kidnapped. Although subsection (1)(c) of this section and 46-6-104 would have permitted entry into respondent's home to arrest a fugitive without a search warrant, entry into a home to conduct a search or make an arrest has been held by the U.S. Supreme Court in Steagald v. U.S., 451 US 204, 68 L Ed 2d 38, 101 S Ct 1642 (1981), to be unreasonable under the fourth amendment to the United States Constitution unless done pursuant to a warrant. Therefore, compliance with this section or 46-6-104 would not satisfy the requirements of the fourth amendment. St. v. O'Neill, 208 M 386, 679 P2d 760, 41 St. Rep. 420 (1984).

Stop and Frisk Procedure Applicable to Automobiles — Particularized Suspicion of Trained Police: Where, upon investigating a possible burglary, the investigating officer stopped a suspicious looking automobile and noticed what appeared to be stolen property in the back seat of the car, which was driven off at a high rate of speed in the middle of the investigation, the District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to suppress the stolen property recovered from the automobile. The dictum in St. v. Rader, 177 M 252, 581 P2d 437 (1978), that stop and frisk principles do not apply to automobiles must be abandoned in light of the principle most recently announced in U.S. v. Cortez, 449 US 411, 66 L Ed 2d 621, 101 S Ct 690 (1981), that an assessment of whether a crime has been committed must be based upon all relevant circumstances and the evidence evaluated in light of the knowledge of a trained law enforcement officer. When a trained police officer has a particularized suspicion that the occupant of a vehicle is or has been engaged in criminal activity or is a witness thereto, a limited and reasonable investigatory stop and search is justified. St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293, 38 St. Rep. 1078 (1981), followed in St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154, 55 St. Rep. 1235 (1998), St. v. Probable Cause to Arrest — Corroboration — Recent Stabbing: Where a security guard called the police, informing the police that a stabbing had occurred and that the suspect was located in a certain area, and where this information was later corroborated when: (1) the police found the suspect; (2) the suspect admitted participation in the stabbing; (3) the police observed blood on the suspect; and (4) the suspect produced a knife with blood on it, the officers had sufficient knowledge to warrant the belief that an offense had been committed by the defendant and sufficient probable cause to arrest the defendant. St. v. Graves, 191 M 81, 622 P2d 203, 38 St. Rep. 9 (1981).

Immediate Warrantless Arrest — Evidence Obtained Pursuant to Arrest — Collective Police Information Considered — Exceptional Circumstances: On appeal from a conviction for conspiracy to sell dangerous drugs, the defendant attacked his arrest as being without probable cause and unlawfully warrantless. The Supreme Court found the arrest was based on probable cause and lawful. Therefore, the evidence seized after the arrest was admissible at trial. An officer could make an arrest without a warrant when he believed on reasonable grounds that the person had committed an offense and the existing circumstances required immediate arrest.

"Reasonable grounds" to arrest is synonymous with "probable cause" to arrest. Probable cause may be found in a case such as this by evaluating the collective information of the police, not just that of the arresting officer. Here the court found more than the defendant's mere presence at the scene of the crime, and it found probable cause had existed. On the issue of the necessity of immediate arrest, the court compared the situation to the "exceptional circumstances" that allow police to enter a residence without a warrant to search and arrest. Considering the possibilities of the defendant's fleeing and the likelihood that the evidence of the buy, which easily could have been destroyed or disposed of, might be found on the defendant because he was present at delivery, the court held that the officers were reasonable in their belief that an immediate arrest was necessary. St. v. Davis, 190 M 285, 620 P2d 1209, 37 St. Rep. 1958 (1980).

Probable Cause to Make Warrantless Entry and Arrest: The Supreme Court cautioned that arrest and search warrants should be used as the rule and not the exception but that sufficient exigent circumstances existed here, especially due to the involvement of juveniles, to justify the warrantless entry and arrest. St. v. Allen, 188 M 135, 612 P2d 199 (1980), following St. v. Hull, 158 M 6, 487 P2d 1314 (1971); St. v. Bennett, 158 M 496, 493 P2d 1077 (1972); St. v. Means, 177 M 193, 581 P2d 406 (1978).

Probable Cause to Arrest — Factors in Addition to Mere Presence at the Scene: Defendant's mere presence at the scene of the homicide was not sufficient probable cause to justify his arrest. The court agreed but stated that the facts presented more. The police had overheard the events in the house over an open telephone line and the defendant was present with the corpse at the scene when the police arrived within minutes after the events were overheard on the phone. The scratches on the defendant's face indicated recent involvement in a fight. These events sufficiently constituted probable cause to arrest the defendant. St. v. Hamilton, 185 M 522, 605 P2d 1121 (1980).

Timeliness of Warrantless Arrest: Defendant, charged with mitigated deliberate homicide, argued that too much time had elapsed between commission of the crime and the arrest to support a warrantless arrest. The court disagreed because knowledge of the commission of a crime may be gained by an officer through a mechanical apparatus, and an offense is deemed committed in the presence of the officer so as to justify arrest without a warrant when he hears the disturbance and proceeds at once to the scene. What the officer overheard on the telephone reasonably led him to believe that the defendant was committing an offense. The warrantless arrest pursuant to that belief minutes later was proper regardless of whether or not the existing circumstances required immediate arrest. St. v. Hamilton, 185 M 522, 605 P2d 1121 (1980).

Probability Sufficient: To constitute probable cause for arrest or issuance of a search warrant "only a probability of criminal conduct need be shown". St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978), quoting State ex rel. Garris v. Wilson, 162 M 256, 511 P2d 15 (1973).

Suspicion of Officer Insufficient for Probable Cause: Evidence obtained when officers stopped a vehicle on the pretext of a traffic violation and arrested the defendant without probable cause was properly suppressed. Suspicion of an officer alone, unsubstantiated by some evidence upon which to base a belief that a crime is or has been committed, is not enough to establish probable cause, no matter what the subsequent search discloses. St. v. Rader, 177 M 252, 581 P2d 437 (1978). For later case apparently to the contrary, see St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293, 38 St. Rep. 1078 (1981), annotated under this section.

Marijuana Odor — Factor in Probable Cause: Law enforcement officers had probable cause to believe an offense was being committed in the defendants' residence and, because of the presence of exigent circumstances, were justified in entering and arresting the defendants and searching the defendants and the premises immediately under their control. Thus, the constitutionality of the warrantless search and seizure condition of parole and probation status was irrelevant. St. v. Means, 177 M 193, 581 P2d 406 (1978).

Crime Committed in Another State: The Supreme Court held that Idaho law recognizes the common-law rule that an arrest may be made without a warrant when the arresting officer has probable cause to believe the person arrested had committed a crime in another state. Thus, subsequent confessions of a codefendant were properly admitted. St. v. Coleman, 177 M 1, 579 P2d 732 (1978). See also St. v. Lynch, 1998 MT 308, 292 M 144, 969 P2d 920, 55 St. Rep. 1278 (1998).

Odor of Marijuana — Not Probable Cause: A police officer's detection of the odor of marijuana emanating from inside an automobile, absent evidence of visible content, was insufficient probable cause for a warrantless search and subsequent arrest of the occupants on the basis of evidence seized in the search. St. v. Schoendaller, 176 M 376, 578 P2d 730 (1978).

No Probable Cause — Unreliability of Tip: Police detectives did not have probable cause to enter an upstairs room of an inn, arrest defendants for participating in a card game on unlicensed premises, and search the room because of the inability of the informant's tip to satisfy the two-pronged Aguilar test. St. v. Robey, 176 M 298, 577 P2d 1226 (1978).

Probable Cause to Stop: The stop of the defendant's automobile and subsequent events were without probable cause when based solely on conjecture and speculation of another officer transmitted by radio to the arresting officer not present at the scene of the "suspicious" activity. St. v. Marshall, 174 M 278, 570 P2d 909 (1977). See St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293, 38 St. Rep. 1078 (1981), annotated under this section.

Probable Cause Sufficient Without Exigency — Existing Circumstances: The police had probable cause to arrest the defendant when the facts and circumstances within the officers' knowledge could reasonably have led them to no other belief than that the defendant was committing the offense charged, notwithstanding the issue of whether or not the existing circumstances required the arrest. St. v. Lenon, 174 M 264, 570 P2d 901 (1977).

Good Faith Not Sufficient: Good faith or mere suspicion on the part of a police officer is not enough to establish probable cause. A pretext traffic stop may not be used to avoid the requirement. St. v. Lahr, 172 M 32, 560 P2d 527 (1977). See St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293, 38 St. Rep. 1078 (1981), annotated under this section.

Probable Cause Sufficient Without Actual Offer to Sell Drugs: Although the defendant made no actual offer to sell drugs, except by conduct, the court found probable cause because the facts and circumstances were within the officer's knowledge and he had reasonably trustworthy information. Those facts are sufficient to warrant a man of reasonable caution in the belief that an offense has been or is being committed. St. v. Hill, 170 M 71, 550 P2d 390 (1976).

Reliable Informant: An informant was determined to be reliable for the purpose of reasonable grounds for an arrest without a warrant under this section. State ex rel. Goulding v. District Court, 167 M 255, 538 P2d 18 (1975).

Suspicion Insufficient: An arrest or search and seizure made without a warrant is illegal and therefore unreasonable when it is made upon mere suspicion or belief unsupported by facts, circumstances, or credible information calculated to produce such belief. State ex rel. Wong You v. District Court, 106 M 347, 78 P2d 353 (1938). See St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293, 38 St. Rep. 1078 (1981), annotated under this section.

46-6-211. Issuance of arrest warrant or summons.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: Subsection (1) preserves the general rules concerning the issuance of a warrant or summons by a court. The provision gives the court discretion to issue either a warrant or summons when the defendant is a person and discretion to issue a summons if the defendant is a corporation. Subsection (1) preserves the practice that permits more than one warrant or summons to issue from a single criminal charge. Some other provisions of the 1987 code, however, have been amended.

A key amendment allows a warrant or summons to issue only upon the filing of a charge. Previously, the code allowed a summons to issue when the court was otherwise authorized to issue an arrest warrant. An arrest warrant may issue only after filing a complaint or charge against the defendant. See 1987 MCA 46-6-201. The Commission recognized that the standard—probable cause—is the same for filing a charge as for issuing a warrant. This statute should not cause any change in established procedure and still contemplates that either a warrant or summons may issue either simultaneously with or after filing a charge.

The second sentence of subsection (1) affords the court the discretion to issue a summons when a charge is filed against a corporation. The Commission acknowledged that this change departs from the mandate in 1987 MCA 46-6-304(1) but has determined that the court should have such discretion. Obtaining the appearance of the corporation by other means may now be considered.

The general rule regarding service of a summons, whether to a person or corporation, follows the procedure established in civil proceedings but adds a new provision allowing a criminal summons to be mailed as well as personally served. This practice is now common and saves considerable time and expense. The Commission believed that service by mail was appropriate because the court could issue a warrant and was giving the defendant a break by using a summons.

The federal rules provide that an arrest warrant will issue unless an attorney for the government requests a summons. See Rule 4(a), Fed. R. Crim. P. While the Commission recognized that the County Attorney may be helpful to the court, allowing the court final discretion was considered the proper rule. The uniform rules appear to contemplate a lesser standard for the issuance of a summons. The Commission did not consider that rule as an alternative. See Rule 221, Unif. R. Crim. P.

46-6-212. Failure to appear following summons or notice to appear.

Commission Comments

1991 Comments: This statute consolidates two sections found in the 1987 code that established the procedure upon failure to appear in response to a summons. Subsection (1) preserves the substance of 1987 MCA 46-6-303. The statute, however, does not provide that the court must await a defendant's failure to respond to a notice to appear before an arrest warrant can issue. The statute treats the failure to respond to a notice to appear and to a summons in the same manner. That is, once the judge is satisfied that the person commanded to appear will not do so, an arrest warrant may issue immediately. In either case, the judge's discretion to issue an arrest warrant is preserved.

Subsection (2) preserves 1987 MCA 46-6-304(3), regarding the procedure followed upon the failure of a corporation to appear.

This statute allows the judge to issue a warrant of arrest either before the time for the appearance stated in the summons or after the person fails to appear. The statute contemplates that a person is more likely to respond to a summons if the alternative is the issuance of an arrest warrant. The failure to appear in response to a notice to appear or a summons should not result in a contempt citation.

Source: [Former section 46-6-303] A.L.I., section 14.

This provision allows the magistrate to issue a warrant of arrest either before the time for the appearance stated in the summons or after the person fails to appear. This provision does not make failure to appear a contempt of court. The issuance of an arrest warrant should be sufficient if the person summoned does not appear.

The language of the second sentence of the section serves as a directive to the magistrate to guide his actions in issuing an arrest warrant.

[Former section 46-6-304] Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, section 107-13; A.L.I., sections 15-17, and R.C.M. 1947, sections 94-9601 through 94-9610.

The section continues the present law establishing a standard for proceeding against a corporation in a criminal action.

The section is intended to remove surplus language from the present code sections without changing the substance.

1991 Amendment: (46-6-303) Deleted former first sentence that read: "Upon failure of the person summoned to appear, the magistrate shall issue a warrant of arrest", in first sentence, after "summons", inserted "or notice to appear", before "becomes" substituted "judge" for "magistrate", and after "person" substituted "has not appeared or" for "summoned"; and made minor changes in style.

(46-6-304) Deleted former (1) and (2) that read: "(1) Upon a charge filed against a corporation for the commission of an offense, the court shall issue a summons setting forth the nature of the offense and commanding the corporation to appear before the court at a certain time and place.

(2) The summons for the appearance of a corporation may be served in the manner provided for service of summons upon a corporation in a civil action"; after "entered" substituted "in accordance with 46-12-204 and the matter must" for "by the court having jurisdiction to try the offense for which the summons was issued and such court shall"; and made minor change in style.

46-6-213. Form and content of summons.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: Subsections (1) and (2) retain 1987 MCA 46-6-302. Use of the summons is relatively new in Montana. The summons is an instrument designed to get a person into court without the necessity and inconvenience of an immediate arrest. This statute specifies the minimum requirements of a valid summons.

Subsection (4) is an amendment to the 1987 code provision and requires the summons to forewarn the individual summoned of the consequences of a failure to appear. This statute reflects the suggested contents of a summons as presented in the uniform rules. See Rule 222(d), Unif. R. Crim. P.

The 1967 Commission's comments concerning the summons remain appropriate:

Issuing a summons does not constitute an arrest. In fact, it is a courtesy substitute for an arrest when the court, in its discretion believes that the person can be relied upon to appear. Further, it precludes the necessity of setting bail..

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, section 107-11.

This [46-6-301 (now repealed) and this section] is a new provision to Montana criminal law which establishes a procedure for getting persons into court without the necessity and inconvenience of an immediate arrest. This provision vests the justice of the peace and the district court judge with discretion to refrain from using a warrant of arrest when they feel the person summoned will appear. The broad language of this provision allows the use of a summons in either a felony or misdemeanor case.

The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, Rule 4, provide for the use of a summons. Also, the sections of several states provide for the use of summons for specific criminal offenses or classes of offenses. It has been stated that in England a summons is used in eighty per cent of the criminal cases. Issuing a summons does not constitute an arrest. In fact, it is a courtesy substitute for an arrest when the court, in its discretion believes that the person can be relied upon to appear. Further, it precludes the necessity of setting bail.

46-6-214. Form and content of arrest warrant.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is a restatement of the 1987 statutes providing for the form and content of an arrest warrant. The provisions of 1987 MCA 46-6-202(1) are preserved within this statute. Subsection (2) reflects the 1987 code that provided that the amount of bail, if any, may be stated in the warrant. See 1987 MCA 46-6-202(2).

This statute consolidates the 1987 code concerning the form of the arrest warrant. No change to prior law is contemplated by adopting this statute.

Case Notes

Signed Arrest Warrant Listing Wrong Offense Considered Inconsequential and Ministerial — Arrest Pursuant to Valid Warrant — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Law enforcement

executed a search warrant on Torgeson's residence in Mineral County and found a meth lab. Torgeson was charged in Mineral County with operating a clandestine drug laboratory and the District Court issued a warrant for Torgeson's arrest, but the warrant incorrectly named the charged offense as a violation of bail conditions. Torgeson was subsequently located in Missoula County. Missoula County officers verified the Mineral County charges and confirmed that a warrant was outstanding, and went to Torgeson's residence to arrest him. Torgeson was arrested based on the Mineral County warrant and was read his Miranda rights. A search of the residence revealed another meth lab. Torgeson moved to dismiss or suppress statements he made after being given the Miranda warnings because the arrest was based on an invalid arrest warrant from Mineral County. The motion was denied, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Section 46-6-210 provides that a peace officer may arrest a person when the officer reasonably believes that a warrant for the person has been issued, and 46-6-204 provides that a warrant may not be dismissed because of technical irregularities that do not affect the person's substantial rights. Torgeson described no substantial right that was prejudiced by the erroneous charge stated in the Mineral County warrant. The warrant was in writing, was signed by a District Court judge, and was based on an existing felony charge of operating a clandestine drug laboratory. The name of the person to be arrested, the date of the charge, and the amount of bail were all correctly stated in writing, and a complete record of the proceedings leading to issuance of the warrant existed. The irregularity in the warrant did not affect Torgeson's substantial rights, and under these circumstances Torgeson was arrested pursuant to a valid warrant, so the motion to dismiss or suppress was properly denied. Arrest With Telephonically Approved Warrant and Without Written Copy Signed by Judge: A judge approved an arrest over the phone. She typed the warrant on her computer but never gave a copy, with her signature on it, to the officer. The officer's arrest of defendant in his home, without a warrant that was in writing and signed, as required by this section, when two persons guarded the home while the officer called the judge and when the judge did not live far from the home, was illegal because it was made without a valid warrant. The District Court erred by denying a motion to suppress all evidence gained as a result of the invalid arrest warrant. St. v. McKee, 1998 MT 110, 288 M 454, 958 P2d 700, 55 St. Rep. 433 (1998).

Delay in Initial Appearance — Evidence Excluded: The failure to provide the defendant with a prompt initial appearance necessitated exclusion of evidence obtained and statements allegedly made after the defendant's arrest when he established that the delay was unnecessary and the prosecution failed to meet the burden of showing that such evidence and statements were not reasonably related to the delay. St. v. Benbo, 174 M 252, 570 P2d 894 (1977). See also St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 339, 297 M 427, 993 P2d 672, 56 St. Rep. 1346 (1999).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute adopts 1987 MCA 46-6-203, with minor changes made to provide for a gender-neutral statute. This statute contemplates no changes in the present manner of making an arrest under a warrant.

Source: A.L.I., section 24.

The present Montana law does not draw a distinction between an arrest with or without a warrant in so far as the officer's conduct is concerned. This section attempts to define exactly when the warrant must be shown to the arrested person. California recently adopted similar language allowing the officer to arrest on a warrant, without having the warrant in his possession. This approach should make the arrest warrant a more effective law enforcement tool when used with modern methods of communication.

Arrest Without Warrant in Officer's Possession: Defendant attempted to suppress identification evidence on the grounds that the arrest was illegal. Part 3
Warrantless Arrest and Notice to Appear

46-6-310. Notice to appear.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute, formerly 1987 MCA 46-6-404, affords a peace officer the discretion either to make an arrest or to issue a notice ordering the person to appear at a certain time and place.

As the 1967 Commission commented, "This notice is a courtesy to the person involved and his failure to appear will result in a summons or warrant of arrest being issued."

Neither the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure nor the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure provide for such a notice requirement.

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, section 107-12.

This section is the counterpart to [46-6-301 (now repealed, but see 46-6-213)] which vests the magistrate with discretion as to whether an arrest warrant is necessary to obtain a person's presence in court. This provision vests similar discretion in a peace officer arresting without a warrant.

This provision seems to be a workable solution to a very touchy social and legal problem. Since a person is not arrested when he is given a notice to appear, this method of securing a person's presence in court may save embarrassment for both the police officer and the person who received the notice.

This notice is a courtesy to the person involved and his failure to appear will result in a summons or warrant of arrest being issued. The commission did not attach any civil or criminal penalty for failure to appear.

The commission did agree that a procedure patterned after the operating procedure of the Montana highway patrol on issuing traffic citations would be followed. The officer would give the person notice and if he failed to appear, then the officer could sign the notice and it would become the complaint forming the basis for the warrant of arrest.

Truant Smelling of Alcohol — Particularized Suspicion for Arrest — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: A 14-year-old boy's mother called his school, reported that he had not returned home the previous night, and requested that he be picked up. The school resource officer notified police and asked that the boy be brought to school if found. An officer later found the boy on the street smelling of alcohol and took the boy to the police station where it was discovered that several town businesses had been burglarized during the night, including a bowling alley where money and liquor had been stolen. Money and liquor were found on the youth, and his shoes were taken as evidence to see if they matched prints found at the bowling alley. The youth moved that all evidence be suppressed, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Based on the fact that the officer smelled alcohol on the youth, the officer's particularized suspicion that the youth had been drinking developed into probable cause to believe that the youth committed the offense of consuming or possessing alcohol. Because the officer had probable cause to make an immediate arrest, including the fact that the boy had been reported missing from home and was truant from school, it was constitutionally permissible to take the boy into custody pursuant to 41-5-321 and reasonable to conduct a search pursuant to that arrest for the youth's safety. In re Z.M., 2007 MT 122, 337 M 278, 160 P3d 490 (2007).

Arrest and Detention for Nonjailable Offense Unreasonable Absent Circumstances to Justify Immediate Arrest: A Havre police officer responded to a 2:47 a.m. complaint that two people were "messing around with cars" and were running toward the post office, but no physical description was provided. While searching the post-office area, the officer noticed a person walking down the street. Upon seeing the police car, the person began running. Bauer was eventually found and arrested for minor in possession (MIP), second offense. During booking, Bauer was also found to be in possession of drugs, but moved to suppress on grounds that his arrest and detention for a nonjailable offense was an unlawful violation of the right to privacy, the right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure, and the right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The District Court concluded that the arrest was lawful because once the officer had probable cause to arrest, the right to detain was inherent. The Supreme Court disagreed, reversed, and suppressed the fruits of the search. When determining the reasonableness of a warrantless search, the state's interest must be balanced against the level of intrusion into an individual's privacy resulting from the search, and this analysis applies equally to the seizure of a person. Although 46-6-311 gives officers the discretion to either arrest or issue a notice to appear, to be constitutional, the officer's exercise of that discretion must be reasonable, and in addition to probable cause, there must also be circumstances that require immediate arrest. It is unreasonable for an officer to effect an arrest and detention for a nonjailable offense when there are no circumstances to justify an immediate arrest, and a person stopped for such an offense should not be subjected to the indignity of an arrest and police station detention when a simple, nonintrusive notice to appear will serve the interests of law enforcement. Here, the officer knew that imprisonment was not a potential punishment for Bauer's second offense MIP, and there were no circumstances that required Bauer's immediate arrest, so Bauer should have been issued a notice to appear in lieu of arrest. St. v. Bauer, 2001 MT 248, 307 M 105, 36 P3d 892 (2001).

Peace Officers' Authority to Enforce Provisions of Mandatory Insurance Law: Peace officers who have reasonable grounds to believe that an individual is in violation of the mandatory motor vehicle insurance law may either effect the person's immediate arrest or issue a notice to appear. 38 A.G. 46-6-311. Basis for arrest without warrant — arrest of predominant aggressor — no contact order.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute closely reflects 1987 MCA 46-6-401(1)(d). That code provision described when a peace officer could effect an arrest without a warrant. Previously, such warrantless arrests could occur when the peace officer "believes on reasonable grounds" that the person is committing or has committed an offense. The statute recognizes that "reasonable grounds" is synonymous with probable cause. The operable phrase "probable cause to believe" replaces "believes on reasonable grounds" in the statute. The change accurately reflects the 1987 MCA. See St. v. Rader, 177 Mont. 252, 256, 257 (1978), and Art. II, sec. 11, Mont. Const.

As the 1967 Commission noted, this provision provides a significant distinction for cases in which such a warrantless arrest may occur. Namely, "an arrest without a warrant may be made on reasonable grounds that the person has committed or is committing an offense, and not on the basis that "an offense has in fact been committed"". Clearly, probable cause for an arrest without a warrant must attach to the person, not the offense.

While the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure provide for an arrest without a warrant, they do not compare to either the 1987 code or this statute. The 1987 MCA language is not in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure but is reflected in the current federal statutes concerning a warrantless arrest. See 18 U.S.C. 3052. As noted, however, this statute adopts language that recognizes that the appropriate standard is probable cause. The change avoids any possible consideration that "reasonable grounds" is a lesser standard. Substantive law in the area has not been altered.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 411 inserted (3) concerning standing order for no contact in partner or family member assault cases. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 411, L. 2005, provided: "WHEREAS, the Legislature has reviewed and considered the report filed by the Montana Domestic Violence Fatality Review Commission, which conducted case reviews of domestic violence homicides of spouses, partners, and children; and

WHEREAS, victims of domestic violence are at high risk for additional threats, violence, and homicide; and

WHEREAS, a victim's participation in a prosecution is jeopardized when a domestic violence assault is followed by intimidation in the form of threats and coercion; and

WHEREAS, courts have the authority to impose conditions on defendants charged with partner or family member assault when conditions will improve victim safety; and

WHEREAS, a court order restricting contact between the offender and the victim will improve victim safety."

Severability: Section 31, Ch. 350, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 425 in first sentence in (2) substituted "partner" for "household member"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Authority and Probable Cause to Make DUI Arrest: Ditton contended that the city police officer who arrested Ditton for DUI lacked authority to make the arrest because the arrest occurred outside city limits. Ditton also asserted that the officer lacked probable cause to make the arrest. Nevertheless, Ditton was convicted of DUI. Ditton appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed on both issues. Although the arrest was outside city limits, pursuant to 7-32-4301 and relevant city ordinances, police officers had authority to conduct traffic stops within 5 miles of city limits. The arrest was within that area, so the officer had authority to make the stop. In addition, probable cause was present based on Ditton's overall driving, including striking a stop sign after the officer activated emergency lights, and an audio and video recording of the interactions between Ditton and the officer. The interactions, which included Ditton's performance in field sobriety tests, Ditton's overall appearance and level of functionality, and Ditton's driving, were sufficient to allow the officer to make a probable cause determination. St. v. Ditton, 2009 MT 57, 349 M 306, 203 P3d 806 (2009).

Probable Cause and Particularized Suspicion of DUI Based on Flagrant Traffic Violations — Suspension of License Proper: Cybulski drove west in the eastbound lane of an interstate highway for at least 30 minutes, obviously oblivious to the surrounding environment. Cybulski initially refused to stop for a pursuing officer, and when she did stop, she failed to respond to the officer's instructions, and the officer had to forcibly remove her from the car before placing her under arrest. Cybulski failed field sobriety tests and refused to take a breath test, so her license was suspended. Cybulski later petitioned for reinstatement of her license, and the District Court granted the petition on grounds that although the officer had a particularized suspicion to stop Cybulski for driving on the wrong side of the highway, the officer lacked the requisite particularized suspicion to conduct sobriety tests and the probable cause to make a DUI arrest. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. An experienced officer could infer that Cybulski was DUI based on the sheer length of time that Cybulski traveled on the wrong side of the interstate and her apparent obliviousness to oncoming traffic traveling in the same lane. When paired with Cybulski's unusually delayed response to pursuing officers, the officer was entitled to infer that Cybulski was DUI even before she stopped her car. Probable cause existed because there were sufficient facts and circumstances within the officer's personal knowledge to warrant a reasonable belief that Cybulski had committed an offense. Because the officer had both a particularized suspicion to believe that Cybulski was DUI and probable cause for an arrest, Cybulski was lawfully under arrest at the time that she was removed from her car and handcuffed on the interstate and when asked to submit to a breath test, so her license was properly suspended. In re License Suspension of Cybulski, 2008 MT 128, 343 M 56, 183 P3d 39 (2008).

Search Incident to Conversation After Traffic Stop Concluded Considered Voluntary — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Officers stopped Merrill for investigation following an improper lane change. A license plate check showed that Merrill was not the vehicle owner. However, the vehicle was owned by a person suspected by one of the officers to be involved with dangerous drugs. The officer told Merrill that he was just giving her a verbal warning and that she was free to go. Stepping away from the vehicle, the officer noticed that Merrill seemed unusually nervous. Suspicious about the report regarding the vehicle owner, the officer again approached the vehicle and asked Merrill if he could talk to her. Merrill answered affirmatively. The officer then asked if he could search the vehicle. Merrill again answered affirmatively. Merrill stepped out of the car, and the officer asked if he could search her person, including her pockets. Merrill again answered affirmatively, and the officer discovered drugs in her pocket. Merrill contended that she had been unlawfully detained subsequent to an investigatory stop and that the evidence should be suppressed. The trial court concluded that the search was voluntary and denied the suppression motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Once the officer completed the investigation of the improper lane change, the investigatory stop was concluded and Merrill was free to leave. What followed was neither a subsequent investigatory stop nor an extension of the first stop, but rather a voluntary exchange, and nothing prevents an officer from engaging a citizen in a voluntary conversation. A purely voluntary conversation intrudes on no constitutionally protected interest, so Merrill was accorded no constitutional protection related to the search and seizure, and denial of the motion to suppress was appropriate. St. v. Merrill, 2004 MT 169, 322 M 47, 93 P3d 1227 (2004), followed in St. v. Hill, 2004 MT 184, 322 M 165, 94 P3d 752 (2004).

Legal Duty of Sheriff to Protect Domestic Violence Victim — Exception to Public Duty Doctrine Immunity Created Between Sheriff and Victim: Plaintiffs' mother was a domestic violence victim who was killed by her husband. Plaintiffs sued the County Sheriff for negligently failing to take action to protect the victim. A jury found the Sheriff negligent and awarded plaintiffs $358,000. The Sheriff moved for judgment as a matter of law, and the District Court granted the motion and vacated the jury verdict, finding that no special relationship existed between the victim and the Sheriff under the domestic violence statutes that would trigger a legal duty upon the Sheriff to protect the victim. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted an exception to the public duty doctrine's immunity provision in cases when a special relationship between the victim and an officer has been created. The domestic violence statutes created such a special relationship, which gave rise to a special duty by virtue of the victim's status as a member of a protected class. The Sheriff had a statutory duty to protect the victim with a notice of her rights under 46-6-602, and by failing to give the victim the required notice, the jury could conclude that the Sheriff was negligent and, arguably, negligent per se. Although arrest of the husband was discretionary, the Sheriff also had a mandatory duty under 46-6-603 to seize the husband's weapon, which had been displayed during a prior domestic dispute, but failed to do so. Thus, the jury had sufficient evidence to conclude that the Sheriff's negligence or negligent per se conduct led to the victim's death, and the District Court committed reversible error in granting judgment to the contrary. Massee v. Thompson, 2004 MT 121, 321 M 210, 90 P3d 394 (2004), following Nelson v. Driscoll, 1999 MT 193, 295 M 363, 983 P2d 972 (1999).

Preservation of Right to Argue Sufficient Evidence of Negligence on Appeal From Judgment as Matter of Law: Plaintiffs' mother was a domestic violence victim who was killed by her husband. Plaintiffs sued the County Sheriff for negligently failing to take action to protect the victim. A jury found for the plaintiffs. The Sheriff moved for judgment as a matter of law, and the District Court granted the motion and vacated the jury verdict, finding that the domestic violence statutes did not trigger mandatory legal duties upon the Sheriff regarding arrest and seizure. On appeal, the Sheriff argued that because plaintiffs did not specifically appeal from the District Court's refusal to instruct the jury that violations of the arrest and weapon seizure provisions of the domestic violence law were negligence per se, plaintiffs could not argue on appeal that evidence that the statutes were violated supported the verdict. The Supreme Court examined the definitions of common-law negligence and negligence per se, noting that the jury was given the full panoply of instructions on common-law negligence and that despite the fact that negligence per se instructions were not given, plaintiffs nevertheless argued that violation of the statutes was evidence of negligence. Pursuant to Nehring v. LaCounte, 219 M 462, 712 P2d 1329 (1986), even if a violation of a statute does not constitute negligence per se, the violation may nonetheless be considered as evidence of negligence. Because plaintiffs appealed from the judgment as a matter of law, they preserved their right to argue on appeal that the jury had before it sufficient evidence of negligence. Massee v. Thompson, 2004 MT 121, 321 M 210, 90 P3d 394 (2004).

Issues for Consideration in Petition for Review of Seizure of Driver's License: As established in Bush v. Dept. of Justice, 1998 MT 270, 291 M 359, 968 P2d 716 (1998), the three issues to be determined by a District Court in a petition for review of a seizure of a driver's license are whether: (1) the arresting officer had a particularized suspicion that a person was driving or in actual control of a vehicle on the ways of this state while under the influence of alcohol or drugs; (2) the petitioner was lawfully under arrest, including the existence of probable cause; and (3) the petitioner in fact declined to submit to a breath test. In this case, Widdicombe contested the first two determinations, but the Supreme Court affirmed. While leaving town on a two-lane highway, the arresting officer and another officer in the patrol car observed Widdicombe crossing the center lane three times, in violation of 61-8-321, and this fact was corroborated by videotape evidence. Thus, Widdicombe failed to meet the burden of proving a lack of particularized suspicion for the initial stop. Further, it was not necessary for the arresting officer to testify to probable cause when another officer witnessed the event and testified. Thus, Widdicombe failed to prove that the officers did not have probable cause for the arrest. Widdicombe v. State ex rel. LaFond, 2004 MT 49, 320 M 133, 85 P3d 1271 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Lafferty, 1998 MT 247, 291 M 157, 967 P2d 363 (1998).

Exigent Circumstances and Probable Cause Justifying Warrantless Entry Into Private Home — Motion to Suppress Evidence of Warrantless Search Properly Denied: In response to an urgent domestic violence 9-1-1 call from Saxton, officers arrived at Saxton's mobile home, but because they received no response to their calls and knocking, the officers entered the home to protect the lives of possible victims inside. Once inside, the officers discovered a marijuana growing operation and subsequently arrested Saxton on drug charges. Saxton moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the warrantless entry was unlawful, but the motion was denied, and Saxton appealed. The Supreme Court recognized the general rule that warrantless searches conducted inside a person's home are per se unreasonable, with few exceptions. Pursuant to St. v. Wakeford, 1998 MT 16, 287 M 220, 953 P2d 1065 (1998), one exception occurs when an officer concludes that there are exigent circumstances and probable cause to conduct the search, and in this case, exigent circumstances and probable cause justified entry into the home. It was reasonable for the responding officers to conclude that it was necessary to enter the home to discover and protect Saxton or other potentially incapacitated victims. Because entry was justified, the District Court did not err in denying Saxton's motion to suppress evidence obtained as a result of the search. St. v. Saxton, 2003 MT 105, 315 M 315, 68 P3d 721 (2003).

Defendant Present in Apartment Where Methamphetamine Lab Found — Totality of Circumstances Justifying Warrantless Arrest: Officers raided Savage's apartment, identified by an anonymous tip as a suspected methamphetamine laboratory. Nalder was also present, and although officers had no previous suspicions regarding Nalder, they arrested her after hearing a toilet running and observing her standing in the kitchen, which was adjacent to the bathroom, near what appeared to be a jar filled with a substance in the first stage of the methamphetamine-producing process. During an interview, Nalder admitted to flushing substances used to make methamphetamine down the toilet when she heard the officers announce themselves. Nalder was charged with tampering with physical evidence, but Nalder moved to suppress the statements and the charge on grounds that probable cause did not exist for her warrantless arrest. The motion was denied, and Nalder was convicted and appealed, contending error in denial of the motion to suppress based on certain findings that were allegedly incorrect. The Supreme Court affirmed. The trial court's finding that the officers announced their presence twice before entering the apartment, contrary to Nalder's claim that she did not hear any knocking, was supported by the evidence and not clearly erroneous because failure to hear did not constitute evidence contradicting the officers' testimony that they announced themselves. The trial court's finding that the officers broke down the door was not supported by substantial evidence and was thus erroneous, but the error was not prejudicial in light of the totality of the circumstances. Nalder correctly asserted that her mere presence at the scene did not justify arrest and that there must be some connection with criminal activity before her warrantless arrest was justified. However, considered in light of the totality of the circumstances and the trained officers' knowledge, there was sufficient probable cause for Nalder's arrest. The officers received extensive training in what to reasonably expect while raiding a methamphetamine laboratory, and evaluated in accordance with the officers' perceptions, they could reasonably believe that Nalder was committing, and had just committed, a crime. St. v. Nalder, 2001 MT 270, 307 M 280, 37 P3d 661 (2001).

Arrest and Detention for Nonjailable Offense Unreasonable Absent Circumstances to Justify Immediate Arrest: A Havre police officer responded to a 2:47 a.m. complaint that two people were "messing around with cars" and were running toward the post office, but no physical description was provided. While searching the post-office area, the officer noticed a person walking down the street. Upon seeing the police car, the person began running. Bauer was eventually found and arrested for minor in possession (MIP), second offense. During booking, Bauer was also found to be in possession of drugs, but moved to suppress on grounds that his arrest and detention for a nonjailable offense was an unlawful violation of the right to privacy, the right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure, and the right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The District Court concluded that the arrest was lawful because once the officer had probable cause to arrest, the right to detain was inherent. The Supreme Court disagreed, reversed, and suppressed the fruits of the search. When determining the reasonableness of a warrantless search, the state's interest must be balanced against the level of intrusion into an individual's privacy resulting from the search, and this analysis applies equally to the seizure of a person. Although this section gives officers the discretion to either arrest or issue a notice to appear, to be constitutional, the officer's exercise of that discretion must be reasonable, and in addition to probable cause, there must also be circumstances that require immediate arrest. It is unreasonable for an officer to effect an arrest and detention for a nonjailable offense when there are no circumstances to justify an immediate arrest, and a person stopped for such an offense should not be subjected to the indignity of an arrest and police station detention when a simple, nonintrusive notice to appear will serve the interests of law enforcement. Here, the officer knew that imprisonment was not a potential punishment for Bauer's second offense MIP, and there were no circumstances that required Bauer's immediate arrest, so Bauer should have been issued a notice to appear in lieu of arrest. St. v. Bauer, 2001 MT 248, 307 M 105, 36 P3d 892 (2001).

Public Duty Doctrine as Applied to Law Enforcement Personnel — Exception in Cases of Special Relationship: Trina admitted that she had been drinking when stopped in her vehicle by Officer Driscoll, who nevertheless believed that sufficient probable cause did not exist to arrest the woman. Instead, thinking Trina might be impaired, the officer suggested a ride home or that Trina walk the 2-mile distance and warned Trina about returning to the vehicle. Trina decided instead to walk to a phone and call for a ride and was killed in traffic. Trina's husband brought suit for civil damages under 42 U.S.C. 1983, claiming that the officer breached the duty to protect, in violation of Trina's due process rights. The District Court summarily dismissed the claim, holding that because no probable cause existed for Trina's arrest, the officer had no duty to protect Trina from harm and that without a duty, the action failed. The public duty doctrine provides that a police officer's duty to protect and preserve the peace is owed to the public at large rather than to a particular person, unless a special relationship exists, thus giving rise to a special duty that is more particular than that owed to the public. A special relationship is established: (1) by a statute intended to protect a specific class of persons, of which the plaintiff is a member, from a particular type of harm; (2) when a government agent undertakes specific action to protect a person or property; (3) by governmental actions that reasonably induce detrimental reliance by a member of the public; and (4) under certain circumstances when the agency has actual custody of the plaintiff or of a third person who harms the plaintiff. Relying on Stewart v. Standard Publishing Co., 102 M 43, 55 P2d 694 (1936), the Supreme Court agreed that although the officer may not have initially owed Trina a duty to protect, that duty was assumed as a matter of law when the officer prevented the woman from driving her car and ensured that she did not attempt to drive. The question of whether the duty to protect was breached is a question of fact for the jury, so summary dismissal was improper. Nelson v. Driscoll, 1999 MT 193, 295 M 363, 983 P2d 972, 56 St. Rep. 744 (1999), clarifying and distinguishing Phillips v. Billings, 233 M 249, 758 P2d 772 (1988), and followed in Massee v. Thompson, 2004 MT 121, 321 M 210, 90 P3d 394 (2004). Nelson was followed, as to elements of exception to the public duty doctrine (nonlaw enforcement case), in Orr v. St., 2004 MT 354, 324 M 391, 106 P3d 100 (2004), and Prosser v. Kennedy Enterprises, Inc., 2008 MT 87, 342 M 209, 179 P3d 1178 (2008). See also Krieg v. Massey, 239 M 469, 781 P2d 277, 46 St. Rep. 1839 (1989), and Busta v. Columbus Hosp. Corp., 276 M 342, 916 P2d 122 (1996).

City Police Officer Making Arrest Outside Territorial Jurisdiction — Probable Cause Required: A city police officer, investigating a phone call reporting a suspected drunk driver, pursued Williamson outside city limits and arrested him, although the officer observed no erratic driving or other indicators of alcohol impairment prior to stopping Williamson's truck. Williamson moved to suppress all the evidence on the basis that the officer did not have probable cause to make the stop, contending that probable cause was necessary because the officer was acting outside his territorial jurisdiction as a city police officer and that the information within the officer's knowledge at the time of the stop did not rise to the level of probable cause. Williamson's motion was denied. Clarifying the difference between the probable cause necessary to effectuate a valid arrest and the particularized suspicion necessary to justify an investigative stop, the Supreme Court noted that although an officer ordinarily needs only a particularized suspicion for a traffic stop, under these circumstances, the officer was outside his jurisdiction when the stop was made and was thus not acting within the scope of his authority as a peace officer. The criminal procedures in 46-5-401 and this section were not available to the officer. Rather, as a peace officer acting outside his territorial jurisdiction, his authority was limited to that provided to private citizens under 46-6-502, so probable cause was required. The citizen informant's telephone report was not sufficient to establish probable cause because the relayed report was devoid of information as to why the informant believed that Williamson was intoxicated and the officer did not inquire into the basis of the report before stopping Williamson's truck. The report created, at most, a suspicion that an offense was being committed, but that suspicion alone was insufficient to establish probable cause. Even if the informant had sufficient information to establish probable cause for a citizen's arrest of Williamson, that information was not relayed to the officer, who thus did not possess sufficient information to make the stop. The judgment was reversed because the District Court erred in refusing to suppress the evidence. St. v. Williamson, 1998 MT 199, 290 M 321, 965 P2d 231, 55 St. Rep. 843 (1998), distinguishing St. v. Schoffner, 248 M 260, 811 P2d 548 (1991), and followed in St. v. Reiner, 2003 MT 243, 317 M 304, 77 P3d 210 (2003), and St. v. Ellington, 2006 MT 219, 333 M 411, 143 P3d 119 (2006).

Motor Vehicle Stop of Intoxicated Defendant — Justifiable Apprehension of Harm: Officer Mantooth stopped a car fitting the radio description of a vehicle and, upon looking inside, saw an apparently drunken male passenger leaning over with his arms between his legs as if hiding something and saw an empty holster between the driver and passenger. After a scuffle, Hagberg was charged by information with felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and misdemeanor resisting arrest. The Supreme Court affirmed the holding of the District Court that Officer Mantooth's affidavit supporting the motion for leave to file the information was sufficient, noting that it was not necessary for Officer Mantooth to have personally observed a gun in order to be apprehensive about his safety. The Supreme Court also held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion by denying Hagberg's motion to dismiss because of an unlawful arrest. Because Officer Mantooth was in apprehension for his safety, a felony had been committed and Mantooth was justified in making the arrest. St. v. Hagberg, 277 M 33, 920 P2d 86, 53 St. Rep. 528 (1996).

Plain View Doctrine Justifying Seizure of Contraband Pipe During Stop and Frisk Search for Weapons: After Stubbs was stopped on a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity, including speeding, reckless or careless driving, and eluding a peace officer, the officer noticed numerous weapons in the vehicle, providing a reasonable justification for searching Stubbs on the scene. During a pat-down search of Stubbs' clothing, the officer thought that a lump in Stubbs' pocket might be a deadly weapon. After removing the item to make sure that it was not a weapon, the item was in plain view and the incriminating character of the object, a brass pipe, was apparent. Absent any indication that the search was used as a pretext to discover illicit drugs or paraphernalia, the discovery of the pipe was inadvertent and seizure of the contraband was justified. St. v. Stubbs, 270 M 364, 892 P2d 547, 52 St. Rep. 232 (1995), overruled in part in St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996).

Arrest Without Written Authority — Suppression of Evidence: An arrest by a Montana law enforcement officer for violation of the terms of probation must be in accordance with 46-23-1012. The police officer arrested the probationer in violation of 46-23-1012 when the arrest was for a probation violation and the police officer did not have written authority to arrest from the probation officer. Assuming that probation violation is a criminal offense and that the police officer had probable cause to arrest for violation of probation, the arrest was not proper under this section because existing circumstances did not require an immediate arrest. The gun seized in defendant's bedroom after the arrest was suppressed as evidence in the federal prosecution for violation of 18 U.S.C. 922(g)(1), which prohibits possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. U.S. v. Shepard, 21 F3d 933 (9th Cir. 1994).

Plain View Doctrine Justifying Seizure of Contraband Pipe During Stop and Frisk Search for Weapons: After Stubbs was stopped on a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity, including speeding, reckless or careless driving, and eluding a peace officer, the officer noticed numerous weapons in the vehicle, providing a reasonable justification for searching Stubbs on the scene. During a pat-down search of Stubbs' clothing, the officer thought that a lump in Stubbs' pocket might be a deadly weapon. After removing the item to make sure that it was not a weapon, the item was in plain view and the incriminating character of the object, a brass pipe, was apparent. Absent any indication that the search was used as a pretext to discover illicit drugs or paraphernalia, the discovery of the pipe was inadvertent and seizure of the contraband was justified. St. v. Stubbs, 270 M 364, 892 P2d 547, 52 St. Rep. 232 (1995), overruled in part in St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996).

Arrest by Peace Officer Outside Officer's Jurisdiction — Applicability of Driving Under the Influence Implied Consent Law: A peace officer is by statute "any person who by virtue of the person's office or public employment is vested by law with a duty to maintain public order and make arrests for offenses while acting within the scope of the person's authority". Though a city police officer's authority did not extend beyond the city limits and his arrest of a driver beyond the city limits for being under the influence could only be a citizen's arrest, he was within the definition of a peace officer even when outside the geographical area in which he had jurisdiction because he was at the time of the arrest a peace officer in fact and by virtue of holding the particular job. Therefore, the implied consent law applied even though it refers to a person "arrested by a peace officer". Maney v. St., 255 M 270, 842 P2d 704, 49 St. Rep. 980 (1992).

Attorney General's Opinions

Authority to Enact Ordinances Regulating Breach of Peace: Section 7-32-4302 authorizes but does not require that a city or town council adopt ordinances to prevent acts or conduct calculated to disturb the public peace. In situations in which this authority has not been exercised, a city or town police officer acting within the officer's territorial jurisdiction may arrest a person for the violation of a state law prohibiting offenses against the public order. 45 A.G. Op. 9 (1993).

46-6-312. Manner of arrest without warrant.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-6-106. The statute preserves the requirements of informing the individual of the officer's authority, the officer's intention to make an arrest, and the officer's reason for arresting the individual. Previous exceptions to this general rule have also been preserved.

The instances in which a private person may make an arrest without a warrant have been preserved. See 46-6-502. The Commission felt that a private person should not be held to the strict requirements that a peace officer must follow. When a peace officer finally does take custody of the defendant, however, the officer must inform the defendant of those matters stated in this statute.

Rules 212(a) and 212(e) of the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure contain requirements similar to those specified in the statute. The uniform rules were not used as models for the statute.

The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure have no similar requirement.

Source: A.L.I., sections 25 and 26.

This section establishes the standard for an arrest made by either a private person or a peace officer without an arrest warrant. Although the language is different than the present Montana law the results should be the same. The language was used to maintain uniformity with the prior section and to clarify the present law. Both [46-6-216 and 46-6-312] require the person making the arrest to state (1) his authority, (2) his intention to arrest the accused, and (3) the cause of the arrest.

These two sections are a restatement of the existing law and practice in Montana. The language of the sections anticipates that the officer shall give appropriate notice of the three items before the arrest, either with or without a warrant, but the Montana court has recognized, in case law, the exceptions stated in this section. (See State v. Gay, 18 Mont. 51, and State v. Bradshaw, 53 Mont. 96.) In Altizer v. State (Okla.), 206 P. 1106, 1108 the court stated: "From the foregoing provisions it is seen that the first duty of an officer in attempting to make an arrest without a warrant (where the arrested person is not arrested during the actual commission of the offense or has escaped and is immediately pursued) is to inform the person to be arrested of his authority in so acting and the cause for so acting. If this simple provision of the section were more closely observed by arresting officers (as it should be), we are convinced that there would be much less trouble in making arrests without a warrant."

Warrantless Arrest — No Warrant Necessary Prior to Search: After an arrest properly made under this section, a person may be searched without a search warrant prior to placement in a police holding cell. Billings v. Skurdal, 224 M 84, 730 P2d 371, 43 St. Rep. 2036 (1986).

Probable Cause to Make Warrantless Entry and Arrest: The Supreme Court cautioned that arrest and search warrants should be used as the rule and not the exception but that sufficient exigent circumstances existed here, especially due to the involvement of juveniles, to justify the warrantless entry and arrest. St. v. Allen, 188 M 135, 612 P2d 199 (1980), following St. v. Hull, 158 M 6, 487 P2d 1314 (1971); St. v. Bennett, 158 M 496, 493 P2d 1077 (1972); St. v. Means, 177 M 193, 581 P2d 406 (1978).

Validity of Warrantless Arrest: A warrantless arrest was valid under section 95-608(d), R.C.M. 1947 (now part of 46-6-210). St. v. Bennett, 158 M 496, 493 P2d 1077 (1972).

Exception to Duty to Inform: When the officer is well known to those whom he seeks to arrest and when those parties, instead of surrendering as directed by the officer, immediately prepare to fire upon him, the ceremony of disclosing the official character of the officer and the reason for the arrest is voluntarily dispensed with by the parties to be arrested. St. v. Gay, 18 M 51, 44 P 411 (1896).

46-6-313. Release.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an adaptation of 1987 MCA 46-6-403. The Commission considered recommending that the prosecuting attorney, as well as the peace officer with custody, may order the defendant released but eventually rejected the recommendation as unnecessary. If the prosecutor declines to file charges, the appropriate officer should be directed to release the arrested person.

This statute embodies what the 1967 Commission referred to as the "station adjustment doctrine". The 1967 Commission also noted that the "right of release does not excuse or free from civil responsibility, an officer who has made an illegal arrest". This holds true under the 1987 statute. The release of the defendant at this phase, however, does not preclude the prosecution from pursuing the charges at a later date.

Apparently the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and the federal statutes do not provide for such a release. Rule 244 of the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure is similar to this statute and does contemplate some input from the prosecuting attorney. See Rule 244(a)(2), Unif. R. Crim. P.

This statute should create no substantive change in the law but merely reflects established procedure.

This section enunciates the "station adjustment" doctrine of release by an officer who has made a legal arrest without a warrant but subsequently determines from investigation that there is insufficient evidence for proceeding further with the criminal charge. This right of release does not excuse or free from civil responsibility, an officer who has made an illegal arrest.

Part 4
Arrest by a Peace Officer

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: There are occasions when a peace officer will either require assistance or be assisting in the arrest of a suspected criminal offender. The statutes governing the conduct of an officer or citizen on these occasions are provided in this part.

Neither the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure nor the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure have provisions concerning assisting in an arrest.

46-6-402. Assisting a peace officer.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-6-402. Under this statute, a peace officer may command a private person to assist in making an arrest. Upon receiving such a command, the private person has the same authority as a peace officer and is protected from any civil liability that may result from his actions.

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, section 107-8.

The section allows a police officer to summon assistance. Nearly all arrests today are made by police officers and they may, at times, need assistance from a private citizen. It was not deemed essential to give a private person the authority to summon assistance. A private person seldom makes an arrest and if the suspect is dangerous the person should summon the police, not other private persons. Also, problems would arise if a private person attempted to make an arrest without probable cause and summoned assistance from other private persons. The problem would arise with the civil immunity offered in the section.

Subdivisions [(1) and (2)] clarify the problems of the assistant's authority and civil liability. Subdivision [(1)] establishes a minimum age requirement for those persons (males) required to render assistance. The proposed section would have statewide application in that it applies to all officers and citizens regardless of the fact that the officer is making the arrest outside of his own municipality or county.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute preserves the Uniform Act on Close Pursuit, which was codified as 1987 MCA 46-6-411. The statute recognizes that the term "state" includes the District of Columbia. Rather than provide a special definition for this statute, which would not comply with the concept of a general definition provision, the District of Columbia is included in the body of the statute. This minor change should not change the law or established procedure.

Case Notes

Arrest Outside City Limits by City Police Absent Local Ordinance — Arrest Lawful in Capacity as Private Citizen: The city of Eureka never enacted an ordinance giving city police jurisdiction outside the city limits pursuant to 7-32-4301, and defendant contended that his arrest for DUI and hit-and-run made 0.8 mile outside Eureka was therefore illegal and that all evidence resulting from the arrest was inadmissible. The Supreme Court found that by enacting 7-32-4301 (authorizing city police arrests within 5 miles of town), 46-6-502 (authorizing arrests by private citizens), and 46-6-411 (authorizing out-of-state officers in close pursuit to make arrests in Montana), it is clear that Montana no longer adheres to the common-law rule strictly prohibiting arrests outside an officer's jurisdiction. A police officer outside his jurisdiction has not lost his characteristics of being a private citizen; therefore, if an arrest by a private citizen would be lawful under the circumstances, the arrest by an officer outside his jurisdiction would be lawful. St. v. McDole, 226 M 169, 734 P2d 683, 44 St. Rep. 561 (1987), followed in St. v. Williamson, 1998 MT 199, 290 M 321, 965 P2d 231, 55 St. Rep. 843 (1998).

Part 5
Arrest by a Private Person

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: This part embodies the principal rules establishing authority for a private person to arrest another. The 1987 provisions that established special rules for an arrest by a merchant were not retained. The Commission's objective of providing generally applicable rules of criminal procedure would not support such provisions. The Commission acknowledged that the Legislature has the prerogative to enact such statutes but suggested that such statutes were not appropriate or needed.

Part Case Notes

Concealment Alone Not Probable Cause for Arrest: Although concealment, as defined in 46-6-501 (now repealed), contains the basic elements of theft (deception and intent to deprive), it has a limited meaning applying to Title 46, ch. 6, part 5, authorizing a merchant to search a suspected shoplifter. Thus, prima facie evidence of concealment does not alone provide, as a matter of law, probable cause for arrest, but probable cause may be the result of such a search or it may exist prior to such a search. 46-6-502. Arrest by private person.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute establishes the general authorization for an arrest by a private person and provides the appropriate limitations on custody. The 1987 code section was similar, but if the offense had not been committed in the person's presence, the offense had to be a felony before a private arrest could be made. See 1987 MCA 46-6-502(2). This statute eliminates the felony-misdemeanor distinction but provides that the "circumstances require the person's immediate arrest". The provisions allowing a warrantless arrest by a police officer or by a private citizen are kept distinct but parallel.

Commission Comment Not Divided: This section is a recodification of part of section 95-611, R.C.M. 1947. Section 46-6-503 (now repealed) is also derived from section 95-611. The commission comments to section 95-611 are printed in their entirety under 46-6-502.

Source: R.C.M. 1947, section 94-6004.

This modifies the present Montana law by restricting the power of a private person to arrest to the two situations stated above. The section deleted subdivision (2) of R.C.M. 1947, section 94-6004 which allowed a private person to arrest for a felony not committed in his presence. Under the deleted subdivision a private person could make a legal arrest without probable cause by showing the person arrested had committed a felony. This would supposedly allow arrest without proof of probable cause.

The word "offense" used in subsection [(1)] is broad enough to allow a citizen to arrest for misdemeanors and ordinance violations as well as felonies committed in his presence.

The consensus of the commission was that modern law enforcement requires that most arrests be made by police officers and the right of private persons to arrest should be strictly limited.

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 332 in (1) inserted second sentence allowing a private person the use of reasonable force to detain the arrested person; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 27, 2009.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 332, L. 2009, provided: "WHEREAS, the Legislature declares that:

(1) the right of Montanans to defend their lives and liberties, as provided in Article II, section 3, of the Montana Constitution, and their right to keep or bear arms in defense of their homes, persons, and property, as provided in Article II, section 12, of the Montana Constitution, are fundamental and may not be called into question;

(2) the use of firearms for self-defense is recognized within the right reserved to the individual people of Montana in Article II, section 12, of the Montana Constitution;

(3) self-defense is a natural right under section 1-2-104, MCA, and is included in sections 49-1-101 and 49-1-103, MCA;

(4) the lawful use of firearms for self-defense is not a crime or an offense against the people of the state;

(5) in a criminal case in which self-defense is asserted, the burden of proof is as provided in [section 10] [actually section 9, Ch. 332, L. 2009, enacting 46-16-131];

(6) in self-defense, the use of justifiable force discourages violent crime and prevents victimization; and

(7) the purpose of [sections 1 through 3] [enacting 45-3-110 through 45-3-112] is to clarify and secure the ability of the people to protect themselves."

1991 Amendment: Substituted present language regarding arrest by private person for former text that read: "A private person may arrest another when:

(1) he believes on reasonable grounds that an offense is begin committed or attempted in his presence;

(2) a felony has in fact been committed and he believes on reasonable grounds that the person arrested has committed it; or

(3) he is a merchant, as defined in 30-11-301, and has probable cause to believe the other is shoplifting in the merchant's store".

Scope of Commission Comments: The commission comments do not address the provisions of subsection (3) added by amendment in 1974.

Case Notes

Insufficient Probable Cause for Citizen Arrest — Suppression of Evidence Proper: At the visitor center at Malmstrom Air Force Base, security officers smelled alcohol on May's breath when May sought to enter the base. Because May was a civilian, the officers believed that May could be detained but not arrested, so they held May's driver's license, registration, and proof of insurance, and May was told to wait until a highway patrol officer arrived. May was subsequently arrested for DUI and at trial asked the District Court to suppress evidence from the arrest on grounds that the arrest was not based on probable cause and was thus illegal. Following denial of the suppression motions and conviction, May appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Applying the test in St. v. Widenhofer, 286 M 341, 950 P2d 1383 (1997), the court determined that May's detention constituted a citizen arrest. The test for probable cause for a citizen arrest is whether a reasonable person, under personally known facts and circumstances, is warranted in believing that someone is committing or has committed an offense. Here, the security officers' sole basis for detaining May was the smell of alcohol, but the odor of alcohol emanating from May's person, standing alone, was insufficient to establish probable cause for a citizen arrest. Thus, the arrest was illegal, and evidence related to the arrest should have been suppressed. St. v. May, 2004 MT 45, 320 M 116, 86 P3d 42 (2004).

Authority for Arresting Out-of-Jurisdiction Peace Officer to Act Following Arrival of Officer With Jurisdiction: When a Belgrade police officer stopped a motorcyclist in Bozeman after observing erratic driving and after the stop observed behavior indicative of intoxication, he was acting within his authority as a private citizen under this section. However, when the Bozeman police, whom he had contacted, arrived, the Belgrade officer's authority to act as a private citizen under this section ceased and his performance of tests on the driver, placing him under arrest, transporting him to the jail, requests for a breath test, and writing of a citation, all in the absence of exigent circumstances, exceeded his citizen arrest authority under this section. Thus, the evidence obtained after the Bozeman police arrived was illegally obtained and must be suppressed in the DUI prosecution. To the extent that Maney v. St., 255 M 270, 842 P2d 704 (1992), suggests a contrary result, it is overruled. St. v. Hendrickson, 283 M 105, 939 P2d 985, 54 St. Rep. 516 (1997).

Arrest by Peace Officer Outside Officer's Jurisdiction — Applicability of Driving Under the Influence Implied Consent Law: A peace officer is by statute "any person who by virtue of the person's office or public employment is vested by law with a duty to maintain public order and make arrests for offenses while acting within the scope of the person's authority". Though a city police officer's authority did not extend beyond the city limits and his arrest of a driver beyond the city limits for being under the influence could only be a citizen's arrest, he was within the definition of a peace officer even when outside the geographical area in which he had jurisdiction because he was at the time of the arrest a peace officer in fact and by virtue of holding the particular job. Therefore, the implied consent law applied even though it refers to a person "arrested by a peace officer". Maney v. St., 255 M 270, 842 P2d 704, 49 St. Rep. 980 (1992), partially overruled in St. v. Hendrickson, 283 M 105, 939 P2d 985, 54 St. Rep. 516 (1997).

Lack of Formal Custody Transfer by Police Officer Outside Officer's Jurisdiction: Police officer followed beyond the Chinook city limits a vehicle he believed was driven by a person with a revoked license. He radioed for backup and stopped the vehicle after noticing it was moving slowly and erratically. The driver's breath smelled of alcohol, and after field sobriety maneuvers, the police officer and a Deputy Sheriff who had arrived agreed that the driver was impaired. The police officer then arrested the driver and delivered him to the Sheriff's office in Chinook. The police officer did not have to formally transfer custody to the Deputy Sheriff for the police officer's citizen's arrest to be legal. Maney v. St., 255 M 270, 842 P2d 704, 49 St. Rep. 980 (1992), partially overruled in St. v. Hendrickson, 283 M 105, 939 P2d 985, 54 St. Rep. 516 (1997).

Arrest Outside City Limits by City Police Absent Local Ordinance — Arrest Lawful in Capacity as Private Citizen: The city of Eureka never enacted an ordinance giving city police jurisdiction outside the city limits pursuant to 7-32-4301, and defendant contended that his arrest for DUI and hit-and-run made 0.8 mile outside Eureka was therefore illegal and that all evidence resulting from the arrest was inadmissible. The Supreme Court found that by enacting 7-32-4301 (authorizing city police arrests within 5 miles of town), 46-6-502 (authorizing arrests by private citizens), and 46-6-411 (authorizing out-of-state officers in close pursuit to make arrests in Montana), it is clear that Montana no longer adheres to the common-law rule strictly prohibiting arrests outside an officer's jurisdiction. A police officer outside his jurisdiction has not lost his characteristics of being a private citizen; therefore, if an arrest by a private citizen would be lawful under the circumstances, the arrest by an officer outside his jurisdiction would be lawful. St. v. McDole, 226 M 169, 734 P2d 683, 44 St. Rep. 561 (1987), followed in St. v. Sunford, 244 M 411, 796 P2d 1084, 47 St. Rep. 1684 (1990), and St. v. Williamson, 1998 MT 199, 290 M 321, 965 P2d 231, 55 St. Rep. 843 (1998).

Authority of Auxiliary Officer: The Lemmons were divorced after 20 years of marriage. Leroy was seeing Donna Myers, and Koralyn was seeing John Sweeting. Myers and Sweeting had just ended a personal and business relationship. Sweeting asked Koralyn to get a briefcase out of Leroy's truck. The briefcase actually belonged to Myers. Leroy and Myers returned to the truck and found the briefcase missing. They concluded Koralyn had taken it since the truck was not broken into. Leroy and Myers went to Koralyn's home. She heard them drive up and put a gun in the waistband of her pants. Leroy and Koralyn fought, and Leroy struck her in the head with the gun. Leroy and Myers put Koralyn on the floor of the truck and went to the Sheriff's department. The Sheriff was not immediately available, so Leroy and Myers left, with Koralyn still on the floor of the truck, to find Sweeting. A high speed chase ensued in which the cars rammed together and gunshots were exchanged. The chase ended when Leroy's transmission caught fire. The charges arising from the pursuit were dropped. Leroy was charged with aggravated assault and kidnapping. He was convicted of assault and unlawful restraint. Leroy contended his conduct was authorized by statute since he is a member of the county Sheriff's posse and was making an arrest. The court held membership in the posse merely made him an auxiliary officer. He had only the arrest authority of a private person. No offense was committed in his presence, no felony was committed, and he is not a merchant. He had neither authority to arrest Koralyn nor reason to believe he did. St. v. Lemmon, 214 M 121, 692 P2d 455, 41 St. Rep. 2359 (1984).

Concealment Alone Not Probable Cause for Arrest: Although concealment, as defined in 46-6-501 (now repealed), contains the basic elements of theft (deception and intent to deprive), it has a limited meaning applying to Title 46, ch. 6, part 5, authorizing a merchant to search a suspected shoplifter. Thus, prima facie evidence of concealment does not alone provide, as a matter of law, probable cause for arrest, but probable cause may be the result of such a search or it may exist prior to such a search. Vogel v. Gibson's Discount Centers, 209 M 518, 681 P2d 40, 41 St. Rep. 874 (1984).

Compulsion to Remain — Not Unlawful Restraint: Plaintiff, a new employee of defendant, was accused by a fellow employee of taking a watch. The assistant manager, while ostensibly giving plaintiff a tour of the store, took her to an office where store personnel and the police were present. Plaintiff was confronted with the charge and denied it. Plaintiff agreed to a lie detector test. The meeting lasted from 20 to 45 minutes. The lie detector test vindicated plaintiff. While plaintiff stated she felt compelled to remain in the office, there was no evidence she was restrained against her will. There was substantial evidence to support the judgment for defendants. Hardy v. LaBelle's Distrib. Co., 203 M 263, 661 P2d 35, 40 St. Rep. 436 (1983).

Criminal Dismissal Conditioned on Not Suing Anyone but Supermarket That Arrested Plaintiff — Civil Summary Judgment Granted Supermarket: After apprehension by defendant's employee and subsequent arrest by the Sheriff's department, the plaintiff and County Attorney bargained a dismissal conditioned on the plaintiff's execution of a covenant not to sue the Sheriff, county, police, or city. The covenant not to sue contained a clause reserving plaintiff's right to sue defendant. A summary judgment was granted defendant on assault, false arrest, and false imprisonment because the defendant's actions may have been acceptable under this section if there were probable cause, which is usually evidenced by the ordinary processes of law that were foreclosed to the defendant by the agreement in this case. Plaintiff was denied all relief. Brothers v. Rosauer's Supermarkets, Inc., 545 F. Supp. 1041, 39 St. Rep. 1758 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Detaining Suspected Shoplifter Without Arrest — Unconstitutional: The plaintiff was accused of shoplifting by the defendant's employee. Plaintiff's purse was searched and nothing was found. Plaintiff was then detained under the authority of 46-6-503 (now repealed) until the police arrived and arrested her. After being acquitted of the shoplifting charge, the plaintiff brought suit for false arrest. The trial court instructed the jury in the words of 46-6-503 (now repealed) over plaintiff's objection. On appeal, the Supreme Court said there must be a showing of compelling state interest which would justify the infringement of plaintiff's right to privacy. The mere fact that defendant's conduct comported with the merchant's detention statute does not establish a compelling state interest. No compelling state interest was shown which would justify the very serious invasion of a person's privacy which occurred. Insofar as 46-6-503 (now repealed) permits a merchant with immunity to stop and detain an individual for up to 30 minutes without making an arrest, it is an unconstitutional invasion of the right to privacy and the right to be secure from unreasonable searches and seizures guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 10 and 11, Mont. Const. Duran v. Buttrey Foods, Inc., 189 M 381, 616 P2d 327 (1980).

Determining Lawfulness of Arrest: While the legality of an arrest by a private person without a warrant cannot depend upon what is found in the possession of the person arrested, the fact that his belief that a crime was being committed is found to be correct accredits the belief and gives weight to the evidence upon which he acted. A liberal rather than a strict interpretation should be followed; if he acted in good faith and the facts and circumstances were such as to warrant a man of prudence and caution in believing as he did when making the arrest, it should be held lawful. St. v. Hum Quock, 89 M 503, 300 P 220 (1931).

Authority to Arrest Limited: The authority of a private person to make an arrest without a warrant is more limited than that of an officer to make a like arrest. State ex rel. Sadler v. District Court, 70 M 378, 225 P 1000 (1924).

Degree of Probable Cause Required: To entitle a private person to make an arrest for a public offense committed or attempted in his presence, the facts and circumstances must be such that upon them alone he would be justified in making a complaint upon which a warrant might issue. State ex rel. Sadler v. District Court, 70 M 378, 225 P 1000 (1924).

False Imprisonment: In an action for false imprisonment, it was proper to refuse the defendant an instruction to the effect that the law gives a private person the right to make an arrest when the person arrested has committed or is about to commit a public offense in his presence and that, if the jury believes that the plaintiff had taken from the defendant property of the latter which the defendant was attempting to recover at the time of the alleged imprisonment, the verdict should be for the defendant. Kroeger v. Passmore, 36 M 504, 93 P 805 (1908).

1995 Amendment: Chapter 350 near beginning of first sentence substituted "partner or family member assault" for "domestic abuse", after "45-5-206" substituted "or responds to a call in which partner or family member assault is suspected" for "if the victim is present", and after "officer" inserted "outside the presence of the offender"; and substituted language to be included in statement of victim's rights (see 1995 Session Law for text) for former statement language that read: ""IF YOU ARE THE VICTIM OF DOMESTIC ABUSE, the county attorney's office can file criminal charges against your abuser. You have the right to go to court and file a petition requesting any of the following orders for relief:

(1) an order restraining your abuser from abusing you;

(2) an order directing your abuser to leave your household;

(3) an order preventing your abuser from transferring any property except in the usual course of business;

(4) an order awarding you or the other parent custody of or visitation with a minor child or children;

(5) an order restraining your abuser from molesting or interfering with minor children in your custody or a family member or partner, as defined in 45-5-206; or

Case Notes

Legal Duty of Sheriff to Protect Domestic Violence Victim — Exception to Public Duty Doctrine Immunity Created Between Sheriff and Victim: Plaintiffs' mother was a domestic violence victim who was killed by her husband. Plaintiffs sued the County Sheriff for negligently failing to take action to protect the victim. A jury found the Sheriff negligent and awarded plaintiffs $358,000. The Sheriff moved for judgment as a matter of law, and the District Court granted the motion and vacated the jury verdict, finding that no special relationship existed between the victim and the Sheriff under the domestic violence statutes that would trigger a legal duty upon the Sheriff to protect the victim. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted an exception to the public duty doctrine's immunity provision in cases when a special relationship between the victim and an officer has been created. The domestic violence statutes created such a special relationship, which gave rise to a special duty by virtue of the victim's status as a member of a protected class. The Sheriff had a statutory duty to protect the victim with a notice of her rights under this section, and by failing to give the victim the required notice, the jury could conclude that the Sheriff was negligent and, arguably, negligent per se. Although arrest of the husband was discretionary, the Sheriff also had a mandatory duty under 46-6-603 to seize the husband's weapon, which had been displayed during a prior domestic dispute, but failed to do so. Thus, the jury had sufficient evidence to conclude that the Sheriff's negligence or negligent per se conduct led to the victim's death, and the District Court committed reversible error in granting judgment to the contrary. Massee v. Thompson, 2004 MT 121, 321 M 210, 90 P3d 394 (2004), following Nelson v. Driscoll, 1999 MT 193, 295 M 363, 983 P2d 972 (1999).

Preservation of Right to Argue Sufficient Evidence of Negligence on Appeal From Judgment as Matter of Law: Plaintiffs' mother was a domestic violence victim who was killed by her husband. Plaintiffs sued the County Sheriff for negligently failing to take action to protect the victim. A jury found for the plaintiffs. The Sheriff moved for judgment as a matter of law, and the District Court granted the motion and vacated the jury verdict, finding that the domestic violence statutes did not trigger mandatory legal duties upon the Sheriff regarding arrest and seizure. On appeal, the Sheriff argued that because plaintiffs did not specifically appeal from the District Court's refusal to instruct the jury that violations of the arrest and weapon seizure provisions of the domestic violence law were negligence per se, plaintiffs could not argue on appeal that evidence that the statutes were violated supported the verdict. The Supreme Court examined the definitions of common-law negligence and negligence per se, noting that the jury was given the full panoply of instructions on common-law negligence and that despite the fact that negligence per se instructions were not given, plaintiffs nevertheless argued that violation of the statutes was evidence of negligence. Pursuant to Nehring v. LaCounte, 219 M 462, 712 P2d 1329 (1986), even if a violation of a statute does not constitute negligence per se, the violation may nonetheless be considered as evidence of negligence. Because plaintiffs appealed from the judgment as a matter of law, they preserved their right to argue on appeal that the jury had before it sufficient evidence of negligence. Massee v. Thompson, 2004 MT 121, 321 M 210, 90 P3d 394 (2004).

CHAPTER 7
INITIAL APPEARANCE OF ARRESTED PERSON

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

Part 1
General Provisions

46-7-101. Appearance of arrested person — use of two-way electronic audio-video communication.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: Following arrest, each defendant is entitled to an initial appearance before a judge without unnecessary delay. See St. v. Benbo, 174 Mont. 252 (1977). This basic principle was recognized in 1987 MCA 46-7-101 and is preserved in the statute. The language of the statute has been revised to simplify the process. [Subsection (2) was inserted by Ch. 710, L. 1991, and was not proposed by the Commission.]

Source: R.C.M. 1947, sections 94-6014 through 94-6016; Illinois Code, [Chapter] 38, section 109-1; A.L.I., section 7.

This provision includes the requirement of an appearance before a magistrate without unnecessary delay after arrest in cases of arrest with a warrant.

It is the commission's intention to limit the return, where no warrant is issued, to one before a justice of the peace or district court judge. This should afford greater protection to the defendant as well as the state. This section allows a first appearance in the county where the arrest is made rather than forcing the arrested person to be removed to another county for the purpose of stating the charge and setting bail.

Subsection [(2)] is approximately the same as the present code requirements as to substance although it does not provide for the delivery of an arrested person to a peace officer as an alternative to appearance before a judge by the person making the arrest. It would seem that while the private person making the arrest may summon police assistance and the arrested person would proceed to the judge under the custody and control of the police officer it is reasonable to require the private arresting person to accompany the peace officer to the judge and assist in making the complaint.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

1991 Amendments: Chapter 710 inserted (2) allowing satisfaction of requirement of initial appearance of defendant by two-way electronic audio-video communication; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 800 substituted present language concerning taking arrested person before judge for initial appearance for former text that read: "(1) Any person making an arrest under a warrant shall take the arrested person without unnecessary delay before the judge issuing the warrant or, if he is absent or unable to act, before the nearest or most accessible judge of the same county. If an arrest is made in a county other than the one in which the warrant was issued, the arrested person shall be taken without unnecessary delay before the nearest and most accessible judge in the county where the arrest was made.

(2) Any person making an arrest without a warrant shall take the arrested person without unnecessary delay before the nearest or most accessible judge in the same county, and a complaint stating the charges against the arrested person shall be filed forthwith".

Case Notes

No Error in Thirty-Three-Day Delay in Municipal Court Appearance: Peterson appealed the District Court's affirmation of a Municipal Court decision denying Peterson's motion to dismiss a DUI and careless driving case because of a 33-day delay in Peterson's initial Municipal Court appearance. The Supreme Court held that the delay was acceptable under this section, given that Peterson was not incarcerated and did not assert any impairment of a defense because of the delay and because no probable cause determination was at issue. Billings v. Peterson, 2004 MT 232, 322 M 444, 97 P3d 532 (2004), distinguishing County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 US 44 (1991).

No Error in Refusing to Dismiss Charges for Failure to Hold Timely Probable Cause Hearing: Brown was arrested on February 13, but no probable cause hearing was held until February 18. Brown moved for dismissal on due process grounds of failure to hold a probable cause hearing within 48 hours of arrest, citing County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 US 44, 114 L Ed 2d 49, 111 S Ct 1161 (1991), but the dismissal motion was denied. Brown appealed. The Supreme Court pointed out that the question to be decided was not whether Brown was accorded a timely probable cause determination, but rather whether the District Court erred in refusing to dismiss the charges as a remedy for failure to hold a probable cause hearing. Dismissal of charges is not the correct remedy for failure to timely charge a person who was arrested without a warrant. Under St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985), the proper remedy is the exclusion of evidence acquired as a result of the delay. The trial court did not err in refusing the motion to dismiss. St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 339, 297 M 427, 993 P2d 672, 56 St. Rep. 1346 (1999). See also St. v. Dieziger, 200 M 267, 650 P2d 800, 39 St. Rep. 1734 (1982).

Remedy for Violation of Section: The proper remedy for violation of this section is suppression of improperly obtained evidence. Dismissal is an inappropriate remedy when the defendant made no motion to suppress evidence, no suppression hearing was held, and there was no evidentiary record to review that might lead to dismissal. St. v. Dieziger, 200 M 267, 650 P2d 800, 39 St. Rep. 1734 (1982). See also St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 339, 297 M 427, 993 P2d 672, 56 St. Rep. 1346 (1999).

Forty-Two Day Delay From Offense to Charge — Prison Inmate: An inmate of the Montana State Prison who was not served with an arrest warrant until approximately 42 days after he assaulted a guard did not have his rights violated under this section based upon unnecessary delay from the date of the offense to the date of filing of information, initial appearance, and arraignment. Because he was incarcerated, arrest was unnecessary; thus, the need to bring him before a magistrate to prevent unjust incarceration did not exist. St. v. Dieziger, 200 M 267, 650 P2d 800, 39 St. Rep. 1734 (1982).

Five-Day Delay During Hospitalization: Appellant had the burden of showing that the 5-day delay between arrest and arraignment constituted unnecessary delay. He showed that a Justice of the Peace was available. However, appellant was in a hospital for that period, which suggested that the delay was neither unreasonable nor prejudicial. There was nothing to suggest that the delay influenced the voluntariness of appellant's statements made to police during the period of delay. The statements were properly admitted, and motion to suppress them due to the delay was properly denied. St. v. Plouffe, 198 M 379, 646 P2d 533, 39 St. Rep. 1064 (1982).

Holding Youth Without Appearance Until Transfer to District Court: Defendant claimed he was not brought to a magistrate "without necessary delay". Defendant surrendered to the authorities and was placed in jail but was not taken before a magistrate until some 20 days later. Although defendant could show no prejudice due to this lapse of time, the Supreme Court strongly disapproved of any deliberate attempt by the State to avoid arraignment "without unnecessary delay" by first arresting and holding a juvenile under the Youth Court Act for a sustained period of time and then later attempting to prosecute the juvenile as an adult. The Supreme Court stated that if a defendant could show prejudice or a deliberate attempt by the prosecution to circumvent a speedy arraignment, they would not hesitate to fashion an appropriate remedy. St. v. Rodriguez, 192 M 411, 628 P2d 280, 38 St. Rep. 578F (1981).

Delay Not Shown to Be Unnecessary: The officers' failure to present the defendant before a magistrate before interrogation did not render the confession inadmissible when the defendant failed to show that it was an "unnecessary delay". St. v. Lenon, 174 M 264, 570 P2d 901 (1977).

Delay in Initial Appearance — Evidence Excluded: The failure to provide the defendant with a prompt initial appearance necessitated exclusion of evidence obtained and statements allegedly made after the defendant's arrest when he established that the delay was unnecessary and the prosecution failed to meet the burden of showing that such evidence and statements were not reasonably related to the delay. St. v. Benbo, 174 M 252, 570 P2d 894 (1977). See also St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 339, 297 M 427, 993 P2d 672, 56 St. Rep. 1346 (1999).

Unlawful Detention — No Prejudice: The defendant, convicted of the crime of uttering and delivering a fictitious check, was not entitled to a reversal of his conviction because he was detained for a period of 21 days without being taken before a magistrate when there was no confession and the detention did not prejudice him in presenting his defense on the merits at the trial. St. v. Johnston, 140 M 111, 367 P2d 891 (1962).

Delay: Delay was not unreasonable. St. v. Nelson, 139 M 180, 362 P2d 224 (1961); Cline v. Tait, 113 M 475, 129 P2d 89 (1942).

Availability of Magistrate — False Imprisonment: In an action for false imprisonment brought by the plaintiff against a Sheriff and surety on his official bond based on unnecessary delay in taking the plaintiff before a magistrate, it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove that a magistrate was available on the particular day when the false imprisonment allegedly occurred. Rounds v. Bucher, 137 M 39, 349 P2d 1026 (1960).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an adaptation of 1987 MCA 46-7-102. The statute contains some changes in terminology that do not affect established procedure. In addition, the statute requires the court to inform the defendant of the circumstances that may lead to pretrial release and of the defendant's right to a probable cause determination in a felony case.

Commission Comment Not Divided: This section is a recodification of part of section 95-902, R.C.M. 1947. Section 46-7-103 (renumbered 46-10-105) is also derived from section 95-902.

Source: New.

This section is not a basic extension of existing law. It requires that the defendant be taken before a magistrate without unreasonable delay after arrest. Existing law seems to require such an "initial appearance" in cases of arrests with or without a warrant. Failure to so act would not vitiate a conviction or suffice as grounds for a motion to dismiss. Insofar as substantive rights are not injured by an unlawful detention and there is no prejudice, there should be no dismissal or reversal although there might be a suit for false arrest or unlawful detention. Any time the defendant's substantive rights are prejudiced it would be ground for reversal whether this provision was included or not. It seems that it would be less likely that the defendant's constitutional rights would be abridged (according to federal determinations) if the above procedure was rigorously followed. Under this provision, the defendant should be duly informed of his constitutional rights (the right to know the charge against him, the right to counsel, the right to remain silent and the right to bail) as early as possible and therefore the entire subsequent procedure is apt to be looked upon with more favor by the "reviewing federal courts."

Case Notes

Failure to Inform Defendant of Right to Counsel — Conviction Dismissed Without Prejudice: Gatlin was arrested in Butte-Silver Bow County after robbing a store. Two hours earlier, a man fitting Gatlin's description had robbed two casinos in Missoula. The Missoula victims identified Gatlin as the robber, and the Missoula County Attorney charged Gatlin with two counts of robbery in Missoula County. Gatlin was arraigned in Butte and was informed of the Missoula charges but was not informed of the right to counsel on the Missoula charges. Eventually Gatlin pleaded nolo contendere on the Butte charge and was sentenced to 5 years in prison. Gatlin was then taken to Missoula, where he was arraigned and informed of his rights and subsequently pleaded guilty to the Missoula charges and was sentenced to 25 years in prison, with the term to run concurrently with the Butte sentence. Gatlin appealed on grounds that he was not informed of the right to counsel on the Missoula charges during the Butte arraignment. The state asserted that Gatlin's rights were not violated because the Butte appearance was for the Butte-Silver Bow charges, not the Missoula charges. The Supreme Court disagreed. The record was clear that Gatlin made an initial timely appearance on the Missoula charges in Butte but was not informed of the right to counsel on the Missoula charges. The appropriate remedy was to vacate the conviction and dismiss the Missoula information. However, Gatlin was not prejudiced by the lack of counsel on the Missoula charges while incarcerated in Butte or by any delay in filing the Missoula information, so dismissal of the information was without prejudice. St. v. Gatlin, 2009 MT 348, 353 M 163, 219 P3d 874 (2009).

Error for Prosecutor to Comment on Defendant's Post-Miranda Silence Regardless When Warning Given: Following arrest on sexual assault and attempted sexual intercourse without consent charges, Godfrey received an acknowledgment of rights form from his attorney. Godfrey initialed the form and subsequently went over the form with the District Court during his initial appearance. Godfrey later complained that the state prosecutor violated Godfrey's due process rights by commenting at trial on Godfrey's silence, in violation of Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610 (1976). The state contended that because Godfrey did not have his Miranda rights read to him by a police officer at the time of arrest, Doyle did not apply. The Supreme Court found the state's argument to be without merit and declined to distinguish between a situation when a defendant is advised of the right to remain silent by an arresting officer and a situation when a defendant is advised of the right by a court, or to distinguish between an oral warning and a written form. However, in this case, Godfrey's counsel did not object to the prosecutor's comments at trial, so the court had to decide whether the trial error was sufficiently prejudicial to trigger plain error review. After reviewing the record, the court concluded that it was not plain that the prosecutor's comments had created an inference for the jury that by remaining silent, Godfrey must have been guilty. Absent a clear comment on or infringement of Godfrey's fundamental right to remain silent and absent a contemporaneous objection by Godfrey's counsel to the prosecutor's comments, the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Godfrey, 2004 MT 197, 322 M 254, 95 P3d 166 (2004). See also St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), and St. v. Sullivan, 280 M 25, 927 P2d 1033 (1996).

Purpose of Act — Declaratory Judgment Properly Used to Test Constitutionality of Criminal Jurisdictional Statute — Previous Opinion Applied by Remand: Defendants in criminal proceedings in several different Justices' Courts filed actions under the Uniform Declaratory Judgments Act (UDJA) to have declared unconstitutional statutes requiring a criminal defendant in a Justice's Court proceeding to choose between a jury trial in Justice's Court or in District Court. Several civil actions requesting the same relief under the UDJA were consolidated for the purposes of appeal. The state argued that the UDJA was not intended to be used for this purpose and that the various criminal defendants could obtain the same relief by raising the unconstitutionality of the underlying statute as a defense in their individual criminal prosecutions. The Supreme Court noted that acceptance of the state's position would require each criminal defendant to litigate the constitutionality of the pertinent sections of law both in the District Courts and in the Montana Supreme Court. Citing Goff v. St., 141 M 605, 374 P2d 862 (1962), St. v. Wilson, 160 M 473, 503 P2d 522 (1972), and Gryczan v. St., 283 M 433, 942 P2d 112 (1997), and noting that the issue of the constitutionality of the pertinent statutes could be raised, but not finally decided, in the District Courts, the Supreme Court held that it was proper to use the UDJA to determine the constitutionality of the statutes requiring the election of a jury trial in one court and not both courts. On this substantive issue, the Supreme Court cited its recent decision in Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800, 55 St. Rep. 1298 (1998), holding that the statute requiring the election was unconstitutional, and remanded the cases to the District Courts with directions to enter declaratory judgments in favor of the plaintiffs and appellants. McGillivray v. St., 1999 MT 3, 293 M 19, 972 P2d 804, 56 St. Rep. 11 (1999).

Limitation to One Jury Trial Held Unconstitutional: In 1997, the Legislature enacted the provisions codified at 46-17-201(3), 46-17-311(1), and former subsection (1)(g) of this section, providing that a person tried for a misdemeanor in Justice's or City Court who appeals to the District Court has the right to only one jury trial. Woirhaye was charged with misdemeanor DUI and requested a jury trial in Missoula County Justice's Court. Upon his conviction by the Justice's Court jury, Woirhaye appealed to the District Court for a trial de novo pursuant to Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., and 46-17-311. Woirhaye asked that the District Court declare 46-17-201(3) unconstitutional, but the District Court denied his motion. Woirhaye then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, which was granted on the grounds that Woirhaye would otherwise be denied a fundamental right. The Supreme Court held that Woirhaye's right to a jury trial in both the Justice's Court or City Court and the District Court was a fundamental right guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 24 and 26, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court pointed out that the right to a jury trial is guaranteed by Art. III, sec. 2, clause 3, of the U.S. Constitution and the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and also that even if that were not the case, Montana may, under the rationale of St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), provide rights in excess of those guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. The Supreme Court noted, in response to the state's argument that Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., guarantees "a" jury trial, that the state's argument was not persuasive against the language of Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court also distinguished Ludwig v. Mass., 427 US 618 (1976), holding that Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., was not implicated in the case, and stated that any language in N. Cent. Serv., Inc. v. Hafdahl, 191 M 440, 625 P2d 56 (1981), indicating that a requirement for a jury trial applicable to Small Claims Court was satisfied if the right was granted at the District Court level, was dicta and could not be relied upon to support the state's case that only one jury trial was required. Consequently, the Supreme Court held 46-17-201(3), 46-17-311(1), and former subsection (1)(g) of this section to be unconstitutional as violating Woirhaye's right to a jury trial. (See 1999 amendment.) Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800, 55 St. Rep. 1298 (1998), followed in McGillivray v. St., 1999 MT 3, 293 M 19, 972 P2d 804, 56 St. Rep. 11 (1999), and Balyeat Law, P.C. v. Harrison, 1999 MT 144, 295 M 13, 983 P2d 902, 56 St. Rep. 566 (1999), and followed and clarified in St. v. Rensvold, 2006 MT 146, 332 M 392, 139 P3d 154 (2006).

No Conflict of Interest Because Defendant's Father Paid for and Conferred With Counsel: The fact that defendant's father paid for defendant's attorney and consulted with the attorney concerning defendant's defense does not establish a conflict of interest. Defendant was not denied effective assistance of counsel because of his father's involvement with the attorney. St. v. Pease, 227 M 424, 740 P2d 659, 44 St. Rep. 1203 (1987).

Conflict of Interest — Representation by Former Assistant County Attorney — Presence of Counsel for Codefendant at Initial Hearing: Where the defendant to a hit-and-run charge signed a motion to continue his case, which motion contained a paragraph notifying him that his retained counsel had previously worked for the County Attorney, the Supreme Court held that since the defendant signed the motion and retained the lawyer anyway, he had waived his right to assert any conflict of interest charge. The Supreme Court also held that inasmuch as the defendant had, under St. v. Dieziger, 200 M 267, 650 P2d 800, 39 St. Rep. 1734 (1982), no right to counsel at his initial hearing, he could not claim a conflict of interest by the presence of his wife's attorney at that hearing. St. v. Henricks, 206 M 469, 672 P2d 20, 40 St. Rep. 1786 (1983).

Right to Counsel — Initial Appearance: The initial appearance is not a "critical stage" of the prosecution; thus, failure to provide counsel at an initial appearance does not violate the defendant's right to effective assistance of counsel. St. v. Dieziger, 200 M 267, 650 P2d 800, 39 St. Rep. 1734 (1982).

Attorney General's Opinions

Duty of Judge to Notify Defendant of Potential Forfeiture of Hunting, Fishing, and Trapping Privileges — Notification of Loss of Privileges Duty of Department: In order to ensure that a knowing plea is entered by a defendant accused of a fish and game violation, a judge must inform the defendant of the potential forfeiture of hunting, fishing, and trapping privileges as a result of a conviction, guilty plea, or forfeiture of bond in the case of offenses for which the loss of privileges is a direct and immediate consequence of the violation. Notification of the loss of hunting, fishing, and trapping privileges is statutorily delegated to the Department of Fish, Wildlife, and Parks. 49 A.G. Op. 20 (2002).

CHAPTER 8
RIGHT TO COUNSEL

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

1991 Chapter Comments: This chapter encompasses those statutes governing the procedural aspects of the right to counsel. They are modeled after the 1987 code, with amendments to reflect case law. As before, a court may appoint counsel "in the interests of justice" when a need exists. When incarceration is to be preserved as a sentencing option in a misdemeanor case, counsel must be appointed to an indigent. In addition, specific requirements are imposed on court-appointed counsel when, contrary to his client's instructions, he believes an appeal would be frivolous and desires to withdraw.

There are a few code provisions that have not been retained. The provision allowing appointment after trial is not retained expressly, but it is impliedly preserved. Compare 1987 MCA 46-8-101 and 46-8-104. Parts of the 1987 code concerning eligibility for court-appointed counsel were considered to be understood and unnecessary. See 1987 MCA 46-8-111(2) [now repealed] regarding the assets of friends and relatives. Also, 1987 MCA 46-8-111(3) [now repealed], concerning the financial capability of minors, was deleted and placed in the youth offenders section.

It was believed to be unnecessary for the court to warn the defendant of the penalties for false swearing. See 1987 MCA 46-8-112.

Interim Study of Justice System: SJR 2 (1981) requested an interim study of the Montana criminal justice system, including alternative ways and effects of redistricting Montana's District Court system, establishing a statewide district attorney system for criminal prosecutions, and providing for a statewide system of representation for indigents accused of crimes and required a report of the findings of the study to the Legislature. The Legislative Council designated the Joint Subcommittee on Judiciary to conduct the study.

Chapter Case Notes

Denial of Motion for Continuance: In a prosecution for attempted deliberate homicide, the court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a continuance, in which defendant argued he was deprived of his right to effective counsel, due process, and time to prepare his case. Motions for continuance are directed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and the trial court will not be reversed absent a showing of prejudice to the movant, citing St. v. Paulson, 167 M 310, 538 P2d 339 (1975). As more than 2 months elapsed between the entry of defendant's plea and his motion for continuance, and because he failed to show any prejudice, the motion was properly denied. St. v. Kirkland, 184 M 229, 602 P2d 586 (1979).

It is the commission's intention that [parts 1 and 2, part 2 now repealed] be sufficiently broad to include the right of an individual county to establish a public defender system. Such a system would not be practical in any but a few of the more populous counties of the state, where the need is to provide orderly and adequate legal counsel for indigent persons. It must be emphasized, however, that it was not the intention of the commission to institute a public defender system, but only to provide a general framework for its implementation if a particular county should desire such a procedure. Further, such a procedure would have no application in civil cases.

Part Case Notes

Counsel Travel Expenses for Incarcerated Youth Properly Denied: A youth sentenced to a youth correctional facility requested reimbursement funds to enable his attorney to visit at the facility, contending that denial of the funds violated the right to counsel. The Supreme Court disagreed, absent evidence that adequate consultation with counsel could not be conducted by telephone. The court found no abuse of discretion in the Youth Court's denial of counsel's travel expenses. In re N.V., 2004 MT 80, 320 M 442, 87 P3d 510 (2004).

County Employment of Independent Contractor to Provide Legal Services: There is no express prohibition under Montana law preventing a county from entering into an independent contractor relationship for the provision of legal services. Hamner v. Butte-Silver Bow County, 233 M 271, 760 P2d 76, 45 St. Rep. 1481 (1988).

Award Unreasonable Where Only One-Fourth of Bill and Overhead: Award to attorney representing indigent of maximum $1,000 for services allowed by District Court rule, plus claimed $31.98 for expenses, was not "reasonable compensation" as required by 46-8-201 (now repealed), was an abuse of discretion, and was reversed with remand for proper redetermination where attorney requested $3,431 for 129 ½ out-of-court hours at $20 an hour, 27 in-court hours at $30 an hour, and $31.98 in expenses, and submitted an affidavit of his accountant showing that attorney's share of his firm's overhead for the time spent on the case was approximately $1,006. St. v. Boyken, 196 M 122, 637 P2d 1193, 38 St. Rep. 2184 (1981).

Reasonable Compensation Beyond Overhead Required: Section 46-8-201's (now repealed) provision for payment of what a District Court or Justice of the Supreme Court certifies to be a "reasonable compensation" for services requires that the attorney be paid a reasonable compensation. The fee should allow the financial survival of the attorney's practice and must reimburse the attorney for office overhead and expenses and yield something toward his own support. St. v. Boyken, 196 M 122, 637 P2d 1193, 38 St. Rep. 2184 (1981).

Contracts and Court Rules Setting Fees: The Bar and District Courts are cautioned to see to it that upon appointment of private counsel to defend an indigent in a criminal case there are placed upon the minutes or other District Court records the rate of pay and upper limits to be received by counsel, as well as any changes in that contract. A District Court rule adopted for each county in each district, setting rates, would comply with this requirement. In re Petition to Adopt Rule Regarding Attorney's Fees, 194 M 1, 634 P2d 1185, 38 St. Rep. 1613 (1981).

Discretionary and Maximum Fees: In view of 46-8-201 (now repealed), choice of and rate of compensation for counsel appointed to defend indigents in criminal proceedings must be left to the various District Courts, and the $30-per-hour maximum formerly set by the Supreme Court in St. v. Allies, 182 M 323, 597 P2d 64, 36 St. Rep. 820 (1979), is withdrawn and the maximum hourly rate is left to the District Courts' discretion. The $5,000 limit for any given criminal proceeding without prior court approval and the $2,000 limit for any appeal, where paid from county funds, set by St. v. Allies, are retained, but the District Courts may go above those figures in justifiable cases. In re Petition to Adopt Rule Regarding Attorney's Fees, 194 M 1, 634 P2d 1185, 38 St. Rep. 1613 (1981).

Wide Discretion Under Section 46-8-201 (Now Repealed): It is the clear intent of 46-8-201 (now repealed) that where county funds are concerned a District Court should certify as to the propriety of an attorney's bill and where state funds are concerned a Supreme Court Justice should certify, and that a wide discretion be vested in the District Courts in the matter of fees. Promulgation by the Supreme Court of a statewide fee schedule would take away the District Courts' discretionary duty to determine the propriety of the bills presented against county funds and would make the courts' certificates ministerial rather than discretionary. In re Petition to Adopt Rule Regarding Attorney's Fees, 194 M 1, 634 P2d 1185, 38 St. Rep. 1613 (1981).

Court Discretion as to Limitation of Attorneys' Fees: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in limiting payments to court-appointed attorneys to $3,000 for an appeal limited to one issue by order of the Supreme Court. Similarly it was not an abuse to limit additional expenses to $473.97, an amount less than asked for by counsel. In striking a balance between the responsibility of providing gratuitous service to indigent defendants and the increasing burdens placed on the bar by expanded service to indigent rights, much discretion must be left in the trial judge. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 474, 608 P2d 425 (1979), following St. v. Allies, 182 M 323, 597 P2d 64 (1979).

Effective Assistance of Counsel — Effect of Delay of Payment to Appointed Counsel: The defendant's claims that the failure of the court to provide funds in advance for the appointed defense counsel created a "chilling effect" and that by the time funds became available there was inadequate time in which to prepare a defense were rejected because the defendant failed to show that the alleged lack of preparation prejudiced him in any way. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Factors to Consider in Fixing Attorney Fees: The fee need not be equal to that from a paying client. Elements of consideration in fixing fees include the amount of time and effort expended, the nature and extent of services rendered, the fees paid for similar services in other jurisdictions, the traditional responsibilities of the legal profession, the amount of public funds made available for such purposes, and a judicious respect for the taxpaying public as well as the needs of the accused. St. v. Allies, 182 M 323, 597 P2d 64 (1979), followed in St. v. Boyken, 196 M 122, 637 P2d 1193, 38 St. Rep. 2184 (1981).

Fixing A Flat Fee: The fixing by the District Court of a flat fee of $2,000 for an appeal is not such an abuse of discretion as to require intervention by the appellate court. St. v. Allies, 182 M 323, 597 P2d 64 (1979).

Liability for Payment of Defense Counsel: When prosecutions are caused by the Attorney General pursuant to his statutory authority to prosecute public offenses disclosed by an audit of the Legislative Auditor, the Department of Justice must bear the cost of attorney's fees for indigent defendants. In re Barron, 170 M 218, 552 P2d 70 (1976).

Compensation Not Allowed for Unnecessary or Useless Services — Judge's Discretion: The judge did not abuse his discretion in disallowing the attorney's claim for services rendered for an indigent defendant for time spent asking educational questions on voir dire over repeated protest from the court. The judge has discretion to disallow compensation for substantial time consumed in improper, unnecessary, or useless services. It was, however, an abuse of discretion to reduce compensation for other attorney's wasted time. State ex rel. Stephens v. District Court, 170 M 22, 550 P2d 385 (1976).

Attorney's Lien on Defendant's Estate: The court could not summarily impose a lien on the defendant's estate in favor of the county for the services of appointed counsel when it was thought the defendant might be indigent. Petition of Hunsinger, 153 M 445, 456 P2d 304 (1969).

Justices' Courts — Counsel Appointed by District Court: Since District Courts lack supervisory control over Justices' Courts, the District Court could not appoint counsel for an indigent charged with the crime of petit larceny and, therefore, compensation could not be awarded the attorney who defended him. State ex rel. Johnson v. District Court, 147 M 263, 410 P2d 933 (1966).

Duty of Defense Counsel on Appeal: When the court-appointed counsel failed to advise the clerk's office as to what would be required for the record on appeal from a conviction of burglary and there was no record before the Supreme Court, the defendant had been denied his right to effective representation by counsel on his appeal and the cause was remanded to the District Court with directions to revoke appointment of the present counsel and appoint a competent and effective counsel to properly prosecute the appeal. St. v. Bubnash, 139 M 517, 366 P2d 155 (1961).

Appointment of More Than One Counsel: The court was not limited to the appointment of one attorney but might appoint more if the gravity of the offense warranted it, and if so, each would be entitled to compensation. Huntington v. Yellowstone County, 80 M 20, 257 P 1041 (1927).

Part Attorney General's Opinions

State Funding of Legal Defense Expenses of Indigent Defendants Limited to District Courts: The 2001 amendments to 3-5-901 and 46-8-201 (now repealed) revised the manner in which District Courts are funded by providing for state assumption of most costs. However, the amendments did not revise funding for Justices' Courts, and nothing indicates that the Legislature intended to include costs associated with indigent defendants in Justices' Courts. Under 46-8-201 (now repealed), costs of remuneration for counsel appointed for indigent criminal defendants are paid by the state, but payments are limited to District Court criminal cases only. 49 A.G. Op. 21 (2002).

46-8-101. Right to counsel.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is loosely modeled after 1987 MCA 46-8-101. The statute is a generally stated provision that gives the court wide discretion in appointing counsel and is not intended to cause a great change in established procedure.

Subsection (1) reflects 1987 MCA 46-8-101(1). The amendment stresses the need for the defendant to be notified of the right to counsel at the initial appearance.

Subsection (2) is a general rule providing the requirements that must be met before the court is required to assign counsel. Namely, the defendant seeking counsel must show that he is indigent and that he is entitled to have counsel assigned. Subsections (1) and (2) are designed to work in tandem.

Subsection (3) sets out those instances in which a defendant is entitled to counsel. A defendant charged with a felony offense is entitled to counsel. A defendant charged with a misdemeanor is entitled to counsel if incarceration is retained as a sentencing option. See Argersinger v. Hamlin, 407 US 25, 40 (1972), and State ex rel. Maier v. City Court, 203 Mont. 443 (1983).

The provision that allows the court to assign counsel as the interests of justice require has been continued. This provision should be broadly interpreted. The "interest of justice" standard is intended to apply to any part of a criminal proceeding—from precharge investigations to postverdict petitions and appeals. The granting of counsel to one defendant during precharge investigation should not be construed as allowing similarly situated defendants counsel unless counsel is otherwise required by law. Of course, a defendant is not entitled to the appointment of counsel unless his indigence is shown to the court's satisfaction. See 46-8-111 [now repealed]. Conceivably, the "interest of justice" standard would permit the court to assign counsel for appeals through the federal system.

Source: New.

The right to counsel is provided for in the U.S. Constitution (14 Amend., Due Process Clause), the Montana Constitution [1889] (Art. III, sec. 16 [now Art. II, sec. 24, 1972 Mont. Const.]) and in current Montana statutes (See R.C.M. 1947, sections 94-4806(1), 94-6101 and 94-6512 [repealed]). This section provides for the right to counsel by requiring that the defendant, when brought before a court, be informed of his right to counsel and asked if he desires counsel. If he is indigent and charged with a felony he must be advised that counsel will be provided at state expense. See also [46-7-102(1)(c)].

The court must determine whether the defendant is indigent, i.e., unable to employ counsel, and therefore entitled to assigned counsel. In making this determination the court may wish to consider such factors as income, property owned, savings, investments, pensions, unemployment compensation, social security, resources of spouse, parents, or relatives, and the number and age of dependents. The defendant's ability to post bail may be another consideration. A recent survey of Montana judges and county attorneys indicated that the determination of indigency is lenient, but adequate. [Annotator's note: Section 46-8-111, enacted in 1981, now repealed, must be considered in determining indigency.]

The question of appointed counsel where a misdemeanor is involved has not yet been fully resolved. As a result the commission left the situation open by using the words, "in the interest of justice." A number of writers have concluded that the right to counsel will be extended not only to include capital and felony cases, but misdemeanors as well, where considerable loss of liberty is at stake.

Compiler's Comments

2005 Amendment: (Version effective July 1, 2006) Chapter 449 in (2) after "desires" inserted "assigned", after "counsel" deleted "is unable to employ counsel, and is entitled to have counsel assigned" and inserted reference to inability to retain private counsel when charged offense is felony or misdemeanor with possibility of incarceration, after "shall" inserted reference to ordering office of state public defender to assign counsel, after "to" inserted "represent", and after "delay" inserted reference to pending determination of eligibility under 47-1-111; deleted former (3) that read: "(3) The defendant, if unable to employ counsel, is entitled to have counsel assigned if:

(a) the offense charged is a felony;

(b) the offense charged is a misdemeanor and the court desires to retain imprisonment as a sentencing option; or

(c) the interests of justice would be served by assignment"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2006.

Saving Clause: Section 78, Ch. 449, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

1991 Amendment: In (1), at beginning, substituted "During the initial appearance before the court, every defendant must be informed of the right to have counsel" for "Every defendant brought before the court must be informed by the court that it is his right to have counsel before proceeding"; in (2) deleted former first sentence that read: "The defendant, if charged with a felony, must be advised that counsel will be furnished at state expense if he is unable to employ counsel as determined under the provisions of 46-8-111", deleted "If the offense charged is a felony", after "employ counsel" inserted "and is entitled to have counsel assigned", and at end substituted "the defendant without unnecessary delay" for "defend him"; substituted (3) concerning criteria considered in determining if assigned counsel is required for former (3) that read: "(3) If the offense charged is a misdemeanor and if the defendant desires counsel and is unable to employ counsel, a court in the interest of justice may assign counsel to defend him"; and made minor changes in style.

1981 Amendment: Deleted "of record" after "court" in the second sentence of (2) and in the first sentence of (3); added "as determined under the provisions of 46-8-111" at the end of the first sentence of (2).

GENERALLY

Failure to Inform Defendant of Right to Counsel — Conviction Dismissed Without Prejudice: Gatlin was arrested in Butte-Silver Bow County after robbing a store. Two hours earlier, a man fitting Gatlin's description had robbed two casinos in Missoula. The Missoula victims identified Gatlin as the robber, and the Missoula County Attorney charged Gatlin with two counts of robbery in Missoula County. Gatlin was arraigned in Butte and was informed of the Missoula charges but was not informed of the right to counsel on the Missoula charges. Eventually Gatlin pleaded nolo contendere on the Butte charge and was sentenced to 5 years in prison. Gatlin was then taken to Missoula, where he was arraigned and informed of his rights and subsequently pleaded guilty to the Missoula charges and was sentenced to 25 years in prison, with the term to run concurrently with the Butte sentence. Gatlin appealed on grounds that he was not informed of the right to counsel on the Missoula charges during the Butte arraignment. The state asserted that Gatlin's rights were not violated because the Butte appearance was for the Butte-Silver Bow charges, not the Missoula charges. The Supreme Court disagreed. The record was clear that Gatlin made an initial timely appearance on the Missoula charges in Butte but was not informed of the right to counsel on the Missoula charges. The appropriate remedy was to vacate the conviction and dismiss the Missoula information. However, Gatlin was not prejudiced by the lack of counsel on the Missoula charges while incarcerated in Butte or by any delay in filing the Missoula information, so dismissal of the information was without prejudice. St. v. Gatlin, 2009 MT 348, 353 M 163, 219 P3d 874 (2009).

Defendant's Right to Counsel and Right to Trial Not Violated During Four Prior DUI Prosecutions — Enhancement of New DUI Charge to Felony Proper: Walker's 2005 DUI arrest was enhanced to a felony charge when driving records indicated that Walker had six prior DUI convictions. Walker alleged that four of the prior convictions were constitutionally infirm because Walker had not been advised of the right to counsel, the right to compel attendance of witnesses, the right to a trial by a jury, and penalty enhancement provisions. The District Court concluded that the four convictions did not violate Walker's constitutional rights and held that the prior convictions could be used to enhance the 2005 DUI to a felony. Walker appealed, and the Supreme Court considered each assertion in turn to determine whether Walker's waiver of the right to counsel and right to trial during the prior prosecutions was made knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily. The initial appearance/arraignment documents that Walker signed after being charged with the prior DUI offenses adequately informed Walker of the right to counsel, and Walker indicated an understanding of that right and that an attorney was not desired. A waiver of rights form and a waiver of counsel form that Walker signed evidenced that understanding. It was also sufficient that Walker was informed of the right to call witnesses to attend the proceedings, even though the constitution does not confer a right to compel witnesses to testify. Walker was also adequately informed of the right to a trial by jury and to a unanimous verdict, but it was unnecessary for the District Court to explain all the nuances or effects of waiving the right to a trial by jury. Lastly, the documents informed Walker that there might be indirect consequences of a guilty plea, including the possible loss of driving privileges and the use of the conviction in the event Walker was convicted of a crime in the future, but the District Court was not required to specifically inform Walker of the indirect consequence that a fourth or subsequent DUI might result in a felony charge, because whether Walker committed a fourth or subsequent DUI was clearly within Walker's sole control and was an indirect consequence of guilty pleas to the prior DUI offenses. Thus, Walker's prior guilty pleas were entered knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily, and the District Court did not err in allowing the use of the prior convictions to elevate Walker's 2005 DUI to a felony. St. v. Walker, 2008 MT 244, 344 M 477, 188 P3d 1069 (2008).

Defendant Not Considered Pro Se by Default: One year and three attorneys after being charged with several DUI-related offenses, Browning terminated the services of the third court-appointed attorney and indicated that he wished to hire private counsel. The trial court allowed Browning to proceed, but cautioned that under the circumstances, Browning was considered to be representing himself. Browning's attempt to secure private counsel failed for lack of funds. During subsequent proceedings, Browning asserted that he did not wish to proceed pro se because he did not know what he was doing, but the trial court refused to appoint a fourth attorney. Browning subsequently pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 20 years but then moved to withdraw the guilty plea on grounds that the plea was involuntary because he received ineffective assistance of counsel. The motion was denied, but on appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Although a defendant has a right to appear pro se, every reasonable presumption is indulged in against waiver of the right to counsel, and waiver will be upheld only if a defendant made the decision knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently. In this case, the record did not support a conclusion that Browning unequivocally requested to proceed pro se, and under the test in St. v. Langford, 267 M 95, 882 P2d 490 (1994), a defendant cannot be considered pro se by default. Thus, the trial court improperly denied Browning the assistance of counsel, and Browning's motion to withdraw the guilty plea was erroneously denied. St. v. Browning, 2006 MT 190, 333 M 132, 142 P3d 757 (2006).

Exclusion of Defendant From Pretrial Meeting to Determine Whether Defendant Be Allowed to Proceed Pro Se Violative of Right to Be Present and Defend Oneself — Reversible Error: An alleged violation of the constitutional right to be present and appear at all criminal proceedings does not warrant automatic reversal. Rather, the Supreme Court considers the effect that a violation has on a defendant to determine whether a defendant has suffered any conceivable prejudice. In this case, Mann was excluded from a pretrial meeting to determine whether Mann would be represented by counsel or proceed pro se at trial on burglary and misdemeanor assault charges. This important determination implicated a substantial issue in the scope of the criminal proceedings, and excluding Mann from the meeting, at which Mann's counsel portrayed Mann in a negative light, violated Mann's right to be present and defend himself and right to effective assistance of counsel. Violation of these fundamental constitutional rights was sufficiently prejudicial to constitute reversible error, and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Mann, 2006 MT 160, 332 M 476, 139 P3d 159 (2006).

Erroneous Language in Verification of Arraignment Form Constituting Sufficient Irregularity to Void Waiver of Right to Counsel — Remand for Resentencing: The state attempted to enhance Mann's DUI to a felony based on his pleading guilty to two prior DUIs. Mann challenged the enhancement based on Mann's alleged waiver of the right to counsel contained in a verification of arraignment form. The District Court held that Mann had waived the right to counsel. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The language of the verification of arraignment form was so erroneous, intimidating, and virtually indecipherable that Mann could not be considered to have entered into a knowing, intelligent, or voluntary waiver of the right to counsel. The language in the form was prima facie evidence of irregularity. Because the state had already exercised its opportunity to establish that the prior convictions were not obtained in violation of Mann's constitutional right, the Supreme Court vacated the prior convictions and remanded for resentencing in accordance with misdemeanor DUI charges. St. v. Mann, 2006 MT 33, 331 M 137, 130 P3d 164 (2006).

Ordering Defendant to Pay Counsel's Cost for First Trial as Well as Retrial: Following retrial, the judge was authorized by 46-8-113 to order defendant to pay his counsel's costs for the first trial as well as the second trial. This did not impinge upon the defendant's right to counsel, and there was no evidence to support his claim that the judge acted out of vindictiveness because defendant went to retrial. St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001).

Right to Counsel Where Public Defender Refuses Representation: Defendant was given a 3-year deferred sentence, which was subsequently revoked and a 10-year suspended sentence imposed. At that point defendant appeared pro se, without any indication in the record of his waiver of counsel or eligibility for appointed counsel other than a statement by a public defender that defendant was ineligible for a public defender because he earned too much. The Supreme Court vacated the 10-year suspended sentence because of denial of defendant's right to counsel, stating that where a public defender refuses to represent a defendant, the District Court must inquire further. Here the defendant was not questioned in regard to his indigency, nor did the court receive any type of financial statement from him. St. v. Fry, 197 M 354, 642 P2d 1053, 39 St. Rep. 589 (1982).

WHEN RIGHT ATTACHES

No Right to Additional Counsel During Initial Inquiry Hearing on Effectiveness of Present Counsel — Initial Inquiry Not Considered Critical Stage of Proceedings: Gazda requested removal of court-appointed counsel and appointment of new counsel. The District Court conducted an initial hearing to address whether Gazda's claim was substantial enough to warrant a hearing on the merits of the ineffective assistance claim. Gazda contended that he was entitled to additional counsel during the initial hearing, but the Supreme Court disagreed. Although the right to counsel arises at every critical stage of proceedings against a defendant, the critical stage in these proceedings began with the actual hearing on the merits of the ineffective counsel claim, not during the initial hearing to establish whether Gazda had a substantial claim, which was not a hearing on the merits of the claim. Thus, the District Court did not err by failing to appoint additional counsel for Gazda during the initial hearing. St. v. Gazda, 2003 MT 350, 318 M 516, 82 P3d 20 (2003).

Right to Assistance of Counsel in Misdemeanor Cases: Indigent defendants must be furnished counsel in all misdemeanor cases except those in which the judge has weighed the seriousness and gravity of the offense and precludes any imprisonment upon conviction and informs the defendant of this before trial. St. v. Skurdal, 235 M 291, 767 P2d 304, 45 St. Rep. 2394 (1988).

Attachment at "Critical Stages" — What Stages Critical: A "critical stage" of the proceedings is any step in which there is potential substantial prejudice to the defendant, and a defendant may question failure to provide counsel at a critical stage only where potential substantial prejudice inheres in the absence of counsel. St. v. Robbins, 218 M 107, 708 P2d 227, 42 St. Rep. 1440 (1985), followed in St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996).

Minor Charged With Traffic Offense: Since a minor may not be held in any detention facility or jail by reason of a traffic violation or for nonpayment of a fine resulting from the violation, the minor is not entitled to counsel as a fundamental right in connection with the violation. Even if he is an indigent, his right to appointment of counsel exists only when he may lose his physical liberty if he loses the litigation. State ex rel. Maier v. City Court, 203 M 443, 662 P2d 276, 40 St. Rep. 560 (1983).

Right to Counsel — Initial Appearance: The initial appearance is not a "critical stage" of the prosecution; thus, failure to provide counsel at an initial appearance does not violate the defendant's right to effective assistance of counsel. St. v. Dieziger, 200 M 267, 650 P2d 800, 39 St. Rep. 1734 (1982), followed in St. v. Farnsworth, 240 M 328, 783 P2d 1365, 46 St. Rep. 2165 (1989). See also St. v. Sor-Lokken, 246 M 70, 803 P2d 638, 47 St. Rep. 2264 (1990).

Initiation of Adverse Judicial Proceedings: A person's sixth and fourteenth amendment rights to counsel attach only at or after the time that adversary judicial proceedings have been initiated against him. St. v. Lara, 179 M 201, 587 P2d 930 (1978), followed in St. v. Schoffner, 248 M 260, 811 P2d 548, 48 St. Rep. 424 (1991).

Motion to File Information: A motion for leave to file an information is not a "critical stage" entitling the defendant to the right to assistance of counsel. State ex rel. Brackman v. District Court, 172 M 24, 560 P2d 523 (1977).

REQUEST

Defendant's Direction to Passenger to Call Lawyer Held Not to Be Request to Law Enforcement for Lawyer: Clark was stopped on the highway by a highway patrol officer, was arrested and put in handcuffs, and, as he was being led to the officer's vehicle, yelled back over his shoulder to his passenger, "Call the attorney now. This is harassment." Noting that the right to counsel attaches only in a custodial interrogation and that Clark was not being interrogated, the Supreme Court held that Clark's statement directed to his passenger was not a request to law enforcement that he be given an attorney. St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 419, 347 M 354, 198 P3d 809 (2008).

Error in Failure to Appoint New Counsel Following Collapse of Attorney-Client Relationship: Hendershot made repeated timely requests for new counsel, but the requests were denied, and Hendershot was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that a conflict between Hendershot and counsel arose early in the relationship and that they were at serious odds for some time. The relationship continued to deteriorate, and a complete collapse was demonstrated by Hendershot and reinforced by counsel, requiring substitution of counsel. Thus, the District Court abused its discretion in denying Hendershot's requests for new counsel, and the Supreme Court reversed for further proceedings. St. v. Hendershot, 2007 MT 49, 336 M 164, 153 P3d 619 (2007), following U.S. v. Williams, 594 F2d 1258 (9th Cir. 1979).

Standard of Review of Ruling on Request for Substitute Counsel — Abuse of Discretion: Absent an abuse of discretion, the Supreme Court will not overrule a District Court's ruling on a request for substitution of counsel, which is within the sound discretion of the District Court. An abuse of discretion occurs only if the District Court acted arbitrarily without employment of conscientious judgment or exceeded the bounds or reason resulting in a substantial injustice. St. v. Hendershot, 2007 MT 49, 336 M 164, 153 P3d 619 (2007), following St. v. Gallagher, 2001 MT 39, 304 M 215, 19 P3d 817A (2001).

Broad Right to Counsel During Custodial Interrogation — Limited Right to Counsel for Police Procedure Not Involving Verbal Inquiry: When first interviewed, Buck was asked to provide a fingernail scraping, but Buck requested a lawyer, and the interview was concluded. During a subsequent interrogation, Buck confessed to an assault without requesting a lawyer. Buck asserted that the confession should be suppressed because the request for a lawyer made during the first interview was not honored during the subsequent interrogation, but the suppression motion was denied. On appeal, Buck also contended that he was not educated in constitutional law sufficiently to distinguish between the right to counsel as it applied to the two different procedures. The Supreme Court noted that the right to counsel in custodial interrogation is broad enough that it may be invoked in certain circumstances by a vague statement that does not include a reference to a lawyer, but it is not so broad that it may be invoked by a request that is unambiguously linked to another police procedure. A suspect may seek legal assistance for only limited purposes in dealing with law enforcement, and a suspect's request for counsel that is unambiguously limited to a police procedure that does not involve verbal inquiry does not invoke the right to counsel in custodial interrogation. Buck's request for counsel was unambiguously limited to the search incident to the fingernail scraping and did not extend to the subsequent custodial interrogation, nor did Buck establish error related to an inability to understand the request for counsel in two different contexts. Denial of the suppression motion was affirmed. St. v. Buck, 2006 MT 81, 331 M 517, 134 P3d 53 (2006), following Conn. v. Barrett, 479 US 523 (1987), and overruling St. v. Johnson, 221 M 503, 719 P2d 1248 (1986), and St. v. Spang, 2002 MT 120, 310 M 52, 48 P3d 727 (2002), to the extent that those cases held that the right to counsel for self-incrimination purposes may be invoked in custodial interrogation.

No Abuse of Discretion in Denial of Motion for Substitute Counsel Absent Substantial Complaints: Minez's first trial on drug charges ended in mistrial when a juror became sick and there were no alternates. Just before a subsequent trial, Minez moved for substitution of counsel. The District Court held a hearing to allow Minez to explain the motion. Minez contended that his court-appointed counsel had not provided effective assistance in several instances in the first trial. The court noted that it had observed counsel during the first trial and had seen nothing to indicate ineffective assistance or inadequate preparation. There was every indication that counsel was acting in Minez's best interests, and the court found that Minez presented no substantial complaints and denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court made an adequate initial inquiry into Minez's claims and properly exercised discretion in determining that Minez failed to present seemingly substantial complaints and in declining to hold an additional hearing on the motion for substitution of counsel. St. v. Minez, 2003 MT 344, 318 M 478, 82 P3d 1 (2003).

Presumption of Ineffective Counsel — Irreconcilable Conflict — Error in Failure to Investigate Timely Request for Substitution of Counsel: Generally, a defendant must establish both parts of the two-part test in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668, 80 L Ed 2d 674, 104 S Ct 2052 (1984), to prevail in showing ineffectiveness of counsel: (1) that counsel made errors so serious that counsel was not functioning as the counsel guaranteed by the constitution; and (2) that counsel's deficient performance prejudiced the defense and deprived defendant of a fair trial. However, in some cases, counsel's performance is so deficient that a presumption of ineffectiveness arises and the second part of the test becomes unnecessary. Only when surrounding circumstances justify a presumption of ineffectiveness can a constitutional claim of ineffective counsel be sufficient without inquiry into counsel's actual performance at trial. Here, a presumption of ineffectiveness could have arisen by an actual conflict of interest or by an irreconcilable conflict, but in either case, once the presumption was established, the second part of the test did not need to be satisfied. To establish an irreconcilable conflict, defendant must show a complete collapse of the attorney-client relationship. New counsel should be appointed if defendant shows by material facts that there is a total lack of communication or ineffective assistance of counsel, but bare unsupported allegations are insufficient to justify appointment of new counsel. In the present case, Wilson filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief, alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court found that it had erred by denying a hearing when Wilson requested substitution of counsel but denied the petition on grounds that Wilson had received a fair trial. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied St. v. Vessey, 967 P2d 960 (Utah Ct. App. 1998), holding that when reviewing an error in failing to investigate a defendant's timely request for substitution, the question is not whether the defendant received effective assistance of counsel at a subsequent trial, but whether the conflict with counsel was sufficient that it required substitution of counsel at the time that the request was made. In Wilson's case, it could not be determined whether the District Court gave adequate consideration to the merits of Wilson's substitution request based on the facts at the time that the request was made or whether denial of the petition for postconviction relief was based simply on the court's observation of counsel at the time of trial. The order denying the petition was vacated and the case remanded for further proceedings. Wilson v. St., 1999 MT 271, 296 M 465, 989 P2d 813, 56 St. Rep. 1096 (1999), overruled, to the extent that it stands for the proposition that a criminal defendant has a right to a "meaningful attorney-client relationship", in St. v. Gallagher, 2001 MT 39, 304 M 215, 19 P3d 817A (2001). See also St. v. Zackuse, 250 M 385, 833 P2d 142 (1991), St. v. Jones, 278 M 121, 923 P2d 560, 53 St. Rep. 864 (1996), and St. v. Gallagher, 1998 MT 70, 288 M 180, 955 P2d 1371, 55 St. Rep. 284 (1998).

Double Jeopardy — Vacating Trial When Defendant Requested Attorney After First Witness Was Sworn: After the first witness was sworn and testified in a prosecution for two misdemeanors, the judge asked defendant about a letter in the court file indicating that defendant had a public defender. Defendant said that he had not been in touch with the public defender and that he wanted a lawyer. The court vacated the trial to allow defendant a chance to obtain counsel. At a trial held 11 months later, a motion to dismiss because jeopardy attached after the first witness was sworn in the first trial was properly denied. Defendant's request for counsel prompted the vacation of the first trial, and the vacation worked to his advantage because he secured the public defender's representation. Found to be without merit was defendant's claim that the legal defect at the first trial, which the court feared might arise from lack of counsel, would not have occurred because the consequence of failure to appoint counsel would only prohibit the judge, under this section, from including jail time in the sentence. St. v. Stringer, 263 M 295, 868 P2d 588, 51 St. Rep. 63 (1994).

When Right to Counsel Invoked — Subsequent Incriminating Testimony Inadmissible — Error Held Harmless: Recognizing that it was affording greater protection under the state constitutional right to counsel provision than the U.S. Supreme Court had granted under the identically worded federal constitutional provision, and that this was a departure it had previously declined to make in the area of criminal law, the Montana Supreme Court held that when detained defendant stated he would like to talk to "someone", he invoked his right to counsel. His willing participation in a subsequent recorded conversation, without advice of counsel, did not constitute a waiver of the right to counsel, and admission of the recording into evidence, being testimonial and self-incriminating in nature, was error. However, the error was harmless because defendant during trial testified to a different story than he told on the recording, and the recording was admissible for impeachment purposes. St. v. Johnson, 221 M 503, 719 P2d 1248, 43 St. Rep. 1010 (1986), overruled, to the extent that the right to counsel for self-incrimination purposes may be invoked in custodial interrogation, in St. v. Buck, 2006 MT 81, 331 M 517, 134 P3d 53 (2006). Johnson was distinguished in St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 419, 347 M 354, 198 P3d 809 (2008).

Suppression of Confession — Voluntariness — Waiver of Right to Counsel After Making Request: To determine whether a confession should have been suppressed, it had to be determined whether the confession was voluntary and whether there was an unconstitutional denial of the right to counsel. In so doing, the following questions had to be answered: What was the totality of the circumstances? Was there effective assertion of the right to counsel, and if so, was there an effective waiver later? Since the evidence answered a large number of the requisite questions about the circumstances, the decision of the trial court was held not to have clearly contravened the weight of the evidence and its holding of voluntariness was upheld. Since any indication by a defendant in any manner that he wishes to consult with an attorney suffices, and evidence showed the defendant had met this requirement, the trial court erred in concluding that there was ineffective assertion of the right to counsel. After adopting the rule that a defendant can validly waive the right to counsel after making a request for counsel, the Supreme Court found the trial court properly found that the State had carried its "heavy burden" of showing waiver of counsel. St. v. Blakney, 185 M 470, 605 P2d 1093 (1979); certiorari granted, Blakney v. Mont., 451 US 1013, 69 L Ed 2d 384, 101 S Ct 2999 (1981), and judgment vacated and case remanded for further consideration in light of Edwards v. Ariz., 451 US 477, 68 L Ed 2d 378, 101 S Ct 1880 (1981); affirmed on remand, St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).

Remarks About Request for Counsel: The testimony of the police officer that the defendant did not want to talk to the police but asked to call his lawyer, although irrelevant and improper, was harmless error when the State presented overwhelming evidence of guilt and the defendant himself testified at trial. St. v. Flamm, 165 M 128, 526 P2d 119 (1974).

APPOINTMENT

Showing of Good Cause Required Prior to Appointment of State Public Defender in Habeas Corpus Proceedings: More than a simple motion is required before the Supreme Court will appoint the Office of State Public Defender (OSPD) to represent a person seeking habeas corpus relief. In such case, OSPD counsel will be appointed only upon a demonstration of good cause. A showing of likelihood of the illegality of the sentence of the person seeking relief, and that the sentence will be shortened or terminated if habeas corpus relief is granted, is required before OSPD counsel will be appointed. A statement that an applicant is untrained or unskilled in the law is insufficient, without more, to establish good cause. Dyer v. Mahoney, 2008 MT 117, 342 M 495, 182 P3d 737 (2008).

Choice of Counsel by Defendant: No one has a constitutional right to counsel of his choice. St. v. Skurdal, 235 M 291, 767 P2d 304, 45 St. Rep. 2394 (1988).

No Right to Representation by Nonlawyer: A defendant has an inalienable right to represent himself, but has no right to demand representation by a nonlawyer. A District Court lacks authority to allow representation of a defendant by a nonlawyer. (St. v. Skurdal, 235 M 291, 767 P2d 304, 45 St. Rep. 2394 (1988); St. v. Barnes, 232 M 405, 758 P2d 264, 45 St. Rep. 1150 (1988).

Transfer of Child Proceeding From Montana Court to Tribal Court: One of the purposes of the Indian Child Welfare Act, 25 U.S.C. §1901, et seq., is to ensure due process for all those involved, which requires a Montana court, when entertaining a tribal court motion for transfer to the tribal court of jurisdiction of children who are the subject of a Montana court proceeding, to hold a hearing on the transfer request and give a parent who claims indigency an appointed counsel if the court finds indigency. In re G.L.O.C., Youth in Need of Care, 205 M 352, 668 P2d 235, 40 St. Rep. 1354 (1983).

Right to Counsel Where Public Defender Refuses Representation: Defendant was given a 3-year deferred sentence, which was subsequently revoked and a 10-year suspended sentence imposed. At that point defendant appeared pro se, without any indication in the record of his waiver of counsel or eligibility for appointed counsel other than a statement by a public defender that defendant was ineligible for a public defender because he earned too much. The Supreme Court vacated the 10-year suspended sentence because of denial of defendant's right to counsel, stating that where a public defender refuses to represent a defendant, the District Court must inquire further. Here the defendant was not questioned in regard to his indigency, nor did the court receive any type of financial statement from him. St. v. Fry, 197 M 354, 642 P2d 1053, 39 St. Rep. 589 (1982).

Determination of Indigency: When the record reflects only the defendant's claim that he tried to get a lawyer and could not, the inquiry was not thorough and complete enough to support the determination of nonindigency and the subsequent ruling that defendant waived his right to counsel when he appeared unrepresented. St. v. Lande, 180 M 157, 589 P2d 666 (1979).

Discretion in Appointment: Matters dealing with appointment of counsel for indigent defendants are for the discretion of the trial court. St. v. Lande, 180 M 157, 589 P2d 666 (1979).

Appointment to Be Prompt: The District Court must determine indigency and appoint counsel without unnecessary delay. Fitzpatrick v. Crist, 165 M 382, 528 P2d 1322 (1974).

Substitution of Counsel: The denial of a motion for a continuance based on substitution of counsel was not an abuse of discretion or a denial of the defendants' constitutional right to counsel. St. v. Spurlock, 161 M 388, 506 P2d 842 (1973).

Justices' Courts — Counsel Appointed by District Court: Since District Courts lack supervisory control over Justices' Courts, the District Court could not appoint counsel for an indigent charged with the crime of petit larceny and, therefore, compensation could not be awarded the attorney who defended him. State ex rel. Johnson v. District Court, 147 M 263, 410 P2d 933 (1966).

Right to Appointed Counsel on Appeal: There is no provision for appointment of counsel in the Supreme Court; such appointments are made by the District Courts. Brown v. St., 140 M 289, 371 P2d 262 (1962); In re Pelke's Petition, 139 M 354, 365 P2d 932 (1961).

Proof of Denial of Counsel:

The accused was not entitled to habeas corpus on the ground that the District Court did not advise him of his rights or appoint counsel for him when there was no showing of prejudice sufficient to overcome the presumption that the court had performed its duty and the contention had not previously been raised before the Supreme Court. In re Diserly's Petition, 140 M 219, 370 P2d 763 (1962).

When the accused did not move to have the minutes of the court corrected to show, as he claimed, that he was arraigned before he was advised of his right to counsel, his affidavit contradicting the court minutes in that regard was insufficient, in the absence of a showing of prejudice, to overcome the presumption that the court performed its judicial duty. St. v. Murphy, 68 M 427, 219 P 629 (1923).

Nothing short of a refusal by the court, on an application for time to procure counsel, will justify a conclusion that the defendant was denied his constitutional right to counsel. St. v. Fowler, 59 M 346, 196 P 992 (1921).

More Than One Counsel: The court was not limited to the appointment of one attorney but might appoint more if the gravity of the offense warranted it, and if so, each would be entitled to compensation. Huntington v. Yellowstone County, 80 M 20, 257 P 1041 (1927).

DISCHARGE

Newly Appointed Attorney Necessary if Attorney-Client Relationship Completely Collapses: If the relationship between an appointed attorney and the attorney's client completely collapses in a criminal case, the refusal to substitute new counsel violates the client's right to effective assistance of counsel. St. v. Gallagher, 2001 MT 39, 304 M 215, 19 P3d 817A (2001).

Pretrial Motion for Substitution of Appointed Counsel — Counsel's Conduct at Trial May Be Considered: In evaluating defendant's pretrial motion for substitution of counsel, it was not error for the court to consider the counsel's conduct at trial. Although the Supreme Court has held that on a pretrial complaint the issue is whether defendant received effective assistance at that time, the court has not held that the lower court may not make logical inferences from its own observations at trial. St. v. Gallagher, 2001 MT 39, 304 M 215, 19 P3d 817A (2001).

Discharge of Appointed Counsel by Defendant: Once counsel has been appointed and is rendering effective assistance, the defendant has only the choice of: (1) continuing with the counsel so appointed; or (2) having his counsel dismissed and proceeding on his own, pro se. If appointed counsel is rendering effective assistance, defendant may not have different counsel appointed or demand certain counsel. St. v. Pepperling, 177 M 464, 582 P2d 341 (1978), followed in St. v. Lange, 226 M 9, 733 P2d 846, 44 St. Rep. 418 (1987).

Effect of Unwarranted Discharge of Counsel: There was no ground for appeal based on inadequate representation when the defendant attempted to discharge his appointed counsel 1 day before trial after counsel had adequately represented the defendant for months. St. v. Forsness, 159 M 105, 495 P2d 176 (1972).

EFFECTIVE ASSISTANCE

No Error in Failure to Hold Hearing on Effective Representation Absent Seemingly Substantial Complaint: Rose alleged that the trial court erred by failing to hold a hearing on Rose's complaints regarding effectiveness of counsel. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Weaver, 276 M 505, 917 P2d 437 (1996), and Billings v. Smith, 281 M 133, 932 P2d 1058 (1997), a defendant is entitled to a hearing on the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel if the defendant presents a seemingly substantial complaint about effective assistance. In this case, Rose voiced no seemingly substantial complaint. In fact, when the District Court appointed another attorney to inquire into Rose's complaints about counsel, Rose stated that he did not want counsel replaced. Absent any seemingly substantial complaint, the District Court did not err by failing to hold a hearing on effective assistance. St. v. Rose, 2009 MT 4, 348 M 291, 202 P3d 749 (2009). See also St. v. Gallagher, 1998 MT 70, 288 M 180, 955 P2d 1371 (1998).

Failure to Ask Jurors Followup Questions Regarding Impartiality During Voir Dire Not Considered Deficient Counsel Performance: Whitlow contended that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because, during voir dire, the defense attorney failed to ask followup questions of two jurors regarding impartiality. Whitlow's assertion was based primarily on an affidavit and testimony provided by defense counsel years later, stating that although counsel did not recall any partiality problems during voir dire, in hindsight, counsel probably should have asked additional questions of the jurors. The Supreme Court examined the trial transcript and defense counsel's voir dire notes and concluded that Whitlow failed to demonstrate that counsel's performance was deficient and failed to overcome the presumption that the challenged acts and omissions fell within the wide range of reasonable assistance measured under prevailing professional norms and in light of the surrounding circumstances. Whitlow's ineffective assistance claim failed. Whitlow v. St., 2008 MT 140, 343 M 90, 183 P3d 861 (2008), overruling St. v. Morigeau, 202 M 36, 656 P2d 185 (1982), and its progeny to the extent that the Morigeau "ignorance or neglect" test for ineffective assistance of counsel conflicts with the correct approach, which is the "objective standard of reasonableness" test set out in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984), and followed in St. v. Rose, 2009 MT 4, 348 M 291, 202 P3d 749 (2009).

Claims of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Properly Denied Absent Showing of Prejudice: Hartinger filed a petition for postconviction relief on grounds that he received ineffective assistance because his counsel: (1) failed to file a notice of appeal; (2) failed to move to suppress Hartinger's incriminating statements; (3) failed to move to suppress newly discovered evidence; and (4) incorrectly conducted voir dire. The petition was denied, and Hartinger appealed. The Supreme Court considered each claim and affirmed, noting that ineffective assistance claims must stem from counsel's neglect or ignorance rather than from informed, professional deliberation. First, Hartinger understood the right to file an out-of-time appeal but knowingly and intentionally waived that right, instead choosing to file for postconviction relief, so Hartinger could claim no prejudice from counsel's failure to file an appeal. Second, even if Hartinger's incriminating statements should have been suppressed, there was more than enough evidence to support the conviction, so no prejudice accrued. Third, counsel's decision to not suppress newly discovered evidence was an informed, tactical decision that did not constitute deficient performance. Fourth, counsel's tactic of using a peremptory challenge to remove a prospective juror who voiced pro-police views during voir dire was a reasonable trial tactic, reaffirmed the essence of voir dire, and could not be viewed as deficient performance. Hartinger v. St., 2007 MT 141, 337 M 432, 162 P3d 95 (2007).

Advising Defendant Not to Testify Not Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Stevens asserted that because he wished to testify at his trial on sexual assault charges but was advised not to testify by counsel, Stevens was not given effective assistance. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's findings that trial counsel's decision to not put Stevens on the stand was reasonable and sound trial strategy and that Stevens did not meet the burden of establishing that counsel's performance was deficient. Stevens v. St., 2007 MT 137, 337 M 400, 162 P3d 82 (2007).

Counsel Ready for Trial — Motion for Continuance Properly Denied: Molder asserted that a motion to continue trial should have been granted because his substitute counsel was unprepared for trial. The Supreme Court applied the factors in St. v. Sotelo, 209 M 86, 679 P2d 779 (1984), to determine whether the trial court abused its discretion in denying a continuance, including: (1) the length of the requested delay; (2) whether the state's case would be prejudiced; (3) reasons for the requested continuance; (4) whether defense counsel was diligent in preparing for trial; (5) whether defendant's right to a speedy trial would be violated; and (6) defendant's right to effective assistance of counsel. Despite Molder's assertion to the contrary, his counsel stated that a trial strategy was in place and that counsel was prepared for trial. The Supreme Court held that the trial strategy was reasonable, that Molder suffered no prejudice, and that Molder's substantial rights were not affected. Denial of the motion for continuance was affirmed. St. v. Molder, 2007 MT 41, 336 M 91, 152 P3d 722 (2007).

Withdrawal of Plea Based on Evidence That, After Guilty Plea, Assault Victim Told Public Defender That Defendant Wasn't the Assailant: Martin was charged with assault with a weapon and criminal possession of dangerous drugs. In exchange for the drug charge being dropped, he pleaded guilty to the assault charge. Two days before the sentencing date, a woman claiming to be the victim told the public defender's office that Martin was not her assailant. Martin moved for withdrawal of his guilty plea. Martin's motion was denied. Because Martin conceded in the lower court that his plea was in exchange for dropping the drug charge, he could not claim on appeal that it was not and that it was therefore error to refuse to allow withdrawal of the guilty plea. Martin obtained a benefit the moment that the plea agreement was entered into, and it did not matter that the drug charge had not been dropped and that he had not been sentenced at the time that he moved for withdrawal of the plea. Moreover, the defendant did not receive ineffective assistance of counsel. Because the woman did not testify at the hearing, her identity as the victim was not confirmed, the woman gave an incorrect birth date, and a witness told the police that Martin told the witness that Martin had stabbed the victim. The court did not abuse its discretion when it refused to allow withdrawal of the guilty plea based on what a woman had told the public defender's office. St. v. Martin, 2004 MT 288, 323 M 320, 100 P3d 146 (2004).

Failure of Counsel to File Motion to Dismiss Not Considered Ineffective Assistance When Element of Offense Before Jury: Maki was arrested for DUI after being discovered slumped into the passenger seat of a running vehicle that was parked off the highway near a missile silo access site. Maki claimed ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney did not file a motion to dismiss based on the fact that Maki was not on a way of the state open to the public. However, Maki's location on a way open to the public was an element of a DUI offense, so the issue was before the jury and Maki had an opportunity to contest the point. Counsel did not need to offer a motion to dismiss in order to raise the issue, and failure to do so neither prejudiced nor deprived Maki of a fair trial, so the ineffective assistance claim failed, and the DUI conviction was affirmed. St. v. Maki, 2004 MT 226, 322 M 420, 97 P3d 556 (2004).

Admission by Counsel That Defendant Resisted Arrest When Defendant Charged With Assaulting Peace Officer — Not Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Audet was charged with assaulting a peace officer and resisting arrest. At the time of trial, Audet told the court that he wished to plead guilty to the resisting arrest charge but to go to trial on the assault charge, even though his attorney had advised otherwise. The court entered not guilty pleas for both counts. Counsel informed the jury in opening and closing statements that Audet was not contesting the resisting arrest charge, but lacked the purposeful and knowing elements required to commit officer assault. The prosecutor then convinced the jury that Audet had essentially conceded the mental state by conceding guilt for resisting arrest, and Audet was convicted on both counts. On appeal, Audet contended that counsel's conduct constituted ineffective assistance, warranting reversal. The Supreme Court applied the Strickland test and dismissed the claim. The record did not reveal why counsel chose to concede the resisting arrest charge to the jury, so the court was unable to determine whether the decision constituted an unreasonable defense strategy that would overcome the presumption that counsel's actions fell within the range of reasonable professional conduct. Pursuant to St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), Audet's direct appeal was dismissed without prejudice to the ineffective assistance issue being raised in a postconviction relief proceeding. St. v. Audet, 2004 MT 224, 322 M 415, 96 P3d 1144 (2004). See also St. v. Hendricks, 2003 MT 223, 317 M 177, 75 P3d 1268 (2003).

Proper Consideration in Postconviction Relief Proceedings of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claims Based on Conversations off Record: In postconviction relief proceedings, Thurston contended that he was provided ineffective assistance of counsel because: (1) he had given counsel information needed to support at least seven criteria for designating Thurston as a nondangerous offender, but counsel failed to raise the mitigating information at the sentencing hearing; (2) counsel did not discuss with Thurston how to refute testimony by the state's witnesses until they were walking to the sentencing hearing and it was too late; and (3) counsel failed to provide Thurston with an accurate portrayal of the sentence contained in a plea agreement. The District Court dismissed the claims on grounds that they would have been reflected in the record and should have been raised on direct appeal. The Supreme Court disagreed. The basis for the claims rested on conversations that Thurston had with counsel outside the courtroom and thus by their very nature could not have been reflected in transcripts or the record. The Supreme Court therefore reversed and ordered the District Court to consider the issues on their merits in accordance with the ineffective assistance test in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). Thurston v. St., 2004 MT 142, 321 M 411, 91 P3d 1259 (2004).

Record Devoid of Reasons for Counsel's Conduct During Voir Dire — Ineffective Assistance Claim Improperly Raised on Direct Appeal: Defendant's claims of ineffective assistance of counsel during voir dire could not be addressed without considering matters outside the record and were therefore inappropriate for direct appeal. The claims were thus dismissed without prejudice to defendant's pursuit of the claims in postconviction proceedings. St. v. Vukasin, 2003 MT 230, 317 M 204, 75 P3d 1284 (2003), following St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), and St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003).

Counsel Decision to Forego Certain Defense Considered Trial Strategy — Insufficient Record to Determine Effective Assistance of Counsel on Direct Appeal: On direct appeal, Hendricks contended that he was provided ineffective assistance of counsel in his assault trial because his attorney failed to raise the affirmative defense of justifiable use of force. However, in a disclosure statement filed prior to the omnibus hearing, Hendricks's counsel specifically noted that the defense of justifiable use of force would not be asserted. On the morning of trial, counsel stated that no jury instructions on the defense of justifiable use of force would be offered. Thus, the decision not to raise the defense was made consciously and was not the result of ignorance or neglect and was presumed to be sound trial strategy falling within the realm of reasonable professional conduct absent evidence to the contrary. Absent a sufficient record to address the issue of ineffective assistance, the direct appeal was dismissed, requiring Hendricks to raise the issue by a postconviction relief proceeding, if at all. The Supreme Court clarified that it will no longer use the approach in St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001), to determine effective assistance of counsel, but rather the procedure set out in St. v. Herrmann, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), and St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003). St. v. Hendricks, 2003 MT 223, 317 M 177, 75 P3d 1268 (2003), followed in St. v. Webster, 2005 MT 38, 326 M 112, 107 P3d 500 (2005).

Use of Prior Convictions to Enhance Offense When Defendant Waived Right to Counsel During Prior Convictions: In 1989 and 2001, Markuson was charged with misdemeanor partner or family member assault. In both cases, he waived the right to counsel and pleaded guilty. In 2002, Markuson was again charged with partner or family member assault, and based on the two prior convictions, the third charge was designated as a felony. Markuson contended that the use of the alleged constitutionally infirm prior convictions to enhance the 2002 charge was improper because the Justice's Court in the prior cases failed to advise of the dangers and disadvantages of self-representation when the right to counsel was waived. In this case, the Supreme Court disagreed. Although the state may not use constitutionally infirm prior convictions to enhance a subsequently charged offense, a rebuttable presumption of regularity attaches to prior convictions. However, Markuson failed to demonstrate that the prior waivers of the right to counsel were not knowing and voluntary. Markuson's affidavit was insufficient to demonstrate that the prior convictions were constitutionally infirm, and the felony conviction was affirmed. St. v. Markuson, 2003 MT 206, 317 M 43, 75 P3d 298 (2003), distinguishing U.S. v. Akins, 276 F3d 1141 (9th Cir. 2001), and followed, with regard to charging felony DUI based on prior convictions, in St. v. Wolfe, 2003 MT 222, 317 M 173, 75 P3d 1271 (2003), and St. v. Joseph, 2003 MT 226, 317 M 186, 75 P3d 1273 (2003).

Failure of Defense Counsel to Question Defendant's Mental Condition During Sentencing — Alleged Errors in Attorney Performance Properly Resolved in Postconviction Relief Proceeding: Watson petitioned for postconviction relief and claimed that defense counsel provided inadequate assistance at sentencing by not questioning whether Watson suffered from a mental disease or defect. The District Court denied the petition, determining that the ineffective assistance claim was record-based and should have been raised on direct appeal. In St. v. Harris, 2001 MT 231, 306 M 525, 36 P3d 372 (2001), the Supreme Court outlined a two-step process for determining whether ineffective assistance claims should have been raised on appeal or in a postconviction hearing. First, the trial record must adequately document a challenged act or omission of defense counsel for a defendant to raise an ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal. Second, the record on appeal must afford sufficient understanding of the reasons for counsel's act or omission to answer the threshold question of whether the alleged error expressed a trial strategy or tactical decision, and if the record does not supply the reason for counsel's act or omission, the claim must be raised by petition for postconviction relief. Here, the record was devoid of any evidence as to why counsel did not question Watson's mental condition, so Watson could not have properly raised an ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal. Therefore, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded for an evidentiary postconviction hearing to determine whether counsel's act or omission was a trial strategy or tactical decision. Watson v. St., 2002 MT 329, 313 M 209, 61 P3d 759 (2002), following Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). See also Soraich v. St., 2002 MT 187, 311 M 90, 53 P3d 878 (2002).

Complaints of Ineffective Counsel Not Seemingly Substantial — Gallagher Test: Under the test set out in St. v. Gallagher, 1998 MT 70, 288 M 180, 955 P2d 1371 (1998), when presented with allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel that purportedly require appointment of new counsel, a District Court must make an adequate initial inquiry into the nature of the complaints and determine if they are seemingly substantial. Only if the complaints are seemingly substantial, the court must appoint new counsel to represent defendant at a hearing on the merits of the motion for new counsel. Initial inquiries into allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel are considered adequate when the District Court considers defendant's factual complaints together with counsel's explanations addressing those complaints. Here, the initial inquiry included a hearing at which defendant gave a lengthy oral explanation of complaints about the public defender and substitute counsel, with an opportunity for substitute counsel to respond to the complaints, after which the District Court concluded that defendant's complaints were not seemingly substantial. The inquiry was adequate, and the Supreme Court affirmed that conclusion. St. v. Kellames, 2002 MT 41, 308 M 347, 43 P3d 293 (2002).

Failure of Trial Counsel to Request Ruling on Use of Suppressed Confession for Impeachment Purposes — Absence in Record of Understanding of Counsel's Course of Action — Remand for Determination of Reasonableness of Counsel's Actions: Harris claimed ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney at trial never requested a ruling from the trial court on the prosecution's use of Harris's suppressed confession for impeachment purposes. The trial court's deferral of the ruling initially preserved the issue for appeal should the prosecution have referred to the confession at trial, but Harris's counsel decided to raise the issue of the suppressed confession on direct examination, which created an opening for the prosecution to further question Harris on cross-examination and made the appealable issue moot. The record did not reveal whether counsel's acts and omissions sprang from tactical decisions based on articulable trial strategies or reflected misunderstandings of the law and trial procedures. Because information outside the record was necessary to determine the merits of Harris's assistance of counsel claim, 46-21-105 did not bar a postconviction assertion of ineffective assistance of counsel at trial (see St. v. Whitlow, 2001 MT 208, 306 M 339, 33 P3d 877 (2001)). The Supreme Court refused to speculate on whether the alleged errors reflected a coherent trial strategy or whether they were reasonable and deserved deference, so the case was remanded for an evidentiary hearing to determine whether counsel's actions fell below an objective standard of reasonableness pursuant to the first prong of the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel. St. v. Harris, 2001 MT 231, 306 M 525, 36 P3d 372 (2001), followed in St. v. Worthan, 2006 MT 147, 332 M 401, 138 P3d 805 (2006).

Lack of Seemingly Substantial Complaint Regarding Effectiveness of Counsel — Failure of Court to Make Initial Inquiry Not Erroneous: After several lawyers withdrew from his case, Frazier was assigned counsel to represent him at his sentencing hearing. At the hearing, Frazier alluded to a breakdown on the attorney-client relationship when he informed the court of difficulty communicating with counsel from his jail cell. However, there was no evidence in the record that Frazier complained about counsel's performance at any time prior to judgment, nor did he request a continuance to allow additional time for consultation, ask for substitute counsel, or object to representation by stand-in counsel. Absent a direct allegation of ineffective assistance of counsel or an expressed dissatisfaction with the attorney-client relationship, the District Court did not err in failing to hold an initial inquiry into Frazier's allusion to a breakdown of the relationship to determine whether there was a seemingly substantial complaint about inadequate counsel. St. v. Frazier, 2001 MT 210, 306 M 358, 34 P3d 96 (2001). See also St. v. Gallagher, 1998 MT 70, 288 M 180, 955 P2d 1371 (1998).

Failure to Offer Alternative Jury Instruction on Aggravated Assault When Defendant Maintains Innocence on All Charges Not Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Despite a daunting evidentiary record of Aliff's commission of a rape and attempted murder, he maintained his innocence and claimed that he was home with his wife while the victim was fighting for her life. Aliff contended on appeal that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because no alternative jury instruction was offered regarding the offense of aggravated assault. However, Aliff never claimed that he intended only to assault the victim, but rather that he did not commit the crimes for which he was charged or any other offense in connection with the incident. Counsel did not provide inadequate assistance by failing to offer an instruction that was inconsistent with the defense. The instructions that were actually offered were based on trial strategy and did not stem from neglect or ignorance. Counsel's performance was not deficient in any way, and judgment was affirmed. St. v. Aliff, 2001 MT 52, 304 M 310, 21 P3d 624 (2001).

Counsel's Decision to Not Use Racial Bias Defense Preferred by Defendant: The lower court found that appointed counsel for a defendant who sought a pretrial substitution of counsel made a tactical decision not to present the racial bias defense preferred by defendant. The lower court heard testimony that counsel did not believe that he had the skills to present the defense, but counsel also testified that he thought that the defense simply was not viable. Although there was conflicting evidence, the Supreme Court would not substitute its judgment for that of the lower court, whose finding clearly had more than a scintilla of evidence to support it. St. v. Gallagher, 2001 MT 39, 304 M 215, 19 P3d 817A (2001).

Failure of Counsel to Exercise Right to Lesser Included Offense Instruction — Presumption of Effective Assistance — Failure to Provide Evidence of Ineffectiveness: Section 46-16-607(3) provides that upon a defendant's request, the court shall instruct the jury that the jury may consider a lesser included offense if the jury cannot reach a verdict on the greater offense after reasonable effort. Because of the strong presumption that counsel acted reasonably and defendant's failure to provide any evidence to the contrary, the court would not find that counsel provided ineffective assistance by failing to request the instruction. St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001).

Voluntariness of Guilty Plea Affirmed Notwithstanding Claims of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Strickland Test Not Met: Turner pleaded guilty to three counts of deliberate homicide, two counts of felony assault, and one count of aggravated burglary and was sentenced to three consecutive life sentences in prison. About 5 years after sentencing, Turner sought to withdraw his guilty plea, claiming that the plea was involuntarily given based on alleged ineffective assistance of counsel. A defendant may withdraw a guilty plea upon a showing of good cause, which may include a showing that counsel was inefficient, and the purpose of allowing withdrawal of a guilty plea is to prevent the possibility of convicting an innocent man. A plea is considered voluntary if it is made with knowledge of fundamental constitutional rights and an understanding of the nature of the crimes charged, but a plea is not involuntary simply because it was entered to avoid a greater punishment. The Supreme Court applies the two-part test in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984), when evaluating challenges to a guilty plea based on ineffective assistance of counsel. The purpose of the effective assistance of counsel guarantee is to ensure a fair trial, not to improve the quality of legal representation. The first part of the test requires a showing that counsel failed to act within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases. Turner argued that his attorney failed to adequately investigate various defense options, used the wrong procedure in obtaining a mental evaluation, failed to adequately inform Turner of the constitutional right against self-incrimination prior to the mental evaluation, and could have used different tactics in preparing the case. The fact that some other lawyer would have done differently is not grounds for branding the appointed attorney as ineffective or incompetent, and claimed inadequacy of counsel must not be tested by a greater sophistication of appellate counsel or by appellate counsel's unrivaled opportunity to study the record at leisure and cite different tactics of perhaps doubtful efficacy. Judicial scrutiny of counsel's performance must be highly deferential, and every effort must be made to eliminate the distorting effects of hindsight to reconstruct the circumstances of counsel's challenged conduct and to evaluate the conduct from counsel's perspective at the time. Although Turner showed a myriad of ways that the case could have been handled differently, that showing was nothing more than mere second-guessing of the attorney's strategy and did not equate with ineffectiveness. Turner failed to address the second prong of the Strickland test, which requires a showing that the deficient performance prejudiced the defense, arguing instead that errors under the first prong rendered the guilty plea involuntary and that if the case had been handled differently, Turner would have insisted on trial. However, that argument was contradictory to the record, which showed that Turner indicated a desire not to go to trial and even signed an acknowledgment of waiver of rights and guilty plea containing language that he did not want to put his family or the remaining members of the victims' family through a trial. The record showed that Turner's primary motivation for pleading guilty was to avoid further hurting the parties involved, and nothing counsel could have done would have altered the outcome of the case. Turner's plea was the product of a voluntary and intelligent choice among the alternative courses of action open to him, and the claim of ineffective counsel was properly rejected. St. v. Turner, 2000 MT 270, 302 M 69, 12 P3d 934, 57 St. Rep. 1127 (2000), followed, with regard to the fact that some other lawyer would have done differently is not grounds for branding the appointed attorney as ineffective or incompetent, in Stevens v. St., 2007 MT 137, 337 M 400, 162 P3d 82 (2007).

Failure to Raise Every Possible Issue on Direct Appeal of Death Sentence Not Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Dawson filed for postconviction relief, alleging 30 separate grounds for relief, but all except one claim, ineffective assistance of counsel, were dismissed. Dawson's appellate counsel withdrew, and Dawson filed an amended petition adding a 31st ground for relief, which was ineffective assistance of appellate counsel, but that petition was also denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court considered Dawson's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel during the direct appeal phase, applying the two-pronged test in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). Dawson argued that appellate counsel failed to raise all possible issues on direct appeal. However, appellate counsel was highly qualified, thoroughly prepared, and narrowed the issues to those felt to be most meritorious, and Dawson was unable to show any prejudice as a result of counsel's failure to raise other issues. Dawson received a trial with reliable results, there was no breakdown in the adversarial process, and the evidence of guilt was overwhelming. Dawson's criticism of appellate counsel used the distorting effects of hindsight to reconstruct the circumstances of counsel's conduct and did not evaluate the conduct from counsel's perspective at the time, which is prohibited by Strickland. The District Court did not err when it found that Dawson did not receive ineffective assistance at the direct appeal phase. Dawson v. St., 2000 MT 219, 301 M 135, 10 P3d 49, 57 St. Rep. 883 (2000).

No Prejudice From Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel During Pretrial Phase: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Dawson filed for postconviction relief, alleging 30 separate grounds for relief, but all except one claim, ineffective assistance of counsel, were dismissed. Dawson's appellate counsel withdrew, and Dawson filed an amended petition adding a 31st ground for relief, which was ineffective assistance of appellate counsel, but that petition was also denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court considered Dawson's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel during the pretrial phase, applying the two-pronged test in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). Dawson alleged that counsel was ineffective in failing to: (1) object to the procedure and use of Dawson's psychiatric evaluation; (2) advise him of his rights during the evaluation process; and (3) conduct an adequate pretrial investigation. On the first point, the procedure followed and the use of the psychiatric evaluation were consistent with the statutory procedure in effect at the time, and counsel had no reason to question it. On the second point, Dawson satisfied the deficiency prong of the Strickland test because he should have been informed of the potential consequences of participating in the evaluation; however, there was no evidence that Dawson was prejudiced at trial or sentencing. Dawson's version of the crimes was consistent with his defense theory, and at no time did he admit killing the victims, so counsel's failure to advise him of his Miranda rights was not prejudicial. On the third point, Dawson could not establish prejudice as a result of counsel's failure to obtain complete records and staff notes of the evaluation, to investigate Dawson's possible epilepsy, or to investigate or pursue Dawson's drug use—at trial or at sentencing as a mitigating factor. The District Court did not err when it found that Dawson did not receive ineffective assistance at the pretrial phase. Dawson v. St., 2000 MT 219, 301 M 135, 10 P3d 49, 57 St. Rep. 883 (2000). See also St. v. Armfield, 214 M 229, 693 P2d 1226 (1984), St. v. Smith, 217 M 453, 705 P2d 1110 (1985), and Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674 (1997).

No Prejudice From Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel During Trial Phase — Reasonable Trial Strategy: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Dawson filed for postconviction relief, alleging 30 separate grounds for relief, but all except one claim, ineffective assistance of counsel, were dismissed. Dawson's appellate counsel withdrew, and Dawson filed an amended petition adding a 31st ground for relief, which was ineffective assistance of appellate counsel, but that petition was also denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court considered Dawson's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel during the trial phase. Dawson alleged that counsel was ineffective in: (1) agreeing to the procedure used to present the testimony of the state's key witness, which involved questioning of the witness by the guardian ad litem; (2) failing to corroborate the defense theory through examination of the witness; (3) failing to give an opening statement; (4) failing to object to guilt phase errors, including improper questions and comments by the state; (5) failing to obtain experts to testify regarding Dawson's drug ingestion, head injuries, and EEG tests; and (6) failing to give a closing argument. On the first point, counsel's decision to use a special procedure to examine the fragile witness was reasonable, and Dawson agreed to the procedure. On the second point, counsel's decision not to subject the witness to further questioning after her very emotional testimony was also reasonable when counsel believed that further questioning would have been more damaging to the defense than helpful. Third, waiver of an opening statement was a reasonable trial tactic under the circumstances, and that decision could not form a basis for an ineffective assistance claim (see U.S. v. Rodrigues-Ramirez, 777 F2d 454 (9th Cir. 1985), and U.S. v. Nersesian, 824 F2d 1294 (2nd Cir. 1987)). Fourth, counsel's failure to object to certain prosecutorial questions and comments was reasonable and within the wide range of permissible professional legal conduct (see U.S. v. Necoechea, 986 F2d 1273 (9th Cir. 1993)). Fifth, counsel's decision not to call experts did not amount to ineffective assistance. Sixth, the decision not to give a closing statement did not constitute ineffective assistance per se and was a reasonable trial strategy that did not fall below the standard of what a minimally competent defense attorney would have done in the same circumstances (see St. v. Lee, 689 P2d 153 (Ariz. 1984)). The District Court did not err when it found that Dawson did not receive ineffective assistance at trial. Dawson v. St., 2000 MT 219, 301 M 135, 10 P3d 49, 57 St. Rep. 883 (2000).

No Prejudice From Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel During Sentencing Phase: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Dawson filed for postconviction relief, alleging 30 separate grounds for relief, but all except one claim, ineffective assistance of counsel, were dismissed. Dawson's appellate counsel withdrew, and Dawson filed an amended petition adding a 31st ground for relief, which was ineffective assistance of appellate counsel, but that petition was also denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court considered Dawson's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel during the sentencing phase. Dawson alleged that counsel was ineffective in failing to: (1) present crucial mitigating evidence to the sentencing court; (2) conduct an adequate sentencing investigation; and (3) move the sentencing court for reconsideration of its conclusion that Dawson posed a substantial and continuing threat and had no chance for rehabilitation. On the first point, Dawson contended that counsel should have offered the statement of the state's key witness regarding another man whom she saw near the crime scene, which Dawson maintained would have bolstered his defense theory that he acted under duress or coercion. However, the statement was vague, and Dawson never offered information concerning the involvement of others. Neither the jury nor the sentencing court accepted the defense theory, and Dawson could not demonstrate prejudice because of counsel's failure to offer the statement. Counsel's decision not to present or argue evidence of Dawson's drug use as a mitigating factor did not constitute ineffective assistance, given counsel's determination that evidence of drug use would have been inflammatory and prejudicial and would have been an aggravating rather than mitigating factor. Failure of counsel to present evidence at sentencing of Dawson's good behavior in jail also did not constitute ineffective assistance because that evidence was presented at the guilt phase and was thus considered at the sentencing phase as well. Second, Dawson's assertion that counsel overlooked demonstrations of remorse found in the records of the staff that conducted his psychiatric examination, which would have served to rebut the findings by the sentencing court regarding his lack of remorse, did not constitute prejudice because the court's finding was based on the court's own observations of Dawson throughout the lengthy proceedings. It was also reasonable for counsel not to investigate Dawson's medical and school records, absent any evidence that further investigation would have been beneficial. Dawson's argument that counsel erred in failing to interview boyhood friends to develop or determine the existence of mitigating evidence also failed. Counsel did present letters from Dawson's mother, sister, and former spouses, and the failure to further investigate boyhood friends did not constitute ineffective assistance. Third, counsel's failure to move the sentencing court for reconsideration of its conclusion that Dawson posed a substantial and continuing threat and had no chance for rehabilitation was not ineffective assistance given the findings in St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988), that evidence supported the sentencing court's finding of aggravating factors and that the death sentence was appropriate. The District Court did not err when it found that Dawson did not receive ineffective assistance at sentencing. Dawson v. St., 2000 MT 219, 301 M 135, 10 P3d 49, 57 St. Rep. 883 (2000).

Failure by Attorney to Investigate Effect of Defendant's Medication as Deficient Representation — Lack of Evidence of Effect of Medication on Defendant — No Prejudice: Defense counsel's failure to investigate the nature, effects, and amounts of defendant's medication was not a strategic decision based on professional deliberation and constituted deficient representation under the first prong of the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel. However, in determining that the drug had no negative effect on defendant, the District Court considered the testimony of a psychiatrist who established that the drug in question could interfere with executive brain functions and have negative side effects on a person's judgment, and therefore the failure to investigate resulted in no prejudice to defendant. The fact that defendant expressed remorse did not excuse counsel's duty to investigate the amount and effects of the medication. The court's findings were not clearly erroneous and were supported by substantial evidence in the record, including defendant's own testimony that the drug did not affect him mentally. Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P2d 734, 54 St. Rep. 890 (1997).

Failure to Request Instruction on Nonaggressor Principle of Self-Defense — Claim That Victim Was Aggressor — No Ineffective Assistance: Assault defendant's defense was that the victim was the initial aggressor. No one testified that defendant was the aggressor. The court instructed on self-defense, including the rule that the person using the defense cannot have been the aggressor, but did not instruct on exceptions to the rule. Defense counsel decided as a tactical matter not to request an exceptions instruction because it would not be consistent with the defense that the victim was the aggressor. That decision was based on informed professional deliberation and was not the result of neglect or ignorance. Thus, there was no ineffective assistance of counsel. St. v. Gonzales, 278 M 525, 926 P2d 705, 53 St. Rep. 1015 (1996).

Failure to Prove Counsel's Performance Deficient: Henry was convicted of driving under the influence, first in City Court and then in District Court. Henry appealed the District Court conviction, claiming ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court evaluates ineffective assistance of counsel claims under the two-prong Strickland test. The Supreme Court held that Henry had not established that his counsel's performance was deficient under the first prong, and for that reason, it need not address the prejudice prong. Henry was not denied effective assistance of counsel. St. v. Henry, 271 M 491, 898 P2d 1195, 52 St. Rep. 516 (1995).

Failure to Object to Testimony Not Ineffective Assistance: The Supreme Court rejected the defendant's argument that he had received ineffective counsel when his attorney failed to object to the testimony of the bank teller who identified him as the perpetrator of a robbery. The Supreme Court noted that the appellant provided no grounds on which the testimony could have been excluded if it had been objected to at the trial. St. v. Hembd, 254 M 407, 838 P2d 412, 49 St. Rep. 788 (1992).

Failure to Object to Substitution of Witness — Failure to Interview Witness: In order to prevail on a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel, a defendant must show that a reasonable probability exists that but for his counsel's deficient performance, the trial's outcome would have been different. Failure to object to the adding of a name to the list of witnesses 3 weeks before trial under the circumstances of this case was not deficient. Even if failure to interview a witness was deficient, in light of the overwhelming evidence against him, the defendant cannot make the required showing. St. v. McLain, 249 M 242, 815 P2d 147, 48 St. Rep. 664 (1991).

Failure to Engage in Voir Dire: The defendant maintained that the asking of only one question by his attorney during voir dire constituted inadequate representation. The Supreme Court held that voir dire is a very subjective process and a matter of trial tactics. The court went on to point out that the state had engaged in extensive voir dire and that defense counsel could have relied on those questions in deciding whether or not to exercise preemptory challenges. St. v. Kolberg, 241 M 105, 785 P2d 702, 47 St. Rep. 120 (1990).

Introduction of Two Prior DUI Convictions Not Prejudicial: The defendant argued that he was prejudiced by the introduction of two prior DUI convictions and that his attorney's failure to object constituted inadequate legal assistance. The Supreme Court found that although the lower court was mistaken in its belief that the prior convictions had to be introduced as an element of this offense, their admission did not prejudice the defendant, particularly in light of the substantial evidence against the defendant and an almost total absence of evidence on his behalf. St. v. Kolberg, 241 M 105, 785 P2d 702, 47 St. Rep. 120 (1990).

Twenty-Four Hours Held Timely Notice of Trial: The defendant claimed that his attorney did not inform him of the trial date until 24 hours before it was scheduled and that the short notice did not provide him adequate time to consult with his attorney. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's finding that the defense attorney was sufficiently prepared for trial and that there was insufficient evidence to warrant a continuance. St. v. Kolberg, 241 M 105, 785 P2d 702, 47 St. Rep. 120 (1990).

Defendant Not Prejudiced by Counsel's Attempt to Impeach State Witness: Defendant contended that his counsel's performance was deficient because he failed to adequately present evidence to impeach the state's key witness against the defendant. Defendant's allegations of error amount to an attempt to second guess his counsel's trial tactics and strategies. When, as in this case, no prejudice to defendant is shown, the court will not question counsel's professional deliberations. St. v. Stewart, 235 M 239, 767 P2d 296, 45 St. Rep. 2350 (1988).

Effective Assistance of Counsel — Two-Part Test: In holding that the record does not support the defendant's claim of ineffective counsel, the Montana Supreme Court followed the two-part test adopted in St. v. Boyer, 215 M 143, 695 P2d 829, 42 St. Rep. 247 (1985). The defendant had to show that counsel's performance was deficient and that the deficient performance prejudiced the defense. In this case, the defendant's attempts to disqualify the judge were disallowed due to the defendant's own procedural error before counsel became involved in the defense. St. v. Hoch, 234 M 405, 763 P2d 1119, 45 St. Rep. 2007 (1988).

Failure to Hold Hearing Regarding Effective Assistance of Counsel — Reversible Error: Defendant represented herself after requesting removal of counsel and being denied appointment of substitute counsel. The trial court determined defendant was competent to represent and that she had made a knowing and voluntary waiver of counsel. However, it was error for the court to fail to hold an independent hearing to establish whether defendant had received effective representation and to determine the validity of her complaints concerning counsel. Failure to make such determination deprived defendant of the opportunity to make a meaningful choice to proceed pro se, infringing the right to effective assistance of counsel and the right to a fair trial, and constituted reversible error. St. v. Enright, 233 M 225, 758 P2d 779, 45 St. Rep. 1442 (1988), followed in St. v. Weaver, 276 M 505, 917 P2d 437, 53 St. Rep. 495 (1996). See also St. v. Gallagher, 1998 MT 70, 288 M 180, 955 P2d 1371, 55 St. Rep. 284 (1998), and St. v. Hanson, 1999 MT 226, 296 M 82, 988 P2d 299, 56 St. Rep. 891 (1999), distinguishing Weaver.

Request for Substitution of Counsel Denied — No Incompetence or Prejudice: Defendant asserted it was error for the District Court to deny his motion for substitution of counsel based on claims of attorney incompetence in the field of criminal law and prejudice due to the attorney being influenced by his brother, who had previously prosecuted the defendant. It was within the court's discretion to deny new counsel after finding that the attorney had practiced law, including criminal law, for 30 years. Further, prejudice and conflict of interest would be present only if the attorney's brother's prior prosecution of defendant and the charges at issue overlapped; however, the proceedings were entirely different. St. v. Martz, 233 M 136, 760 P2d 65, 45 St. Rep. 1370 (1988).

No Conflict of Interest Because Defendant's Father Paid for and Conferred With Counsel: The fact that defendant's father paid for defendant's attorney and consulted with the attorney concerning defendant's defense does not establish a conflict of interest. Defendant was not denied effective assistance of counsel because of his father's involvement with the attorney. St. v. Pease, 227 M 424, 740 P2d 659, 44 St. Rep. 1203 (1987).

Effectiveness of Counsel Who Withdrew Self-Defense and Mental Disease Defenses: It was not error for counsel to withdraw defenses of justifiable use of force and mental disease or defect when the former was unsupported by the facts and the doctors who examined defendant stated he did not have a mental disease or defect and could have acted with the requisite mental state. St. v. Docken, 222 M 58, 720 P2d 679, 43 St. Rep. 1058 (1986).

Suppression of Confession — Drugs and Memory Lapse Allegedly Causing Involuntariness: Counsel's decision to not file a motion to suppress client's confession was not error when there was no evidence in the record to support client's claim that he was under the influence of alcohol or drugs when he made the confession, his claim that he did not remember the confession was rebutted by his reiteration of the sequence of events to the court before he entered his guilty plea, and he signed a memo restating the facts. St. v. Docken, 222 M 58, 720 P2d 679, 43 St. Rep. 1058 (1986).

Effective Assistance of Counsel — Potential Charges Against Counsel as Conflict of Interest: Defendant asserted he did not receive effective assistance of counsel where his retained trial counsel mishandled the murder weapon and neither his counsel, the District Court Judge, nor the prosecutor informed him of the possible charges against his counsel which could have resulted in a conflict of interest between defendant and his counsel. The Supreme Court found that the record and findings made after the evidentiary hearing may have demonstrated improper action of counsel. However, given his conduct during trial, his testimony at the evidentiary hearing that he was not aware of any impending charges, the prosecutor's decision not to press charges but only refer the matter for investigation, and the lack of charges until the trial was completed, defendant was not denied effective assistance because of any misconduct of defense counsel or any failure to inform him of the possible charges prior to completion of the trial. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986).

Failure to Inform Defendant of Complete Case Against Him: It appeared defendant had his plea bargain practically guaranteed before Houtz was appointed. Houtz, after reviewing the case against his client, determined the plea bargain to be reasonable and fair. He therefore pursued and achieved finalization of that bargain. The Supreme Court also found the plea bargain to be reasonable and fair. The court was not persuaded that had defendant been advised of the victim's and a witness' inconsistent statements, he would have opted to proceed to trial on the attempted deliberate homicide charge. Thus, counsel's failure to advise his client of the complete case against him did not undermine the court's confidence in the eventual outcome, the plea bargain. St. v. LaTray, 220 M 358, 715 P2d 52, 43 St. Rep. 429 (1986).

Failure to Show Incompetency: Defendant was charged with two felonies occurring at about the same time and had been convicted of a felony 5 years prior to the current charges. Defendant pleaded guilty to avoid increased punishment as a persistent felony offender. Later, defendant sought to withdraw the guilty plea on grounds of coercion and ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court denied the motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The defendant failed to show that his attorney's counseling was inadequate, incompetent, or not within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases. Counsel was not ineffective when the attorney consulted with other criminal counsel and did all things to properly defend. St. v. Williamson, 218 M 242, 707 P2d 530, 42 St. Rep. 1551 (1985).

Six and a Half Weeks to Prepare for Burglary-Theft Trial — Sufficient Time: There was nothing to indicate that, when counsel for defendant convicted of two counts of burglary and one of theft had 6 ½ weeks to prepare for trial, the attorney had insufficient time to adequately prepare and nothing to indicate that effective assistance of counsel was denied. St. v. Robbins, 218 M 107, 708 P2d 227, 42 St. Rep. 1440 (1985).

Decision to Not Call a Witness: Defendant was convicted of felony theft of a jackhammer. New counsel appealed on the grounds that defendant was denied a fair trial and effective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court remanded for an evidentiary hearing. The Supreme Court agreed with the findings and conclusions the trial court made at the hearing. Defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel was not supported by the evidence. First defense counsel's decision to not call a defense witness at trial was clearly within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases. The witness supposedly could have testified that he gave the jackhammer to defendant, but the witness' statement was not only inconsistent with known facts but destructive to the defendant's case. St. v. Field, 215 M 361, 697 P2d 1339, 42 St. Rep. 431 (1985).

Denial of Continuance When Attorney Informed of Appointment 25 Days Before Homicide Trial — Fair Trial and Effective Assistance Rights Denied: Attorney for defendant charged with deliberate homicide was relieved of his duty on December 14, and the new attorney learned of his appointment on December 30. On January 3, trial was set for January 24, and the new attorney was notified of the trial date on January 5. He spoke with the trial Judge on January 10 about a continuance, and on January 17 a motion for continuance was heard and denied. In the 7 days before trial, the attorney was able to interview only 8 of the state's 12 witnesses and could not locate possible defense witnesses or interview the state's pathologist. Refusal of the continuance was an abuse of discretion and reversible error requiring a new trial. The attorney's diligence was unquestioned, and though the state had a right to a speedy trial, the defendant's right to a fair trial must take precedence, particularly since defendant waived his speedy trial right. Defendant's rights to a fair trial and effective assistance of counsel were denied. St. v. Sotelo, 209 M 86, 679 P2d 779, 41 St. Rep. 568 (1984).

Remand to Determine Effective Assistance of Counsel: The defendant was convicted of two counts of sexual intercourse without consent, and after a failure to perfect his appeal, the defendant's original counsel was disbarred. On appeal taken by the defendant's second counsel, the Supreme Court reviewed the record of the original trial wherein the defendant's first lawyer was shown to have been put on notice of the existence and location of evidence he did not properly examine and wherein it was shown that the first appeal was not perfected. Because it could not determine from these facts whether the defendant had received effective assistance of counsel at trial, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court for an evidentiary hearing on the issue. St. v. Boyer, 208 M 258, 676 P2d 787, 41 St. Rep. 321 (1984). On remand, counsel's efforts were found to constitute effective assistance. St. v. Boyer, 215 M 143, 695 P2d 829, 42 St. Rep. 247 (1985).

Found Effective: Counsels' efforts were effective and client was adequately represented. St. v. Dess, 207 M 396, 674 P2d 501, 41 St. Rep. 31 (1984); Digiallonardo v. Betzer, 163 M 104, 515 P2d 705 (1973); St. v. Perry, 161 M 155, 505 P2d 113 (1973).

Conflict of Interest — Representation by Former Assistant County Attorney — Presence of Counsel for Codefendant at Initial Hearing: Where the defendant to a hit-and-run charge signed a motion to continue his case, which motion contained a paragraph notifying him that his retained counsel had previously worked for the County Attorney, the Supreme Court held that since the defendant signed the motion and retained the lawyer anyway, he had waived his right to assert any conflict of interest charge. The Supreme Court also held that inasmuch as the defendant had, under St. v. Dieziger, 200 M 267, 650 P2d 800, 39 St. Rep. 1734 (1982), no right to counsel at his initial hearing, he could not claim a conflict of interest by the presence of his wife's attorney at that hearing. St. v. Henricks, 206 M 469, 672 P2d 20, 40 St. Rep. 1786 (1983).

Postconviction Relief — Burden of Proving Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — No Prejudice Shown: Where the defendant alleged, in his petition for postconviction relief, that he had received ineffective assistance of counsel at trial because his attorney: (1) failed to invoke the spousal privilege on the defendant's behalf; (2) failed to interview a witness and call other witnesses; (3) was absent from a presentence investigation report interview; and (4) failed to object to alleged misconduct by the prosecutor, the Supreme Court found, under the rationale of St. v. LaValley, 203 M 393, 661 P2d 869, 40 St. Rep. 527 (1983), and Fitzpatrick v. St., 206 M 205, 671 P2d 1, 40 St. Rep. 1598 (1983), that the defendant had an especially heavy burden of proving ineffective assistance of counsel when that issue was raised for the first time in a petition for postconviction relief and could have been previously raised on direct appeal. The court found that the defendant failed to show how he was prejudiced by the alleged acts constituting ineffective assistance. St. v. Henricks, 206 M 469, 672 P2d 20, 40 St. Rep. 1786 (1983), overruled, to the extent that it stands for the proposition that the Supreme Court can review issues in postconviction proceedings that could have been raised on direct appeal, in Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995).

Capital Cases — Standard of Review for Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Where the defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping and deliberate homicide and appealed the District Court's denial of his petition for postconviction relief, the Supreme Court declined to adopt a standard of review for ineffective assistance of counsel for capital cases different from the standard used in other criminal cases. The court found that numerous practical problems would be presented by such an approach and instead reaffirmed the application of the standard set forth in Cooper v. Fitzharris, 586 F2d 1325 (9th Cir. 1978). The court also found that the defendant had not met his burden of proof of showing ineffective assistance of counsel whether the court applied the standard set out in Cooper or another standard urged by the defendant and set out in Knight v. Florida, 394 So2d 997 (Fla. 1981), and U.S. v. DeCoster, 624 F2d 196 (Dist.Col. Cir. 1979). Fitzpatrick v. St., 206 M 205, 671 P2d 1, 40 St. Rep. 1598 (1983).

Conflict of Interest of Defense Counsel Waived or Not Proven — Ineffective Assistance Not Shown: Where the defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping and deliberate homicide, the District Court did not err in dismissing the defendant's petition for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The conflict of interest alleged by defendant in his trial counsel allegedly arose because his counsel had defended a codefendant to which the defendant wanted to shift suspicion for the crimes committed. However, as a result of the first trial, the codefendant was acquitted of the charges and any attempt to shift suspicion would be impossible because the codefendant may not be retried. Even had there been a conflict of interest, the defendant, under the rationale of U.S. v. Partin, 601 F2d 1000 (9th Cir. 1979), waived his right to raise the issue by his agreement at his pretrial hearing to accept Mr. Adams as his defense counsel, knowing that Mr. Adams had also defended a codefendant, and by not raising the issue of a conflict of interest at trial. Fitzpatrick v. St., 206 M 205, 671 P2d 1, 40 St. Rep. 1598 (1983).

Failure to Present Evidence in Mitigation of Sentencing — Ineffective Assistance Not Shown: Where the defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping and deliberate homicide, the District Court did not err in dismissing the defendant's petition for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The failure of defense counsel to raise the issue, at sentencing, of defendant's headaches and dizzy spells did not amount to ineffective assistance, as the defendant had not shown the relevancy of those headaches and spells to the sentencing process. Moreover, defense counsel did inform the District Court at sentencing that a previous statement of his concerning a murder committed by the defendant in prison was made mistakenly; but in light of other testimony, this slip of the tongue placed the defendant in an even more favorable light than the prosecution could have presented if the facts had become a contested point and was therefore nonprejudicial and did not show ineffective assistance of counsel. Fitzpatrick v. St., 206 M 205, 671 P2d 1, 40 St. Rep. 1598 (1983).

Failure to Use Evidentiary Material and Witnesses — Ineffective Assistance Not Shown: Where the defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping and deliberate homicide, the District Court did not err in dismissing the defendant's petition for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. Defense counsel was not ineffective simply because he did not present evidence used in the trial of an acquitted codefendant and because he did not call witnesses urged by the defendant. The defendant overlooked the fact that in the trial of the codefendant, the state's key witness failed to appear. This fact alone explains the acquittal of the codefendant. There were also rational explanations for defense counsel's failure to call each of the witnesses urged by the defendant, such as the fact that the witnesses were hostile, had poor memories, or showed poor demeanor in the presence of the jury. A failure to call witnesses for these kinds of reasons does not show ineffective assistance of counsel. Fitzpatrick v. St., 206 M 205, 671 P2d 1, 40 St. Rep. 1598 (1983).

Insufficient Trial Preparation — Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Not Shown: Where the defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping and deliberate homicide, the District Court did not err in dismissing the defendant's petition for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The only item of evidence submitted by the defendant to support his claim of insufficient trial preparation by defense counsel was a caseload listing showing the criminal cases assigned to defendant's counsel. An examination of the exhibit showed that many of the cases had been dismissed or did not come to trial until after the trial of the defendant's case, and the exhibit did not otherwise show a preclusion of preparation time for defense counsel. An examination of the records also showed that the pace of court calendaring meant that cases filed after the defendant's could not mature into triable contested cases until after the conclusion of the defendant's trial. The defendant therefore failed to demonstrate that defense counsel was insufficiently prepared. Fitzpatrick v. St., 206 M 205, 671 P2d 1, 40 St. Rep. 1598 (1983).

Failure to Cooperate With Court-Appointed Counsel — No Right of Defendant to "Meaningful Attorney-Client Relationship": Where the defendant had been convicted of arson and sought to have his second court-appointed counsel replaced by arguing the failure of his attorney to communicate with him concerning his (the defendant's) version of the facts of his case amounting to an alibi defense, the District Court did not err in refusing to replace the second appointed counsel and the defendant was not thereby denied his right to effective assistance of counsel. In Morris v. Slappy, 461 US 1, 75 L Ed 2d 610, 103 S Ct 1610 (1983), the U.S. Supreme Court denied the existence of the "meaningful attorney-client relationship" test urged by the defendant. Moreover, the record shows that if defendant's counsel failed to present the defendant's view of the facts at trial, it was not caused by lack of diligence on counsel's part but by failure of the defendant to cooperate with his attorney. Any lack of communication between the defendant and his lawyer therefore did not prevent effective assistance of counsel. St. v. Long, 206 M 40, 669 P2d 1068, 40 St. Rep. 1493 (1983).

Defendant Speculating as to Existence of Possible Evidence: During trial the defense counsel made a vigorous attempt to establish the theory that bullets fired by the defendant ricocheted off the ground into the victims. The defendant later claimed he was denied effective assistance of counsel by his counsel's failure to cross-examine an expert witness about the possible presence of ricochet marks on the bullet removed from the victim's body. Because defendant was engaging in wild speculation as to the existence of possible evidence, his argument was without merit. St. v. Dupre, 200 M 165, 650 P2d 1381, 39 St. Rep. 1660 (1982).

No Objection Raised to Improper Argument by Prosecution — Appealability: Although objection to the prosecutor's argument may not be raised on appeal if it has not been raised at trial, if failure to object below is the basis for an effective assistance of counsel issue, it will be considered on appeal. If a prejudicial prosecutorial argument is alleged, it will not be presumed. Rather it must be established from the record that a substantial right has been denied. St. v. Dupre, 200 M 165, 650 P2d 1381, 39 St. Rep. 1660 (1982).

No Objection to Conclusory Inferences by Prosecutor: In an appeal alleging ineffective assistance of counsel in that counsel failed to object to the prosecution's conclusory inferences that the victims were wounded while attempting to flee from the defendant, because there was substantial evidence to support the inferences, the prosecutor's comments were proper. St. v. Dupre, 200 M 165, 650 P2d 1381, 39 St. Rep. 1660 (1982).

Failure to Seek Jury Instruction on Lesser Included Offense — Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Counsel for a defendant charged with deliberate homicide failed to offer an instruction on negligent homicide and objected to an instruction on mitigated deliberate homicide. Because the decision not to seek jury instruction on lesser included offenses was reasoned and tactical, it did not amount to a denial of effective assistance of counsel as guaranteed by the sixth amendment to the United States Constitution (similar to Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const.). Bashor v. Risley, 539 F. Supp. 259, 39 St. Rep. 960 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Claimed Defense Wrong One and Not Supported by Evidence: Defendant convicted of felony theft and robbery could not have the convictions overturned on basis of alleged denial of effective assistance of appointed counsel where: (1) the defense was that the requisite "purposely or knowingly" mental state for the crimes could not have been formed due to defendant's heavy use of drugs and alcohol during the period prior to the crime; (2) defendant was convicted and a new attorney named; (3) defendant then claimed the defense was unfounded by the evidence and should have been based upon a discrediting of the witnesses testifying to defendant's identity; (4) the defense testimony on drug-alcohol usage did not appear to support the defense; and (5) the prosecution's identification evidence was so strong that the defense attorney had little choice but to choose not to base his defense upon discrediting it. St. v. Kubas, 197 M 185, 642 P2d 147, 39 St. Rep. 456 (1982).

Test:

A person accused of a crime is entitled to the effective assistance of counsel acting within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases. St. v. Kubas, 197 M 185, 642 P2d 147, 39 St. Rep. 456 (1982).

Effective counsel does not mean one in which the defendant has confidence. Success is not the test of efficient counsel; frequently neither vigor, zeal, nor skill can overcome the truth. St. v. Forsness, 159 M 105, 495 P2d 176 (1972), followed in St. v. Martz, 233 M 136, 760 P2d 65, 45 St. Rep. 1370 (1988).

The Supreme Court is reluctant to second-guess defense counsel or to speculate on alternative trial tactics, particularly when counsel is vastly experienced and of unquestioned reputation. St. v. Callaghan, 144 M 401, 396 P2d 821 (1964); Tomich v. St., 141 M 487, 379 P2d 114 (1963).

The strategy of counsel will not be second-guessed to determine what could have been done to achieve a possible but highly speculative result. For assistance to be ineffective, it must be so deficient as to render the trial a farce and a mockery. St. v. Noller, 142 M 35, 381 P2d 293 (1963).

Effective Assistance of Counsel — Denial of Continuance: Defendant sought to substitute counsel on the afternoon before his scheduled trial date on the charge of robbery. The defendant also sought a continuance. When considering the motion for substitution of counsel, the court specifically questioned the defendant, after making him aware that his motion for continuance would not be granted, as to whether he still wanted substituted counsel. The defendant said he did. Defendant argued that by denying his request for a continuance his attorney was unprepared and he was denied effective assistance of counsel. In denying his petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, the federal court said that the defendant could have cooperated with his court-appointed counsel or he could have chosen his own counsel in sufficient time for that counsel to become prepared. He did neither. He was not deprived of a right; he failed to exercise the rights he had. Spurlock v. Risley, 520 F. Supp. 135, 38 St. Rep. 1339 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

Effect of Delay of Payment to Appointed Counsel: The defendant's claims that the failure of the court to provide funds in advance for the appointed defense counsel created a "chilling effect" and that by the time funds became available there was inadequate time in which to prepare a defense were rejected because the defendant failed to show that the alleged lack of preparation prejudiced him in any way. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Voluntary Confession in Absence of Counsel: A confession made after 3 hours' interrogation of the accused, who was advised of his right to counsel and his right to remain silent, was not rendered inadmissible by the absence of counsel when the accused never requested assistance of counsel and the confession was voluntarily given. St. v. White, 146 M 226, 405 P2d 761 (1965).

Failure of Appointed Counsel to Perfect Appeal: When the District Court appointed counsel for the defendant and ordered preparation of the record for an appeal to the Supreme Court, all at public expense, the defendant having had no voice in the choice, in the interest of justice it was incumbent upon the Supreme Court to consider the contended errors although court-appointed counsel failed to timely file the notice of appeal. St. v. Frodsham, 139 M 222, 362 P2d 413 (1961).

Time to Prepare Case: It is the duty of the court to make the appointment effective by giving a reasonable time for the preparation of the case. St. v. Blakeslee, 131 M 47, 306 P2d 1103 (1957).

INEFFECTIVE ASSISTANCE

Petition for Postconviction Relief Alleging Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Filed in District Court — Immunity of Attorney Assisting in Proceedings — Gillham Clarified: At the time of the decision in In re Gillham, 218 M 187, 707 P2d 1100 (1985), petitions for postconviction relief were addressed to the Supreme Court. Because the postconviction procedure has changed, pursuant to 46-21-105, petitions for postconviction relief are now initially filed in District Court. Thus, the Supreme Court clarified that petitions for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel may now be filed in the District Court where the postconviction proceeding is pending. The court affirmed that an attorney ordered to respond to a Gillham order issued by a District Court is not subject to a disciplinary proceeding before the Commission on Practice or subject to charges of malpractice. The immunity extends to all information, testimony, or documents necessarily provided in response to the allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel. Marble v. St., 2007 MT 98, 337 M 99, 169 P3d 1148 (2007).

Failure of Counsel to Suppress Letters Absent Showing That Letters Written Within Forty-Eight Hours of Arrest Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: In Hope's trial for assault, Hope's counsel failed to move to suppress four letters written by Hope regarding Hope's relationship with the victim. The state did not show that any of the letters were written within 48 hours of Hope's arrest, so the District Court erred when it did not conclude that the letters should be suppressed, and counsel's failure to move to suppress the evidence resulted in the introduction of evidence that negated Hope's overall defense that he did not have an intimate relationship with the victim and did not assault her, constituting ineffective assistance of counsel. Counsel's failure was prejudicial reversible error, and the Supreme Court remanded for a new trial. Hope v. St., 2003 MT 191, 316 M 497, 74 P3d 1039 (2003).

Failure of Counsel to Properly Withdraw or Preserve Direct Appeal — Denial of Postconviction Petition Erroneous: Adams filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief, alleging ineffective assistance of counsel because his original court-appointed attorney failed to move to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial and because his subsequently appointed trial counsel offered a lesser included instruction on aggravated assault to the jury and failed to appeal to the Supreme Court following Adams' conviction, despite Adams' request to do so. The petition was denied on grounds that Adams failed to file an appeal within 60 days of judgment as required by former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), and Adams appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Under 46-8-103, appointed counsel is required to continue representation until final judgment, including appellate review, unless counsel is relieved by court order. Adams' counsel failed to comply with the requirements of 46-8-103 and effect a valid withdrawal, so the right to appeal was not preserved. When a defendant would have appealed but for counsel's deficient performance, the error is prejudicial. Thus, denial of Adams' petition for postconviction relief on procedural grounds was reversible error, and on remand, Adams was allowed to raise the issues that would have been raised on direct appeal but for counsel's abandonment of the appeal, as well as the issues raised in the petition for postconviction relief that were not previously raised. St. v. Adams, 2002 MT 202, 311 M 202, 54 P3d 50 (2002), following In re Petition of Hans, 1998 MT 7, 288 M 168, 958 P2d 1175 (1998), and St. v. Rogers, 2001 MT 165, 306 M 130, 32 P3d 724 (2001).

Failure of District Court to Hold Hearing After Initial Inquiry Indicated Possible Ineffective Assistance — Remand for Hearing: Gallagher was charged with one count of felony assault (now assault with a weapon). At a hearing intended to be a change of plea hearing, LaFountain, Gallagher's public defender, put Gallagher on the witness stand. Gallagher testified as to the conflicts between him and LaFountain, those conflicts being LaFountain's advice to Gallagher that Gallagher plead guilty when Gallagher did not want to do so and a personality conflict between Gallagher and LaFountain. Gallagher then requested the District Court to appoint different counsel, but no change of counsel was made. Shortly before trial, LaFountain filed a motion to withdraw, but the motion was denied. Citing Billings v. Smith, 281 M 133, 932 P2d 1058 (1997), the Supreme Court determined that the District Court did make an adequate initial inquiry into Gallagher's complaint of ineffective assistance when the District Court heard testimony by Gallagher, at what was supposed to be a change of plea hearing, concerning the conflicts between Gallagher and LaFountain. However, the Supreme Court also held that the first hearing put the District Court on notice that Gallagher's complaints were seemingly substantial and that the District Court should therefore have held a second hearing to further investigate those complaints. Because the District Court failed to hold a second hearing, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court and required that the District Court hold a second hearing to determine if Gallagher's right to effective assistance of counsel was denied, saying that if his right was denied, then the judgment and sentence against him are vacated, including any fines and costs imposed, and that a new trial is ordered. St. v. Gallagher, 1998 MT 70, 288 M 180, 955 P2d 1371, 55 St. Rep. 284 (1998), followed in Wilson v. St., 1999 MT 271, 296 M 465, 989 P2d 813, 56 St. Rep. 1096 (1999), St. v. Weaver, 2001 MT 115, 305 M 315, 28 P3d 451 (2001), and Halley v. St., 2008 MT 193, 344 M 37, 186 P3d 859 (2008), and overruled, to the extent that it stands for the proposition that a criminal defendant has a right to a "meaningful attorney-client relationship", in St. v. Gallagher, 2001 MT 39, 304 M 215, 19 P3d 817A (2001).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Minute Entry of Defense Counsel's Comments Held Not Prejudicial on Charge of Bail-Jumping — Instruction on Notice to Attorney Not Prejudicial: Wereman was convicted of bail-jumping after a trial in which he testified that he failed to appear because he thought that the charge would be dismissed. The Supreme Court held that a comment by defense counsel, that counsel did not know where Wereman was, made earlier when Wereman failed to appear on a charge of aggravated assault, did not represent a conflict of interest between counsel and Wereman and did not constitute ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court stated that because Wereman himself stated that he failed to appear because he thought that the charges would be dismissed, not because he lacked notice, the comments by defense counsel contained in a minute entry did not impact on counsel's ability to represent Wereman and were not prejudicial. Citing St. v. Blackbird, 187 M 270, 609 P2d 708 (1980), the Supreme Court also held that the District Court's instruction imputing notice to Wereman from his defense counsel should not have been given but that in this case, the giving of the instruction was harmless error. St. v. Wereman, 273 M 245, 902 P2d 1009, 52 St. Rep. 958 (1995).

Ineffective Assistance Claims Denied — No Prejudice Shown Under Strickland Test: Applying the Strickland test for determining effectiveness of counsel, the Supreme Court dismissed defendant's claims that he was ineffectively represented at trial, during the penalty phase proceedings, and during the course of direct appeal, including claims based on: (1) failure to object to prosecutor's statements that defendant was intoxicated at the time of the crime, when that was in fact true, and to object to an intoxication instruction that was based on statutory language; (2) failure to object to closing arguments during which the prosecutor portrayed himself as the victim and narrated in the first person (following U.S. v. Necoechea, 986 F2d 1273 (9th Cir. 1993)); (3) failure to object to the lack of corroborating evidence regarding a witness's testimony when the objection lacked merit and would have been properly overruled (following St. v. Rodgers, 257 M 413, 849 P2d 1028 (1993)); (4) failure to investigate and pursue a mental defect defense after defendant's own psychologist of choice found him capable of going to trial (see Harris v. Vasquez, 949 F2d 1497 (9th Cir. 1990)); (5) failure to move for a substitute judge when there was no reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have differed with another judge presiding; (6) failure to request a change of venue absent evidence of juror bias and failure to adequately voir dire the jury when there was no reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have differed had voir dire been conducted more thoroughly; (7) ineffectiveness in investigating a witness's background when counsel's investigation fell within the wide range of competent assistance; (8) failure to investigate defendant's suicide attempt; (9) failure to object to certain jury instructions allowing inference of the existence of the requisite mental state from the acts of the accused (following St. v. Cowan, 260 M 510, 861 P2d 884 (1993)); (10) failure to object to instructions setting out the elements of aggravated kidnapping when defendant did not specify which of the alternatives in the instruction were objectionable (following Schad v. Ariz., 501 US 624, 115 L Ed 2d 555, 111 S Ct 2491 (1991)); (11) failure to object to the absence of Native Americans on the jury when, given recent census data, counsel could not have demonstrated that Native Americans were underrepresented on the panel; and (12) failure to object to the presence of armed officers in the courtroom (following Holbrook v. Flynn, 475 US 560, 89 L Ed 2d 525, 106 S Ct 1340 (1986)). Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995).

Ineffective Assistance Claim on Direct Appeal Res Judicata: An evidentiary hearing held on the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel resulted in a District Court decision that the Supreme Court reviewed and affirmed. On direct appeal, the claim was held to have been fully litigated and reconsideration was barred because additional review of the same issue between the same parties would negate the intent of the doctrines of res judicata and law of the case. St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530, 47 St. Rep. 1677 (1990), distinguished in St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997).

When Ineffective Assistance Claims More Appropriately Addressed by Petition for Postconviction Relief: Relying on the decision in U.S. v. Birges, 723 F2d 666 (9th Cir. 1984), the Supreme Court held that ineffective assistance of counsel claims raised on direct appeal and involving the consideration of facts beyond the record would more appropriately be addressed by a petition for postconviction relief. A defendant whose claim of ineffectiveness was appropriately classified as a petition for postconviction relief was not constitutionally entitled to counsel because such petitions are civil in nature and are not governed by constitutional requirements for counsel. St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530, 47 St. Rep. 1677 (1990), followed in Thurston v. St., 2004 MT 142, 321 M 411, 91 P3d 1259 (2004). See also St. v. Mallak, 2005 MT 49, 326 M 165, 109 P3d 209 (2005).

Failure to Object to Hearsay Testimony: While it was error for defense counsel in assault trial to fail to object to hearsay testimony and introduction of certain irrelevant evidence, such error, in view of the other supporting evidence, was not so prejudicial as to amount to ineffective assistance of counsel. St. v. Probert, 221 M 476, 719 P2d 783, 43 St. Rep. 988 (1986).

Test for Ineffective Assistance:

An allegation of ineffective assistance of counsel must be grounded on facts appearing in or easily deduced from the record, not mere conclusory allegations. It must be shown that counsel's errors were so serious that he was not functioning as the counsel guaranteed by the federal constitution and that the defense was prejudiced by the deficient performance. To prove prejudice, it must be shown that there is a reasonable probability that but for counsel's errors the result of the proceeding would have been different, and a reasonable probability is one sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome. St. v. Docken, 222 M 58, 720 P2d 679, 43 St. Rep. 1058

(1986); St. v. Robbins, 218 M 107, 708 P2d 227, 42 St. Rep. 1440 (1985), followed in St. v. Tome, 228 M 398, 742 P2d 479, 44 St. Rep. 1629 (1987); State v. Boyer, 215 M 143, 695 P2d 829, 42 St. Rep. 247 (1985), followed in St. v. Leavens, 222 M 473, 723 P2d 236, 43 St. Rep. 1431 (1986). See also In re Petition of Lake, 252 M 443, 830 P2d 100, 49 St. Rep. 359 (1992).

In St. v. Boyer, 215 M 143, 695 P2d 829, 42 St. Rep. 247 (1985), the court adopted the test set forth by the U.S. Supreme Court in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668, 80 L Ed 2d 674, 104 S Ct 2052 (1984), for determining when ineffective assistance of counsel has occurred. Applying that test in the instant case, the court found no specific acts or omissions which would have denied the defendant a fair trial. St. v. Grant, 217 M 357, 704 P2d 1064, 42 St. Rep. 1248 (1985).

The burden on one seeking to reverse a conviction on ground of incompetency of counsel has been historically heavy. Reasonably effective counsel does not mean defendant is constitutionally guaranteed such assistance as will necessarily result in an acquittal, and in evaluating counsel's representation of the client it is not the court's function to second-guess trial tactics and strategy. The test is that persons accused of crime are entitled to effective assistance of counsel acting within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases; and when the claim rests upon specific acts and omissions of counsel at trial, relief will be granted only if it appears that defendant was prejudiced by counsel's conduct. St. v. LaValley, 203 M 393, 661 P2d 869, 40 St. Rep. 527 (1983), followed in St. v. Johnstone, 244 M 450, 798 P2d 978, 47 St. Rep. 1715 (1990), and in St. v. McColley, 247 M 524, 807 P2d 1358, 48 St. Rep. 290 (1991). See also St. v. Bradley, 262 M 194, 864 P2d 787, 50 St. Rep. 1511 (1993), and St. v. Baker, 272 M 273, 901 P2d 54, 52 St. Rep. 735 (1995).

Persons accused of a crime are entitled to effective assistance of counsel acting within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases, and claimed inadequacy of counsel must not be tested by a greater sophistication of appellate counsel nor by that counsel's unrivaled opportunity to study the record at leisure and cite different tactics of perhaps doubtful efficacy. To sustain a claim of ineffective assistance, defendant must show that the attorney's alleged error resulted in prejudice to defendant and stemmed from neglect or ignorance rather than from informed professional deliberation. St. v. Morigeau, 202 M 36, 656 P2d 185, 39 St. Rep. 2311 (1982). Morigeau and its progeny were overruled in Whitlow v. St., 2008 MT 140, 343 M 90, 183 P3d 861 (2008), to the extent that the "ignorance or neglect" test for ineffective assistance of counsel conflicts with the correct approach, which is the "objective standard of reasonableness" test set out in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). Whitlow was followed in St. v. Wing, 2008 MT 218, 344 M 243, 188 P3d 999 (2008), distinguishing St. v. Parker, 2006 MT 258, 334 M 129, 144 P3d 831 (2006).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim — Effect on Attorney-Client Privilege: When a convicted person files a petition for relief based on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel, the petitioner's comprehension of waiver of privilege or his knowledge and consent to waiver are irrelevant. The attorney in question has a duty to respond by affidavit or other sworn testimony to admit, deny, or qualify the allegations of fact made in the petition. In future cases, if a response from a defense attorney so charged is necessary, the Attorney General shall first apply to the Supreme Court for an order preserving the responding attorney from charges of discipline or malpractice for revealing necessary confidential information from such convicted person. Petition of Gillham, 216 M 279, 704 P2d 1019, 42 St. Rep. 806 (1985). Gillham was clarified in Marble v. St., 2007 MT 98, 337 M 99, 169 P3d 1148 (2007). See also Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P2d 734, 54 St. Rep. 890 (1997), wherein it was held that failure to secure an order from the Supreme Court pursuant to Petition of Gillham did not constitute prejudice to defendant because the District Court that ruled on the petition did not rely on preliminary findings on the issue.

Denial of Continuance — Insufficient Time to Prepare Case: An information was filed December 2, 1983, charging the defendant with the offense of sexual intercourse without consent. After retaining an attorney, the defendant pleaded not guilty to the charge on December 9, 1983. The attorney continued to represent the defendant until a disagreement arose between the two concerning the handling of a motion hearing. Two days later, on May 2, 1984, the defendant released the attorney. On May 3, 1984, the defendant tried to secure another attorney, who agreed to represent the defendant only if the trial court would grant a continuance. The court refused to do so, and trial was set to begin May 14. The defendant, after trying unsuccessfully a second time to secure counsel, appeared at trial without an attorney and again moved for a continuance. The motion was denied. Voir dire commenced, a jury was selected and sworn, and the defendant again moved for a continuance, waiving his right to a speedy trial. An attorney was appointed to defend the defendant, the trial proceeded immediately without allowing defendant's counsel an opportunity to prepare, and the defendant subsequently was convicted. The trial court abused its discretion in refusing to grant the defendant's motion for a continuance of the trial as he acted with due diligence to secure new counsel on learning he was not compatible with the attorney he initially retained. The mere right to an attorney is not sufficient if that attorney is not given sufficient time to prepare the client's case, including adequate pretrial preparation time. The defendant was denied a fair trial. St. v. Lundblade, 213 M 420, 691 P2d 831, 41 St. Rep. 2208 (1984).

Failure to Interview Witnesses or Argue Self-Defense or Lesser Offenses: Defendant convicted of deliberate homicide and aggravated kidnapping was rendered ineffective assistance of counsel and was prejudiced by counsel's conduct to the point that convictions were reversed when, among other things, counsel: (1) failed to talk to six character witnesses prior to presenting them at trial, and none of the witnesses had an opinion as to the character of the person involved and an attack upon that person's character might have damaged the state's case; (2) failed to present competent jury instructions to the trial court, including defenses and particularly self-defense, and argued against the state's proposed self-defense instruction; and (3) failed to argue mitigating circumstances and in summation argued defendant did not act in self-defense or commit negligent homicide, leaving the jury with only one option — conviction or acquittal of deliberate homicide as charged. St. v. LaValley, 203 M 393, 661 P2d 869, 40 St. Rep. 527 (1983).

Defense Questions on Prior Charges and Convictions: Defense counsel questioned defendant on prior felony convictions and charges, opening him up to cross-examination on those matters. As a result, the jury had evidence from defendant regarding his involvement in an alleged burglary in which the circumstances and defense were almost identical to the present case. This was extremely prejudicial, indicated neglect or ignorance on the part of counsel, and was not within the range of competence demanded of an attorney in a criminal case. Ineffective assistance of counsel was rendered, requiring vacation of the verdict and remand for a new trial. St. v. Morigeau, 202 M 36, 656 P2d 185, 39 St. Rep. 2311 (1982). Morigeau and its progeny were overruled in Whitlow v. St., 2008 MT 140, 343 M 90, 183 P3d 861 (2008), to the extent that the "ignorance or neglect" test for ineffective assistance of counsel conflicts with the correct approach, which is the "objective standard of reasonableness" test set out in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). Whitlow was followed in Maldonado v. St., 2008 MT 253, 345 M 69, 190 P3d 1043 (2008).

Failure to Investigate and Object at Trial: The right to counsel includes the effective assistance of counsel to assure the constitutional guarantee of a fair trial. Failure of appointed counsel to prepare for trial by making a thorough investigation to substantiate the defendant's version of what transpired on the day of the crime coupled with counsel's failure to object to inadmissible evidence at trial requires a finding that defendant was without effective assistance of counsel. St. v. McElveen, 168 M 500, 544 P2d 820 (1975).

Dereliction of Duties: The court-appointed attorney denied the defendant effective representation by reason of dereliction of duties and responsibilities. St. v. Bubnash, 139 M 517, 366 P2d 155 (1961).

Attorney General's Opinions

Right to Assistance of Counsel in Misdemeanor Cases: Indigent defendants must be furnished counsel in all misdemeanor cases except those in which the judge has weighed the seriousness and gravity of the offense and precludes any imprisonment upon conviction and informs the defendant of this before trial. Should counsel be appointed, costs and attorney fees are borne by the appropriate governmental unit or agency pursuant to 46-8-201 (now repealed). 37 A.G. Op. 36 (1977).

Coroner's Inquest Is Not a Trial or Criminal Proceeding: A witness at a coroner's inquest may be accompanied and advised by counsel; however, this counsel does not have the right to participate in the inquest or cross-examine other witnesses or to comment on the coroner's instructions to the jury as a coroner's inquest is not a trial involving the merits, but rather a preliminary investigation, as no criminal consequences necessarily follow a coroner's inquest. Any subsequent criminal proceeding is brought independently by the County Attorney. 36 A.G. Op. 49 (1976).

46-8-102. Waiver of counsel.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute continues the provision that a defendant may waive the right to counsel. See 1987 MCA 46-8-102. The statute states the legal requirements concerning the proper waiver of the right. See St. v. Plouffe, 198 Mont. 379 (1982). The provision addressing the waiver by juvenile offenders was not continued because that element should be located in the Montana Youth Court Act.

This section is intended to protect the young and unwary who may not realize the importance of the advice and assistance of a lawyer. Also it is intended that the court may appoint counsel where the defendant lacks the intelligence or education to realize the importance of an attorney in the defense of a criminal charge.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: After "counsel" substituted "when the court ascertains that the waiver is made knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently" for "except that in all felony cases where the defendant is under 18 years of age, the defendant shall be represented by counsel at every stage of the proceedings following the filing of a petition under 41-5-501".

Case Notes

Defendant Not Considered Pro Se by Default: One year and three attorneys after being charged with several DUI-related offenses, Browning terminated the services of the third court-appointed attorney and indicated that he wished to hire private counsel. The trial court allowed Browning to proceed, but cautioned that under the circumstances, Browning was considered to be representing himself. Browning's attempt to secure private counsel failed for lack of funds. During subsequent proceedings, Browning asserted that he did not wish to proceed pro se because he did not know what he was doing, but the trial court refused to appoint a fourth attorney. Browning subsequently pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 20 years but then moved to withdraw the guilty plea on grounds that the plea was involuntary because he received ineffective assistance of counsel. The motion was denied, but on appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Although a defendant has a right to appear pro se, every reasonable presumption is indulged in against waiver of the right to counsel, and waiver will be upheld only if a defendant made the decision knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently. In this case, the record did not support a conclusion that Browning unequivocally requested to proceed pro se, and under the test in St. v. Langford, 267 M 95, 882 P2d 490 (1994), a defendant cannot be considered pro se by default. Thus, the trial court improperly denied Browning the assistance of counsel, and Browning's motion to withdraw the guilty plea was erroneously denied. St. v. Browning, 2006 MT 190, 333 M 132, 142 P3d 757 (2006).

Erroneous Language in Verification of Arraignment Form Constituting Sufficient Irregularity to Void Waiver of Right to Counsel — Remand for Resentencing: The state attempted to enhance Mann's DUI to a felony based on his pleading guilty to two prior DUIs. Mann challenged the enhancement based on Mann's alleged waiver of the right to counsel contained in a verification of arraignment form. The District Court held that Mann had waived the right to counsel. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The language of the verification of arraignment form was so erroneous, intimidating, and virtually indecipherable that Mann could not be considered to have entered into a knowing, intelligent, or voluntary waiver of the right to counsel. The language in the form was prima facie evidence of irregularity. Because the state had already exercised its opportunity to establish that the prior convictions were not obtained in violation of Mann's constitutional right, the Supreme Court vacated the prior convictions and remanded for resentencing in accordance with misdemeanor DUI charges. St. v. Mann, 2006 MT 33, 331 M 137, 130 P3d 164 (2006).

Adequate Advisement of Danger of Self-Representation — Voluntary Waiver of Counsel Affirmed: The Supreme Court's inquiry regarding a defendant's waiver of the right to counsel focuses not on what the defendant was told concerning the dangers of self-representation, but rather on a determination of whether the defendant understood the decision and proceeded voluntarily. Instead of requiring a trial court to recite a litany of the dangers associated with a waiver of the right to counsel, the test requires that the trial court receive sufficient evidence to find that the waiver is made voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently. In this case, defendant was generally familiar with the criminal trial process, had personally experienced a criminal trial, had participated in jury selection, was present during suppression hearings, took law enforcement in college, understood the role of an attorney, and was cautioned that acting as a trial lawyer was not something that a person could just walk into. The trial court's questioning and defendant's responses indicated that defendant understood the decision to waive counsel and made the decision knowingly and voluntarily. The trial court's decision to allow defendant to proceed pro se was affirmed. St. v. Insua, 2004 MT 14, 319 M 254, 84 P3d 11 (2004), following St. v. Colt, 255 M 399, 843 P2d 747 (1992). See also Faretta v. Calif., 422 US 806 (1975).

Unequivocal Relinquishment of Right to Counsel Required Before Self-Representation Allowed: A defendant has a constitutional right to assistance of counsel and also has a constitutional right to proceed pro se, but before an accused may forego the right to counsel and may self-represent, waiver of the benefits associated with the right to counsel must be unequivocal, voluntary, knowing, and intelligent (see St. v. Langford, 267 M 95, 882 P2d 490 (1994)). In this case, the record showed that although Swan asked to be allowed to represent himself, what he actually hoped for was that new counsel be appointed and that he be allowed access to the law library. Thus, the request for self-representation was anything but unequivocal, and the District Court did not err in refusing the request. St. v. Swan, 2000 MT 246, 301 M 439, 10 P3d 102, 57 St. Rep. 1033 (2000), followed in St. v. Browning, 2006 MT 190, 333 M 132, 142 P3d 757 (2006).

Knowing and Intelligent Waiver — Application of Keen Standards — Colt and Langford Followed: Woods, an inmate at the Swan River Correctional Training Center, or "boot camp", made admissions that he killed two people to a trustee counselor and to other boot camp inmates in an anger management workshop. Woods later made the same admission to the boot camp superintendent. After representing himself before the District Court, Woods was convicted of the homicides. Woods argued before the Supreme Court that the District Court failed to adequately warn him of the dangers in appearing pro se, citing U.S. v. Keen, 96 F3d 425 (9th Cir. 1996), for the proposition that he should have been advised of: (1) the nature of the charges against him; (2) the possible penalties; and (3) the dangers and disadvantages of self-representation. The Supreme Court held that Keen does not require a structured, formalistic application of those three requirements and that the Supreme Court had in any event rejected an argument similar to Woods's in St. v. Colt, 255 M 399, 843 P2d 747 (1992). The Supreme Court reviewed the transcript containing the discussion between Woods and the District Court on Woods's waiver of counsel and also held, citing St. v. Langford, 267 M 95, 882 P2d 490 (1994), that Woods's waiver of his right to counsel was unequivocal. St. v. Woods, 283 M 359, 942 P2d 88, 54 St. Rep. 617 (1997).

Right to Waive Counsel Discretionary With Trial Court: Langford was accused of five counts of deliberate homicide alleged to have been committed during a prison riot. Langford requested to have his two attorneys dismissed and to represent himself. The Supreme Court stated that although the right to self-representation is a constitutional right, it is subject to the trial court determining that the defendant is knowingly and intelligently foregoing the benefits of counsel and that the defendant is competent to self-defend. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had not abused its discretion in finding that Langford not be allowed to represent himself. St. v. Langford, 267 M 95, 882 P2d 490, 51 St. Rep. 962 (1994), following St. v. Colt, 255 M 399, 843 P2d 747 (1992). Langford was followed in St. v. Woods, 283 M 359, 942 P2d 88, 54 St. Rep. 617 (1997).

Waiver of Right to Counsel — Unequivocal: Langford was accused of five counts of deliberate homicide alleged to have been committed during a prison riot. Langford requested to have his two attorneys dismissed and to represent himself. The Supreme Court held that it was adopting the additional requirement that a request to waive the right to counsel be unequivocal, that a review of the record as a whole indicated that Langford's request to represent himself was equivocal, and that it was not error to deny him the right to represent himself. St. v. Langford, 267 M 95, 882 P2d 490, 51 St. Rep. 962 (1994), followed in St. v. Woods, 283 M 359, 942 P2d 88, 54 St. Rep. 617 (1997), and St. v. Swan, 2000 MT 246, 301 M 439, 10 P3d 102, 57 St. Rep. 1033 (2000).

Voluntary, Knowing, and Intelligent Waiver — Standards:

The District Court Judge properly found that defendant made a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent waiver of the right to counsel. The judge twice told defendant that the judge could not help him or give him breaks and would have to hold him to the same standards as an attorney. The District Court Judge is in the best position to determine whether a waiver is knowing and intelligent and is not held to a rigid standard of making the determination. The judge can consider defendant's level of understanding, background and prior experience with the legal system, seriousness of purpose, and deliberateness. St. v. Colt, 255 M 399, 843 P2d 747, 49 St. Rep. 1003 (1992), followed in St. v. Woods, 283 M 359, 942 P2d 88, 54 St. Rep. 617 (1997).

A waiver of the right to counsel must be voluntary and constitute a knowing and intelligent relinquishment of a known right. Each alleged waiver should be determined upon the surrounding facts and circumstances, including the background, experience, and conduct of the accused. Other appropriate considerations are age, education, and intelligence of accused and his capacity to understand the warnings given him, the nature of his fifth amendment rights, and the consequences of waiving those rights. St. v. Plouffe, 198 M 379, 646 P2d 533, 39 St. Rep. 1064 (1982).

In judging a waiver of the fifth amendment right to counsel, a conclusion that the right was waived necessarily entails a finding of a knowing and intelligent relinquishment of a known right, and some of the factors to be considered in making the finding are: (1) the background, experience, and conduct of the person; (2) his age, education, and intelligence; and (3) his capacity to understand the Miranda warnings given him, the nature of his fifth amendment rights, and the consequences of waiving those rights. St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).

Waiver of Counsel at Sentencing Hearing — Pro Se Appearance Not Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Prior to a sentencing hearing, defendant filed a pro se motion for a new trial with over 50 pages of supporting documents in which he claimed that his counsel was ineffective. The motion was discussed at the hearing, and defendant's counsel was relieved from further duty but was appointed as standby counsel for defendant's reference for the remainder of the hearing. Defendant requested new counsel to pursue the claims set out in the motion, and the District Court explained that the matters raised in the motion could properly be raised on appeal, but not at the sentencing hearing. These facts, coupled with defendant's obvious familiarity with the criminal justice system, led to the conclusion that defendant was not denied effective assistance of counsel at the sentencing hearing. St. v. Martin, 226 M 463, 736 P2d 477, 44 St. Rep. 804 (1987).

Motion to Suppress Statements and Related Evidence — Waiver and Voluntariness — Applicability to Custodial Interrogation: The District Court granted a motion to suppress all statements made by defendant and any evidence obtained as a result of the statements, citing Smith v. Ill., 469 US 91, 83 L Ed 2d 488, 105 S Ct 490 (1984), as decisive of the suppression issue and supportive of the conclusion that defendant's request for counsel at his first interview barred further police interrogation. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the Smith rule applied only to instances of custodial interrogation, while in this case defendant was not in custody or under formal arrest at the time he requested counsel. Further, the District Court never addressed the question of whether defendant's confession was voluntarily made; therefore, the case was remanded for hearing on the issues of waiver and voluntariness. St. v. Rorvik, 224 M 104, 728 P2d 419, 43 St. Rep. 2051 (1986).

Waiver of Right to Counsel — Defendant Indicted and Represented by Counsel: On March 4, 1981, while in the hospital for treatment of colitis and observation for suicidal tendencies, defendant was arrested and arraigned for a murder that had occurred 1 week previously. On March 7, defendant was transported to a hospital in Missoula for medical and psychiatric evaluation. On March 11, defendant's attending psychiatrist, Stratford, contacted the special prosecutor. Stratford asked whether a psychiatric examination was going to be ordered and whether an attorney had been appointed for defendant. Stratford was concerned about the appointment of counsel because defendant was becoming more talkative to hospital personnel. The special prosecutor notified a state criminal investigator who was involved in the case and told him that the defendant was becoming more vocal, that the County Attorney involved did not interview defendants without first notifying defense counsel, that some states do not permit such interviews, that Montana had not yet decided whether such interviews should be permitted, and that it was up to the investigator whether or not to conduct an interview. The investigator did conduct two interviews without notifying defendant's counsel and as a result of the interviews obtained evidence incriminating the defendant. The District Court denied defendant's motion to suppress the evidence, finding that the State had sustained its burden of proving that defendant's waiver of his rights was effective. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that a defendant charged under information or indictment and represented by counsel may waive his right to counsel without notice to or presence of counsel, during an interview initiated by law enforcement officers investigating the charged crime, if defendant's waiver is voluntary, knowing, and intelligent as shown by the particular facts and circumstances surrounding that case. St. v. Norgaard, 201 M 165, 653 P2d 483, 39 St. Rep. 2028 (1982).

Waiver by Hospitalized Suicidal Person: While accused was in a hospital recovering from a suicide by poison attempt, an officer showed him an advice of rights form, explained it to accused, and asked if he understood the form. The officer said, "You're nodding yes, that you do understand", and the accused then signed a waiver of his rights and answered questions (accused could not talk and made written responses). The tape of the resulting interview suggested accused was able to understand and respond to questioning. The officer and a doctor testified that accused seemed coherent and able to give a cognizant statement. Accused was not inexperienced with police procedures. District Court properly concluded that accused made a knowing and intelligent waiver of his rights. St. v. Plouffe, 198 M 379, 646 P2d 533, 39 St. Rep. 1064 (1982).

Right to Counsel Where Public Defender Refuses Representation: Defendant was given a 3-year deferred sentence, which was subsequently revoked and a 10-year suspended sentence imposed. At that point defendant appeared pro se, without any indication in the record of his waiver of counsel or eligibility for appointed counsel other than a statement by a public defender that defendant was ineligible for a public defender because he earned too much. The Supreme Court vacated the 10-year suspended sentence because of denial of defendant's right to counsel, stating that where a public defender refuses to represent a defendant, the District Court must inquire further. Here the defendant was not questioned in regard to his indigency, nor did the court receive any type of financial statement from him. St. v. Fry, 197 M 354, 642 P2d 1053, 39 St. Rep. 589 (1982).

Motion to Suppress Confession — Central Question: The central question on a motion to suppress a confession for being involuntary is whether the State has proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the person was advised of his constitutional rights and knowingly and voluntarily waived them. St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).

Waiver Following Indication of Interest in Counsel: Arrested person asked police interviewing him if they thought he should get an attorney, and police stated it was up to him. He resumed talking. At a later interview with police he stated, "Maybe I should have an attorney". The police stopped talking to him and began to leave the room, and before they left he resumed talking to them, at which point they reminded him that he had just indicated he wanted an attorney. He stated that he did not want an attorney. The interview continued. He made a knowing and intelligent waiver of his right to counsel, and subsequent confession was voluntary and admissible. St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).

Youth — Waiver of Right to Counsel: To be effective, waiver of right to counsel by a youth in Justice's Court must be accompanied by waiver of right to counsel by the parent or guardian of the youth. Edward C. v. Collings, 193 M 426, 632 P2d 325, 38 St. Rep. 1240 (1981).

Voluntariness of Waiver of Rights of Accused — Findings and Conclusions Absent: Appeal was made from a conviction for sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault. The defendant contended on appeal that he did not voluntarily and knowingly waive his Miranda rights and it was error for his statement to be used as evidence against him. In determining whether or not a confession should be suppressed, the trial judge must decide if it were voluntary. [This test is questionable in view of the vacation of Blakney v. Mont., 451 US 1013, 69 L Ed 2d 384, 101 S Ct 2999 (1981). Blakney had applied this test.] The Supreme Court said the determination of voluntariness turned solely on the credibility of the witnesses and deferred to the trial judge's finding of voluntariness supported by substantial credible evidence. The court declined to substitute its judgment when there was substantial evidence to support the judge's determination. Although the judge did not enter specific facts and findings as is preferable, it was not reversible error in a suppression hearing. It was noted, too, that the defendant never asked that findings and conclusions be entered. St. v. Camitsch, 192 M 124, 626 P2d 1250, 38 St. Rep. 563 (1981).

Waiver of Right to Counsel by Defendant Claiming Mental Defect — When Confession Suppressed: Defendant, convicted of aggravated assault, appealed based on issues related to his confession. The Supreme Court on review said the real issue was whether the defendant knowingly and voluntarily waived the right to counsel. The question of waiver was inextricably interwoven with the question of the voluntariness of the accused's confession. That was especially true because the defendant alleged incapacity because of mental illness. Whether a confession should have been suppressed depends on its voluntariness, [but see St. v. Blakney below, apparently vacated for application of this test] and that depends on the "totality of the circumstances". The Supreme Court found that the evidence showed that Miranda warnings were given before confession, that the defendant was capable of understanding the warnings, that the defendant waived his rights to counsel and against self-incrimination knowingly and voluntarily, and that the defendant was not improperly induced into confession. St. v. Mercer, 191 M 418, 625 P2d 44, 38 St. Rep. 312 (1981).

Suppression of Confession — Voluntariness — Waiver of Right to Counsel After Making Request: To determine whether a confession should have been suppressed, it had to be determined whether the confession was voluntary and whether there was an unconstitutional denial of the right to counsel. In so doing, the following questions had to be answered: What was the totality of the circumstances? Was there effective assertion of the right to counsel, and if so, was there an effective waiver later? Since the evidence answered a large number of the requisite questions about the circumstances, the decision of the trial court was held not to have clearly contravened the weight of the evidence and its holding of voluntariness was upheld. Since any indication by a defendant in any manner that he wishes to consult with an attorney suffices, and evidence showed the defendant had met this requirement, the trial court erred in concluding that there was ineffective assertion of the right to counsel. After adopting the rule that a defendant can validly waive the right to counsel after making a request for counsel, the Supreme Court found the trial court properly found that the State had carried its "heavy burden" of showing waiver of counsel. St. v. Blakney, 185 M 470, 605 P2d 1093 (1979); certiorari granted, Blakney v. Mont., 451 US 1013, 69 L Ed 2d 384, 101 S Ct 2999 (1981), and judgment vacated and case remanded for further consideration in light of Edwards v. Ariz., 451 US 477, 68 L Ed 2d 378, 101 S Ct 1880 (1981); affirmed on remand, St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).

Inadequate Counsel — Self-Representation: Counsel was appointed for defendant and was dismissed by him prior to trial. The court warned defendant of the disadvantages of self-representation and appointed standby counsel to assist defendant should he so request. Having made the choice of self-representation knowingly and intelligently, defendant cannot later claim that he was denied the right to adequate counsel. St. v. Harvey, 184 M 423, 603 P2d 661 (1979).

Admissibility of Defendant's Statement When Attorney Advisability Mentioned: A defendant who said it probably was advisable that he have an attorney but who nonetheless went ahead and fully consented to being interrogated and tape-recorded was held to have made a voluntary statement, having been advised of his rights. A statement made voluntarily after the speaker has been made fully aware of and understands his rights is not objectionable because the statement is made without the advice or assistance of counsel. Electronically recorded or preserved evidence is subject to the same admissibility tests as direct evidence of eyewitnesses or earwitnesses. With proper advice to a prospective defendant who then voluntarily consents to the tape recording of his statements, the constitutional defenses of self-incrimination, unlawful search, invasion of privacy, and right to counsel disappear. St. v. Brubaker, 184 M 294, 602 P2d 974 (1979).

Implied Waiver: Willful failure to retain counsel can amount to a waiver of the right to counsel. St. v. Lande, 180 M 157, 589 P2d 666 (1979).

Indigent Appearing Unrepresented: When the record reflects only the defendant's claim that he tried to get a lawyer and could not, the inquiry was not thorough and complete enough to support the determination of nonindigency and the subsequent ruling that defendant waived his right to counsel when he appeared unrepresented. St. v. Lande, 180 M 157, 589 P2d 666 (1979).

Discharge of Appointed Counsel by Defendant: Once counsel has been appointed and is rendering effective assistance, the defendant has only the choice of: (1) continuing with the counsel so appointed; or (2) having his counsel dismissed and proceeding on his own, pro se. If appointed counsel is rendering effective assistance, defendant may not have different counsel appointed or demand certain counsel. St. v. Pepperling, 177 M 464, 582 P2d 341 (1978), followed in St. v. Lange, 226 M 9, 733 P2d 847, 44 St. Rep. 418 (1987).

Juveniles — Suppression of Statements and Evidence: In the trial of a juvenile for shooting a police officer, a motion for suppression of evidence, obtained under authority of a lawful inspection and statements voluntarily made, was erroneously granted. However, statements made after a waiver of counsel, which were void because of lack of counsel for the underaged defendant, were properly suppressed. St. v. District Court, 176 M 257, 577 P2d 849 (1978).

Exception: This section was held to be inapplicable to a defendant under 18 manifesting certain characteristics. St. v. Braden, 154 M 90, 460 P2d 85 (1969).

Waiver by Competent and Informed Defendant: The right to counsel may be knowledgeably waived by a defendant who is competent to do so and has been fully informed of his rights by the court. Nelson v. St., 144 M 439, 397 P2d 700 (1964).

Determination of Whether Waiver Voluntary: The right to counsel may be intelligently waived by an accused, and the determination of whether the waiver was intelligently made will depend upon the particular facts and circumstances surrounding each case, including the background, experience, and conduct of the accused. Petition of Jones, 143 M 19, 386 P2d 747 (1963).

46-8-103. Duration of assignment.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute reflects 1987 MCA 46-8-103. In fact, subsection (1) is a restatement of the 1987 code concerning the appointment of counsel. Subsection (2) contains the requirements imposed on the defendant's court-appointed counsel if the counsel seeks a withdrawal after verdict and before initial appeal. These requirements are imposed to ensure that all defendants, including indigent defendants, have "the same rights and opportunities on appeal as nearly as is practicable . . .". See Anders v. Calif., 386 US 738, 744, 745 (1967).

2003 Amendment: Chapter 19 in (2) at beginning of first sentence after "counsel" substituted "determines that an appeal would be frivolous or wholly without merit, counsel shall file a motion with the court requesting" for "finds the defendant's case on appeal to be wholly frivolous, counsel shall advise the court of that fact and request", inserted second sentence requiring attestation by counsel that an appeal would be frivolous and that defendant was advised of counsel's decision and the right to file a response, in third sentence at beginning substituted "motion" for "request" and at end substituted "discussing any issues that arguably support an appeal" for "referring to anything in the record that might arguably support the appeal", inserted fourth and fifth sentences regarding memorandum contents and mailing, and in sixth sentence after "entitled to" deleted "receive a copy of counsel's memorandum and to" and after "file a" substituted "response" for "reply". Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

1991 Amendment: In (1), after "appeal", inserted "to the Montana supreme court" and after "the court" inserted "that assigned counsel or that has jurisdiction over the case"; inserted (2) concerning withdrawal of counsel; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Showing of Good Cause Required Prior to Appointment of State Public Defender in Habeas Corpus Proceedings: More than a simple motion is required before the Supreme Court will appoint the Office of State Public Defender (OSPD) to represent a person seeking habeas corpus relief. In such case, OSPD counsel will be appointed only upon a demonstration of good cause. A showing of likelihood of the illegality of the sentence of the person seeking relief, and that the sentence will be shortened or terminated if habeas corpus relief is granted, is required before OSPD counsel will be appointed. A statement that an applicant is untrained or unskilled in the law is insufficient, without more, to establish good cause. Dyer v. Mahoney, 2008 MT 117, 342 M 495, 182 P3d 737 (2008).

Appointed Counsel — No Ineffective Assistance of in Postconviction Relief Proceedings: Kallowat contended that he received ineffective assistance from his appointed counsel who failed to represent him in postconviction relief proceedings and to follow Kallowat's instruction to file an appeal in federal court. The Supreme Court disagreed. Kallowat was appointed two different attorneys, one of whom withdrew because of an excessive workload, and another who withdrew citing no discernible basis entitling Kallowat to relief, so Kallowat was allowed to proceed pro se. There was no error in allowing counsel to withdraw. Further, attorneys in criminal cases are required to represent a client only until final judgment is rendered, including appeals to the Montana Supreme Court, so counsel was not required to represent Kallowat in appealing to the federal courts. Thus, Kallowat's argument that he did not receive effective assistance of counsel failed. Kallowat v. St., 2004 MT 152, 321 M 501, 92 P3d 1176 (2004).

Failure of Counsel to Properly Withdraw or Preserve Direct Appeal — Denial of Postconviction Petition Erroneous: Adams filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief, alleging ineffective assistance of counsel because his original court-appointed attorney failed to move to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial and because his subsequently appointed trial counsel offered a lesser included instruction on aggravated assault to the jury and failed to appeal to the Supreme Court following Adams' conviction, despite Adams' request to do so. The petition was denied on grounds that Adams failed to file an appeal within 60 days of judgment as required by former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), and Adams appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Under this section, appointed counsel is required to continue representation until final judgment, including appellate review, unless counsel is relieved by court order. Adams' counsel failed to comply with the requirements of this section and effect a valid withdrawal, so the right to appeal was not preserved. When a defendant would have appealed but for counsel's deficient performance, the error is prejudicial. Thus, denial of Adams' petition for postconviction relief on procedural grounds was reversible error, and on remand, Adams was allowed to raise the issues that would have been raised on direct appeal but for counsel's abandonment of the appeal, as well as the issues raised in the petition for postconviction relief that were not previously raised. St. v. Adams, 2002 MT 202, 311 M 202, 54 P3d 50 (2002), following In re Petition of Hans, 1998 MT 7, 288 M 168, 958 P2d 1175 (1998), and St. v. Rogers, 2001 MT 165, 306 M 130, 32 P3d 724 (2001).

Failure of Appointed Counsel to Perfect Appeal: When the District Court appointed counsel for the defendant and ordered preparation of the record for an appeal to the Supreme Court, all at public expense, the defendant having had no voice in the choice, in the interest of justice it was incumbent upon the Supreme Court to consider the contended errors although court-appointed counsel failed to timely file the notice of appeal. St. v. Frodsham, 139 M 222, 362 P2d 413 (1961).

2007 Amendment: Chapter 417 in (1) in introductory clause near middle after "chapter 1" substituted "to represent" for "to defend", in two places before "petitioner" deleted "defendant", substituted "action or proceeding brought under Title 46, chapter 21" for "criminal action or proceeding", after "appellant" substituted "is eligible for the appointment of counsel" for "desires counsel", and at end after "and" deleted "is unable to employ counsel"; inserted (1)(a) through (1)(e) establishing criteria for when a court of record may order the state public defender's office to assign counsel to represent a petitioner or appellant in a postconviction action or proceeding; inserted (2) providing that an appointment of counsel made in the interests of justice may be made only when extraordinary circumstances exist; inserted (3) defining extraordinary circumstances; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 3, 2007.

2005 Amendment: (Version effective July 1, 2006) Chapter 449 near beginning after "may" inserted reference to ordering office of state public defender to assign counsel and after "counsel" inserted reference to Montana Public Defender Act; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2006.

Saving Clause: Section 78, Ch. 449, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

Case Notes

Appointment of Public Defender Prior to Filing of Petition for Postconviction Relief Prohibited: This section provides that a District Court may order that counsel from the Office of State Public Defender represent an eligible person who has filed a postconviction action or proceeding under certain circumstances, but nothing in this section allows appointment of a public defender in advance of the filing of a petition for postconviction relief. Further, 47-1-104 does not give a District Court authority to appoint counsel employed by the public defender system to represent a person who may desire to file a petition for postconviction relief but who has not done so. Office of St. Pub. Defender v. District Court, 2007 MT 333, 340 M 234, 178 P3d 693 (2007).

Conditions for Appointment of Appellate Counsel: The Supreme Court found this section to be vague, confusing, lacking in legislative guidance, and either overbroad or underinclusive with regard to appointment of counsel for defendants. The court determined that it will appoint counsel when a defendant's, petitioner's, or appellant's motion or petition demonstrates that: (1) a statute specifically mandates appointment of counsel; (2) the defendant, petitioner, or appellant is clearly entitled to counsel under the U.S. or Montana Constitution; or (3) extraordinary circumstances exist that require appointment of counsel to prevent a miscarriage of justice. The motion or petition must reference specific facts and documents in the record and cite specific jurisprudential, statutory, or constitutional authority to demonstrate the existence of a condition warranting appointment of counsel. (Note: The 2007 Legislature revised this section to provide guidance as suggested in Dillard.) Dillard v. St., 2006 MT 328, 335 M 87, 153 P3d 575 (2006).

No Right to Counsel in Petition to Dispose of Evidence — Issue Held Res Judicata: Woods was convicted of writing a bad check. After the state filed a petition to dispose of certain evidence pursuant to 46-5-306 through 46-5-309, Woods argued to the District Court that he was entitled to appointed counsel, pursuant to this section, for the purpose of responding to the petition. The District Court held that Woods was not entitled to appointed counsel because the granting of the state's petition would not result in a conviction of an offense for which Woods could be punished. Woods appealed that decision to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court. After the District Court granted the petition to dispose of evidence, Woods again raised the issue of his entitlement to appointed counsel to the District Court. The District Court denied the request for the same reason that it had previously. Woods then appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court held that because of its earlier decision in the matter of Woods's right to counsel, the issue was now res judicata, and the Supreme Court therefore affirmed the holding of the District Court. St. v. Woods, 286 M 355, 951 P2d 981, 54 St. Rep. 1445 (1997).

Right to Counsel Where Public Defender Refuses Representation: Defendant was given a 3-year deferred sentence, which was subsequently revoked and a 10-year suspended sentence imposed. At that point defendant appeared pro se, without any indication in the record of his waiver of counsel or eligibility for appointed counsel other than a statement by a public defender that defendant was ineligible for a public defender because he earned too much. The Supreme Court vacated the 10-year suspended sentence because of denial of defendant's right to counsel, stating that where a public defender refuses to represent a defendant, the District Court must inquire further. Here the defendant was not questioned in regard to his indigency, nor did the court receive any type of financial statement from him. St. v. Fry, 197 M 354, 642 P2d 1053, 39 St. Rep. 589 (1982). See also Swearingen v. St., 2001 MT 10, 304 M 97, 18 P3d 998 (2001), holding that a reading of 46-21-201 with this section requires appointment of counsel even if an indigent defendant fails to notify the court of a "desire" for counsel.

Right to Appointed Counsel on Appeal: There is no provision for appointment of counsel in the Supreme Court; such appointments are made by the District Courts. Brown v. St., 140 M 289, 371 P2d 262 (1962); In re Pelke's Petition, 139 M 354, 365 P2d 932 (1961).

46-8-113. Payment by defendant for assigned counsel — costs to be filed with court.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-8-113. The statute establishes certain procedures allowing the court to assign the costs of court-appointed counsel as a part of the defendant's sentence. Court-appointed counsel should be paid by the appropriate governmental entity, and reimbursement by the defendant for these costs should be made to that governmental entity.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 467 in (1) in introductory clause substituted "the court shall require" for "the court may require" and after "represent the defendant" inserted "as follows, except as provided in subsections (2) and (3)"; inserted (1)(a) and (1)(b) concerning costs of counsel; in (2) inserted second sentence requiring assigned counsel in criminal jury trial to file statement of costs; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2009.

2005 Amendment: (Version effective July 1, 2006) Chapter 449 in (1) at beginning inserted reference to part of sentence or condition under sentence imposed under this title, after "costs of" deleted "court-appointed", and after "counsel" deleted "as a part of or a condition under the sentence imposed as provided in Title 46" and inserted "assigned to represent the defendant"; in (2) after "limited to" deleted "reasonable compensation and" and after "by the" deleted "court-appointed counsel" and inserted reference to costs incurred by office of state public defender in providing defendant with counsel; in (3) after "costs" deleted "of court-appointed" and inserted "for assigned"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2006.

Saving Clause: Section 78, Ch. 449, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 in first sentence of (4), after "pay costs", deleted "and who is able to but refuses or fails to pay those costs".

1991 Amendment: In (1), at beginning, deleted "Under the provisions of 46-18-201" and at end inserted "imposed as provided in Title 46"; in (2) deleted second sentence that read: "Costs may not include expenses inherent in providing a constitutionally guaranteed jury trial or expenditures in connection with the maintenance and operation of government agencies that must be made by the public irrespective of specific violations of law"; in (4), after "who is", substituted "able to but refuses or fails to pay those costs" for "not in contumacious default in the payment thereof"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Order to Pay Costs of Court-Appointed Counsel Within Statutory Parameters — Sentence Objectionable, Not Illegal Within Scope of Lenihan Rule and Not Colorable Claim on Appeal: Kirkland asserted for the first time on appeal that the sentencing court imposed an illegal sentence by ordering Kirkland to pay the costs of court-appointed counsel incurred during proceedings related to revocation of Kirkland's deferred sentence. Kirkland also contended that the sentencing court erred by not specifying in its written judgment that payment was to be made to the Office of State Public Defender, as required in 46-8-114. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), appellate review of a sentence that is illegal or in excess of statutory mandates may be conducted even though that argument was not raised in District Court. However, the Supreme Court also noted that St. v. Kotwicki, 2007 MT 17, 335 M 344, 151 P3d 892 (2007), clarified Lenihan in that a sentencing court's failure to abide by a statutory requirement rises to an objectionable sentence, not necessarily an illegal one that would invoke the Lenihan exception. Here, Kirkland's sentence requiring payment of costs of counsel was statutorily authorized in this section and was therefore considered objectionable, but not illegal. Thus, Kirkland failed to present a colorable claim that his sentence fell outside statutory parameters and warranted review under the Lenihan rule, so the Supreme Court declined to consider Kirkland's arguments for the first time on appeal. St. v. Kirkland, 2008 MT 107, 342 M 365, 181 P3d 616 (2008).

Repayment of Costs and Fees of Court-Appointed Counsel as Condition of Deferred Sentence: As a condition of Holland's deferred sentence, the District Court ordered Holland to repay $2,922 in costs and fees expended in his defense by court-appointed counsel. Holland appealed on grounds that the court was not authorized to impose such a condition on a deferred sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that because subsection (1) of this section included all costs related to a criminal defense and because the statute contained no limitation on which defense costs a judge may require a defendant to pay, the District Court did not err in requiring Holland to repay costs and fees of court-appointed counsel as a condition of the deferred sentence. (Note: A 2005 amendment provided that costs must be limited to costs incurred by the Office of State Public Defender.) St. v. Holland, 2008 MT 26, 341 M 237, 177 P3d 482 (2008).

Unlawful Order That Defendant Pay Assigned Counsel After Finding That Defendant Unable to Pay — Reversed: A court may not sentence a defendant to pay the costs for assigned counsel unless the defendant is or will be able to pay them. In this case, even though the District Court found that Starr could not afford to pay a $3,000 fee, the court nevertheless ordered Starr to pay $2,103.40 in attorney fees. Absent an affirmative finding of Starr's ability to pay attorney fees, the sentence was against the weight of the District Court's evidentiary findings and thus was illegal. The Supreme Court reversed with instructions to strike the portion of the sentence concerning attorney fees. St. v. Starr, 2007 MT 238, 339 M 208, 169 P3d 697 (2007).

Constitutionality of Montana Recoupment Statutes: Ellis contended that 46-8-115 and this section violated the right to equal protection because they strip indigent defendants of protections against imprisonment for debt that are afforded to similarly situated nonindigent criminal defendants and civil judgment debtors. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under Montana's recoupment statutes, a court may not sentence a defendant to pay the costs of court-appointed counsel unless the court determines that the defendant is or will be able to pay the costs, nor do counsel costs become a judgment in the same manner as civil judgments. Further, a defendant may at any time petition the court for remission of payment on grounds that payment will impose manifest hardship on the defendant or the defendant's family. Ellis's equal protection claim was also rejected for failure to identify similarly situated classes that are treated differently, inasmuch as individuals who are ordered to pay recoupment costs as a condition of a felony criminal sentence are not similarly situated to civil judgment debtors. Thus, Ellis failed to establish that the recoupment statutes violated the constitutional right to equal protection. St. v. Ellis, 2007 MT 210, 339 M 14, 167 P3d 896 (2007), following St. v. Farrell, 207 M 483, 676 P2d 168 (1984). See also Fuller v. Oregon, 417 US 40 (1974).

Improper Assessment of Costs of Court-Appointed Counsel Based on Possible Future Financial Resources: Although the sentencing court recognized that Hirt had no financial resources, the court imposed costs of $9,558 to pay for Hirt's court-appointed counsel, stating that it would hold a hearing in the future to modify judgment after considering Hirt's financial resources at a later date. Citing St. v. Rennick, 1999 MT 155, 295 M 97, 983 P2d 907 (1999), the Supreme Court noted that once a valid sentence is imposed, a court lacks jurisdiction to modify a sentence absent specific statutory authority and may not reserve the right to change a sentence or add conditions at a later time. In addition, a court may not sentence a defendant to pay the costs of court-appointed counsel unless the defendant is or will be able to pay them. In this case, the sentencing court articulated no determination that Hirt would have resources in the future to pay the costs, so the Supreme Court remanded for reconsideration of costs. St. v. Hirt, 2005 MT 285, 329 M 267, 124 P3d 147 (2005).

Error in Requiring Restitution Without Considering Resources of Defendant: After revoking Rudolph's suspended sentence, the District Court ordered Rudolph to reimburse the county for the costs of a court-appointed attorney. However, the court committed reversible error when it did not consider Rudolph's financial resources or ability to pay the costs, and the case was remanded for further consideration. St. v. Rudolph, 2005 MT 41, 326 M 132, 107 P3d 496 (2005).

Reimbursement Costs for Court-Appointed Attorney Proper: Defendant contended that the District Court improperly required victim restitution in an incest case because the court did not specify an amount of total restitution, consider the victim's pecuniary loss, or consider defendant's financial resources or ability to pay, as required in 46-18-244. The Supreme Court held that defendant had mischaracterized the issue, noting that the District Court had not ordered any amount for victim restitution, but rather had ordered defendant to pay an amount in reimbursement costs for defendant's court-appointed attorney, and had correctly considered defendant's resources as set out in the presentence investigation report, as provided in this section. Payment of reimbursement costs was affirmed. St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004).

Ordering Defendant to Pay Counsel's Cost for First Trial as Well as Retrial: Following retrial, the judge was authorized by this section to order defendant to pay his counsel's costs for the first trial as well as the second trial. This did not impinge upon the defendant's right to counsel, and there was no evidence to support his claim that the judge acted out of vindictiveness because defendant went to retrial. St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001).

Order to Pay Attorney Fees to Be Based on Factual Findings of Defendant's Ability to Pay: After his conviction for theft of public welfare funds in violation of 45-6-301, defendant was ordered to repay the cost of his court-appointed attorney. Because the case record did not indicate an inquiry into defendant's financial status or ability to repay the legal fees, the Supreme Court remanded the case for reconsideration of the order. St. v. Farrell, 207 M 483, 676 P2d 168, 41 St. Rep. 91 (1984).

CHAPTER 9
BAIL

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

1991 Chapter Comments: This chapter governs the release or detention of a criminal defendant, whether before or after trial. These statutes are an amalgamation of the 1987 state code and the federal code governing the process. See 1987 MCA 46-9-101, et seq., and 18 U.S.C. 3141, et seq. The federal rules do contain provisions concerning a defendant's release, but the federal rules were not favored by the Commission. Nonetheless, the statutes are compatible with the federal rules. Compare Title 46, ch. 9, and Rule 46, Fed. R. Crim. P.

Two key changes are embodied in these statutes. First, the posting of bail is treated in the same fashion as any other condition of release. The statutes do not require the posting of bail, as the 1987 code apparently required, but allow posting bail as a condition of release. Second, because bail is treated as an equal among other conditions of release, any express reference to a personal recognizance release has been eliminated. Even under the 1987 code, such a release would have been subject to certain conditions. In the scheme embraced by these statutes, the court has wide discretion in deciding to impose certain conditions, if any, when a defendant's release is ordered.

These statutes are compatible with the state constitution and the 1987 code. The provisions recognize that a defendant in a capital offense case may be detained, require the consideration of community safety at a release hearing, and continue the provisions for arrest bond certificates. The statutes do not expressly continue some code provisions, such as the presumption of dangerousness of a defendant (1987 MCA 46-9-103(2)) or the requirement of a report of drug usage (1987 MCA 46-9-203).

The county attorney, if he resists an application for bail in a capital case, must make some showing that the proof is evident or the presumption great thus bringing the case within the exception. (State ex rel. Murray v. District Court, 35 Mont. 504, 90 Pac. 513 (1907).)

Case Notes

Good Time Credit for Indigent Defendant Confined to County Detention Facility: The decision in Bearden v. Ga., 461 US 660, 76 L Ed 2d 221, 103 S Ct 2064 (1983), clearly and unambiguously stands for the principle that to deprive a criminal defendant of freedom simply because, through no want of bona fide effort, willful refusal, or fault of the defendant, the defendant lacks the financial resources to buy liberty is contrary to the fundamental fairness required by the 14th amendment to the U.S. Constitution. This is not to say that poverty insulates a defendant from having to post a reasonable bond should the facts and circumstances of the case so require. However, if a criminal defendant is unable to secure presentence freedom by posting bail for no other reason than indigency, that defendant is entitled to good time credit for the presentence time spent in a county detention facility to the same extent that the law allows good time credit to the criminal defendant who is able to post bail and thus serve the entirety of a sentence in the state correctional facility. In the present case, it was not clear from the record whether defendant was offered or denied bail and whether, if offered, the sole reason for defendant's inability to post bail was indigency; nevertheless, the Supreme Court granted defendant's petition for writ of habeas corpus and remanded to the District Court for a determination of whether defendant was entitled to good time credit for time served in the county detention facility. MacPheat v. Mahoney, 2000 MT 62, 299 M 46, 997 P2d 753, 57 St. Rep. 291 (2000), following MacFarlane v. Walter, 179 F3d 1131 (9th Cir. 1999), and followed in Eisenman v. St., 2000 MT 170, 300 M 322, 5 P3d 542, 57 St. Rep. 704 (2000), in which the case of an indigent defendant was remanded for a determination of whether defendant was detained presentence in a county detention facility because he was too poor to post bail and thus entitled to credit for good time under the MacPheat test. However, see also McGinnis v. Royster, 410 US 263, 35 L Ed 2d 282, 93 S Ct 1055 (1973). MacPheat was distinguished in Sebastian v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 88, 305 M 158, 25 P3d 163 (2001).

Discretion of Trial Court: Bail is a matter within the discretion of the trial court, and its ruling will not be disturbed unless a clear abuse of discretion appears. Denial of bail cannot be claimed as showing prejudice by the trial judge, for such is a mere preliminary matter and has nothing to do with the trial on the merits. St. v. London, 131 M 410, 310 P2d 571 (1957).

When Bail Proper in Homicide Case: Bail is properly allowed in a homicide case in the absence of a showing by the County Attorney that the proof of the defendant's guilt is evident or the presumption thereof great. State ex rel. Murray v. District Court, 35 M 504, 90 P 513 (1907).

Attorney General's Opinions

Authority of Municipal Court to Grant Time-Pay Bail Bonds: A time-pay bail bond system, which allows a defendant to make payments in monthly or weekly installments in an amount and frequency set by a court to correspond with the requirement that the defendant pay the full bail amount before the date of trial, promotes the constitutional policy of providing bail except in capital cases. The system also comports with statutory requirements that the bail amount not be oppressive and be considerate of the defendant's financial ability. The system requires a defendant to pay cash for the bond, albeit in installments paid over a period of time. Because a court has discretion to set the appropriate bail amounts and to accept personal property in lieu of cash, the court also has discretion to set the timing on the payment of any cash bond. Therefore, a Municipal Court Judge is authorized to release a defendant on a time-pay bail bond in an amount set by the judge to be paid in installments. 49 A.G. Op. 18 (2002).

Reversal of Conviction: The trial court abused its authority in denying bail to defendant whose conviction for first-degree murder was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Campbell, 160 M 111, 500 P2d 801 (1972).

46-9-105. General authority for release and detention.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is presented as the primer for the release and detention provisions. Subsection (1) is reflective of the federal code and limits the conduct of a release or detention proceeding to the provisions of this chapter. See 18 U.S.C. 3141. Subsection (2) requires that a person released pursuant to this chapter appear as ordered.

46-9-106. Release or detention of defendant pending trial.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute states the appropriate instances when a defendant may be released or ordered detained prior to a verdict. The statute closely reflects the federal code but retains the state's practice that a defendant in a capital case may be detained without bail.

Subsection (1) adopts the release requirements contained in the federal code. That code allows the imposition of conditions to ensure the appearance of the defendant and the safety of the community. See generally 18 U.S.C. 3142(b). The 1987 state code did not expressly require consideration of community safety in a pretrial release. See 1987 MCA 46-9-103. To this extent, the written law may change, but the prevailing practice should not.

Subsection (2) provides that the defendant in a capital offense may be ordered detained. Detention is permitted only in capital offenses and only if conditions of release do not protect the community and ensure the defendant's appearance.

In any case in which the defendant's appearance and community safety can be ensured by certain conditions, a defendant should be released pending trial.

Case Notes

No Showing That Defendant's Rights Violated by Failure to Make Bail or to Be Released on Own Recognizance — Writ of Habeas Corpus Denied: Following Miller's arrest on charges of negligent homicide and failure to remain at the scene of an accident, the District Court set bail at $30,000. When Miller could not make bail, the amount was reduced to $10,000. Indigent, Miller could not pay the reduced bail and remained incarcerated. Miller petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus, arguing that his continued incarceration was a violation of 46-9-111 and this section and the constitutional guarantees of bail and against excessive sanctions. The Supreme Court noted that a defendant has a presumptive right to be released on a reasonable bail or on the defendant's own recognizance on conditions that will protect the community. However, the burden in a habeas corpus proceeding is on the petitioner to present a record that is sufficient to make a prima facie showing that the District Court's order constituted a violation, deprivation, infringement, or denial of the petitioner's constitutional, statutory, or legal rights. After considering the meager record and the seriousness of the allegations, the Supreme Court was not convinced that Miller had no ability to provide any bail or that the District Court could have released Miller on conditions that could be enforced and that could ensure the protection of the community. Thus, Miller failed to show that his rights were violated, and his petition for a writ of habeas corpus was denied. Miller v. District Court, 2007 MT 58, 336 M 207, 154 P3d 1186 (2007).

46-9-107. Release or detention pending appeal — revocation — sentencing hearing.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an adaptation of the federal code governing a defendant's postverdict release. See generally 18 U.S.C. 3143. The statute, however, embodies only a generally stated principle. The statute is also reflective of the 1987 state code that expressly required consideration of community safety. See 1987 MCA 46-9-103. Unlike the 1987 code, the statute does not require admission to bail for minor offenses or probation violations, and the statute does not preserve the presumption of dangerousness in deliberate homicide cases. See 1987 MCA 46-9-103. Such provisions are implied considerations under the community safety standard.

1991 Amendment: At beginning of second sentence substituted "The court shall order the detention of a defendant" for "A person", after "sentence" substituted "or a revocation hearing or" for "or a person found guilty of an offense and sentenced to a term of imprisonment", and after "appeal" substituted "unless the court" for "may be admitted to bail only if the judge"; deleted (2) that read: "(2) A person found guilty of the offense of deliberate homicide is presumed to pose a danger to the safety of the community, which presumption is rebuttable"; and made minor changes in style.

1985 Amendment: In (1) and (2) substituted new bail standards (see 1985 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "(1) After conviction of an offense not punishable by death, a defendant who intends to appeal may be admitted to bail:

(a) as a matter of right, from a judgment imposing a fine only or any judgment rendered by a justice's or city court;

(b) as a matter of discretion in all other cases.

(2) A defendant convicted of the offense of deliberate homicide is presumed to be a danger to others and not entitled to be admitted to bail, which presumption is rebuttable".

Case Notes

Likelihood of Success on Appeal Not Factor in Determining Release of Defendant Pending Appeal: Ingraham argued that because at least one issue in his pending appeal created a strong likelihood that the Supreme Court would reverse his conviction, equity and fairness required that he be released on bond pending appeal. The Supreme Court held that the statute governing the availability of release on bond pending appeal does not refer to the likelihood of a successful appeal and therefore is not grounds for release on bond. Ingraham v. St., 284 M 481, 945 P2d 19, 54 St. Rep. 782 (1997).

Weighing Evidence to Determine Continuation of Bond Pending Appeal Within Trial Court's Discretion: Ingraham argued that the trial court abused its discretion in denying his motion that he be released on bond pending appeal. The Supreme Court held that it was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to give greater weight to evidence indicating that the defendant would pose a threat to the community if released pending appeal than to evidence presented by the defendant indicating that he would not pose a threat. Ingraham v. St., 284 M 481, 945 P2d 19, 54 St. Rep. 782 (1997).

Denial of Bond Pending Appeal — Method of Supreme Court Review — Jurisdiction: After conviction for negligent homicide and on related charges, Ingraham moved the District Court to continue bond pending appeal. The District Court denied the motion, finding that Ingraham was a danger to the community and therefore did not meet the requirements of this section. Ingraham then moved the Supreme Court, pursuant to former Rule 22, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to continue bond pending appeal or, in the alternative, to accept appeal of the District Court's order denying bond, pursuant to former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), and 46-20-104. The Attorney General moved to dismiss, contending that there was no provision in law for appeal from a District Court order denying bond pending appeal and that Ingraham should have brought an original habeas corpus proceeding. The Supreme Court agreed with the Attorney General and dismissed Ingraham's motion or appeal, holding that Ingraham should have brought a petition for a writ of habeas corpus pursuant to 46-22-103. Ingraham then filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, which was filed with Justice Trieweiler pursuant to 3-2-212. Justice Trieweiler granted the petition to the extent necessary for the District Court to hold an evidentiary hearing as provided by statute, under the theory that the District Court was the more appropriate court for the hearing than was the Supreme Court. The Attorney General opposed the order by applying to the full Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, arguing, contrary to the state's previous position, that 46-22-103 does not really apply to persons convicted in a criminal case and that the more appropriate procedure was an original proceeding "in the nature of habeas corpus" before the full Supreme Court. The application for a writ of supervisory control was denied, was treated by the Supreme Court as a late-filed response to Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, and was referred to Justice Trieweiler. Justice Trieweiler determined that it was inappropriate for him alone to determine the form of review of the District Court's denial of bond. Justice Trieweiler also determined that: (1) Ingraham had no constitutional right to bond pending appeal; (2) Ingraham did have a right to the proper exercise of the District Court's discretion in the application of this section; and (3) that right was a substantial right for the purposes of 46-20-104. For these reasons, Justice Trieweiler vacated his previous order granting Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus and referred the matter to the full Supreme Court for review of the District Court's order denying bond pending appeal. St. v. Ingraham, 284 M 77, 945 P2d 16, 54 St. Rep. 614 (1997).

Consideration of Moot Issue of Right to Reasonable Bail: Although a petition to the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus was moot because petitioner was no longer in custody, the issue was the petitioner's right to reasonable bail, and the court accepted jurisdiction to address the substantive issues by writ of supervisory control in order to address a constitutional issue capable of repetition. Wier v. Lincoln County Sheriff's Dept., 278 M 473, 925 P2d 1172, 53 St. Rep. 1013 (1996).

Right to Bail and Stay of Justice's Court Sentence on Appeal to District Court: Under the plain language of this section, a person convicted in Justice's Court of partner assault and carrying a concealed weapon while under the influence had a right to bail pending his appeal to the District Court in the absence of a Justice's or District Court finding that he was likely to flee or posed a danger to a person or the community. If admitted to bail, a person's Justice's Court sentence should be stayed pending appeal. The state claimed that Wier did not seek bail; however, he had no opportunity because both the Justice of the Peace and the District Court Judge were unavailable. Wier had previously posted a bail bond in Justice's Court to secure his release pending a trial, and the Justice's Court still had the bond at the time of the appeal. The Justice's Court erred in failing to stay imposition of its sentence pending appeal to the District Court. Wier v. Lincoln County Sheriff's Dept., 278 M 473, 925 P2d 1172, 53 St. Rep. 1013 (1996).

Convicted Felon Allowed Preconviction Bail Not Automatically Entitled to Bail Pending Appeal: Prior to his conviction for deliberate homicide, Moore was allowed bail, and following conviction, he was designated a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) for purposes of parole eligibility. After conviction, Moore was denied bail pending appeal. Moore petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that he is entitled to bail pending appeal as a matter of law pursuant to 46-20-204 and this section. The Supreme Court found that under this section, the District Court was required to order the detention of Moore unless it found that he was "not likely to flee". Since the District Court made the opposite finding based on evidence presented at the hearing, the Supreme Court found no abuse of discretion in the District Court's order denying bail pending appeal. The Supreme Court also held that the phrase "[i]f an appeal is taken and the defendant is admitted to bail" contained in 46-20-204(2) referred to bail pending appeal and requires that the District Court stay the execution of its sentence if the defendant is admitted to bail pending appeal. Because Moore was not admitted to bail pending appeal, his sentence should not be stayed. Moore v. McCormick, 260 M 305, 858 P2d 1254, 50 St. Rep. 1054 (1993).

Convicted Felon Designated Nondangerous Offender for Purposes of Parole Eligibility Not Automatically Entitled to Bail Pending Appeal: Prior to his conviction for deliberate homicide, Moore was allowed bail, and following conviction, he was designated a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) for purposes of parole eligibility. After conviction, Moore was denied bail pending appeal. Moore petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that he is entitled to bail pending appeal as a matter of law pursuant to 46-18-404 (now repealed). The Supreme Court found that the criteria for admitting a defendant to bail pending appeal and the criteria for designating the defendant a nondangerous offender are not the same. Under 46-18-404(1)(b) (now repealed), the trial court is required to determine whether the defendant constitutes a "substantial danger to other persons or society", while under this section, the trial court may not allow bail pending appeal unless it finds that the defendant "is not likely to flee". The Supreme Court held that it could therefore be appropriate to designate a defendant such as Moore a nondangerous offender for the purposes of parole eligibility but also be appropriate to deny him bail pending appeal. Moore v. McCormick, 260 M 305, 858 P2d 1254, 50 St. Rep. 1054 (1993).

Time When Bail Must Be Granted: Appellant was entitled to be admitted to bail either in the Justice Court before his appeal was perfected or in the District Court after the appeal was perfected. State ex rel. Abbitt v. Justice Court, 220 M 210, 714 P2d 140, 43 St. Rep. 300 (1986).

Presence at Postconviction Hearing Not Required: Defendant is not required to be present at a postconviction hearing held to determine whether defendant was eligible for bail pending appeal because such proceedings are not part of the trial. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980).

Denial of Bail — Poor Risks:

The Supreme Court denied the petitioner's application for admission to bail pending appeal based on a clear and present danger that bail would not guarantee the appearance of the defendant for execution of sentence in the event of affirmance of the conviction on appeal, and that the safety of the public would be jeopardized by the release of the petitioner pending appeal. St. v. Bretz, 175 M 471, 575 P2d 44 (1978).

The court properly exercised its discretion in denying bail on appeal when there was evidence of prior offenses by one defendant and attempts to intimidate and influence witnesses by another defendant, demonstrating that the defendants were poor bail risks. State ex rel. Bretz v. Sheriff, 167 M 363, 539 P2d 1191 (1975).

Denial of bail pending appeal subsequent to conviction of second-degree murder was not an abuse of discretion when based on concern for safety of other citizens living in the area. French v. Crist, 163 M 544, 518 P2d 35 (1974).

Denial of Bail — Complete Presentence Investigation: When a complete presentence investigation was conducted, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing admission to bail pending appeal. St. v. Kotarski, 154 M 309, 462 P2d 873 (1969).

Improper Tax on Right to Bail: The imposition of a penalty assessment on bail was an unconstitutional violation of due process. The purpose of bail is to insure the presence of the defendant, and it should not be used as a revenue measure. State ex rel. Sanders v. Butte, 151 M 171, 441 P2d 190 (1968).

Abuse of Discretion: District Court did not abuse its discretion when it refused to fix bail on appeal of defendant sentenced to state prison. Bubnash v. St., 139 M 639, 366 P2d 867 (1961).

46-9-108. Conditions upon defendant's release — notice to victim of stalker's release.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute recognizes certain specific conditions that the court may impose upon a defendant's release to ensure the community's safety and the defendant's presence at a later proceeding. The statute weaves together provisions of both the state and federal codes. However, no significant change in established procedure is anticipated.

Subsection (1) lists certain conditions that the court can impose upon a defendant who is released pending criminal proceedings. While reflective of the 1987 state code, some changes have been made. First, the statute allows the court discretion with respect to the imposition of certain conditions. The 1987 code required a single condition—that the defendant not commit an offense. The Commission recommended making this condition discretionary but recognized that all persons, even criminal defendants, are expected to abide by the law.

Second, in the 1987 code, the court could impose certain restrictions on travel. These statutes do not continue the automatic restriction against out-of-state travel. However, as a reflection of the federal code, this provision was amended to permit restrictions on personal associations and residency, as well as travel. Compare 1987 MCA 46-9-501(1)(b)(iv) and 18 U.S.C. 3142(c)(2)(D).

Third, the condition prohibiting use of dangerous drugs has been amended to prohibit the use of controlled substances without a prescription. This change was made to better cover any instance of substance abuse that may arise. Compare 1987 MCA 46-9-501(1)(b)(ix) and 18 U.S.C. 3142(c)(2)(I).

Subsection (1), because it is entirely discretionary upon the court, avoids any direct recognition of the release on personal recognizance. See 1987 MCA 46-9-111. Because the imposition of bail is a condition under these statutes, the court may order a defendant's release without posting bail. Thus, the release on one's own recognizance is impliedly preserved.

Subsection (2) is an adaptation of provisions from the federal code and is intended to prevent the abuse of judicial discretion with respect to the imposition of release conditions. The initial sentence requires that the conditions imposed be reasonable and be the least restrictive that will ensure the defendant's appearance and the community's safety. These restraints were not expressly established in the 1987 code. The second sentence recognizes the court's discretion to amend a release order at any time upon a proper motion. This provision parallels a 1987 code provision but is stated in a more general manner. See 1987 MCA 46-9-311.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 411 in (1)(e)(i) at end inserted language concerning restrictions in no contact order in partner or family member assault cases. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 411, L. 2005, provided: "WHEREAS, the Legislature has reviewed and considered the report filed by the Montana Domestic Violence Fatality Review Commission, which conducted case reviews of domestic violence homicides of spouses, partners, and children; and

WHEREAS, victims of domestic violence are at high risk for additional threats, violence, and homicide; and

WHEREAS, a victim's participation in a prosecution is jeopardized when a domestic violence assault is followed by intimidation in the form of threats and coercion; and

WHEREAS, courts have the authority to impose conditions on defendants charged with partner or family member assault when conditions will improve victim safety; and

WHEREAS, a court order restricting contact between the offender and the victim will improve victim safety."

2003 Amendment: Chapter 27 in (3) near beginning substituted "detention center" for "court"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 449 in (3) near beginning after "violation of" inserted "45-5-206" and after "45-5-220" inserted "or 45-5-626"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 292 inserted (3) requiring notice to alleged stalking victim. Amendment effective April 9, 1993.

1991 Amendment: Deleted former (1) and (1)(a) that read: "(1) If a person is admitted to bail, the conditions of bail shall be:

(a) that he will appear to answer in the court having jurisdiction on a day certain and thereafter as ordered by the court until discharged on final order of the court and will not depart from this state without leave"; in (1), near beginning after "required", substituted "or that will ensure the safety of any person or the community" for "and to protect any person from bodily injury"; inserted (1)(a) concerning not committing an offense; at end of (1)(b) inserted "and will not pose a danger to the safety of any person or the community"; deleted (1)(b)(iii) that read: "(iii) maintain or commence an educational program"; near end of (1)(d) inserted "the defendant's personal associations, place of abode, and"; at end of (1)(e) deleted "except that contact which is necessary to the preparation of the defense"; in (1)(f), before "agency", deleted "law enforcement", after "or" inserted "individual", and at end inserted "or other appropriate individual"; in (1)(i), at end after "drug", substituted "or other controlled substance without a legal prescription" for "without a prescription from a licensed medical practitioner"; deleted (1)(b)(x) that read: "(x) undergo available medical or psychiatric treatment, including treatment for drug or alcohol dependency, and remain in a specified institution if required for that purpose"; inserted (1)(j) concerning bail; inserted (1)(k) concerning return to custody for specified hours; inserted (2) prohibiting unreasonable conditions; deleted (3) that read: "(3) If the defendant is admitted to bail after conviction, the conditions of bail, in addition to those set forth in subsection (1), shall be that:

(a) he will duly prosecute his appeal; and

(b) if the judgment is affirmed or the cause reversed and remanded for a new trial, he will forthwith surrender to the officer from whose custody he was bailed"; and made minor changes in style.

1985 Amendment: In (1) in introductory clause, after "admitted to bail", deleted "before conviction"; in (1)(b) substituted language relating to any other conditions the court may prescribe to assure defendant's appearance and protect people for former (1)(b) that read: "any other conditions that the court may reasonably prescribe to assure his appearance when required"; inserted (2) authorizing the judge to impose additional or different conditions; and in (3) in introductory clause inserted "in addition to those set forth in subsection (1)", and deleted former (2)(b) and (2)(c) that read: "(b) he will appear at such time and place as the court may direct;

(c) he will not depart from this state without leave of the court".

No Showing That Defendant's Rights Violated by Failure to Make Bail or to Be Released on Own Recognizance — Writ of Habeas Corpus Denied: Following Miller's arrest on charges of negligent homicide and failure to remain at the scene of an accident, the District Court set bail at $30,000. When Miller could not make bail, the amount was reduced to $10,000. Indigent, Miller could not pay the reduced bail and remained incarcerated. Miller petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus, arguing that his continued incarceration was a violation of 46-9-106 and 46-9-111 and the constitutional guarantees of bail and against excessive sanctions. The Supreme Court noted that a defendant has a presumptive right to be released on a reasonable bail or on the defendant's own recognizance on conditions that will protect the community. However, the burden in a habeas corpus proceeding is on the petitioner to present a record that is sufficient to make a prima facie showing that the District Court's order constituted a violation, deprivation, infringement, or denial of the petitioner's constitutional, statutory, or legal rights. After considering the meager record and the seriousness of the allegations, the Supreme Court was not convinced that Miller had no ability to provide any bail or that the District Court could have released Miller on conditions that could be enforced and that could ensure the protection of the community. Thus, Miller failed to show that his rights were violated, and his petition for a writ of habeas corpus was denied. Miller v. District Court, 2007 MT 58, 336 M 207, 154 P3d 1186 (2007).

Criminal Defendant Entitled to Interest Earned on Cash Deposited as Bail Bond — Constitutional Issues: Richland County sought to retain the interest earned on a defendant's $50,000 cash bail bond that had been deposited with the court in an interest-bearing account and to apply the money to the county's general fund. Applying the general rule in Webb's Fabulous Pharmacies, Inc. v. Beckwith, 449 US 155, 66 L Ed 2d 358, 101 S Ct 446 (1980), the Supreme Court held that, absent a statutory provision allowing retention of the interest, the county is no more entitled to retain interest on a cash bail bond than it would be to retain accruing dividends on a deposit of stocks or bonds or the appreciated value on a pledge of real estate under 46-9-401. Retention of interest by the county would also violate several constitutional provisions as well, including: (1) the guarantee in Art. II, sec. 17, Mont. Const., that a citizen cannot be deprived of property without due process of law; (2) the guarantee in Art. II, sec. 29, Mont. Const., that property cannot be taken for public use without just compensation; and (3) a potential thwarting of Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., which guarantees a speedy trial, through the incentive by the county to prolong a criminal prosecution as long as possible in order to earn more interest on a bond deposit. Therefore, if the Clerk of Court deposits bond money in an interest-bearing account, then interest earned on the deposit belongs to the owner of the funds that generated the interest. Siroky v. 46-9-109. Release or detention hearing.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute establishes certain procedural requirements for the conduct of a release or detention hearing. Because the 1987 state code did not address court procedure at the hearing, the federal rules were used as a model. The statute is intended to standardize some of the considerations reviewed during the hearing and to establish a time at which the hearing will be conducted.

Subsection (1) requires that a defendant's eligibility for release be determined at the defendant's first appearance before the court. This provision was adopted to fix a time for the hearing and to recognize that expediency is preferred when a defendant's constitutional rights are concerned. While the statute fixes the time at the first appearance, nothing in the statute prevents a party from seeking a continuance.

Subsection (2) requires the court to consider certain factors in determining whether the defendant should be released. Considerations include the nature of the offense, the available evidence, the defendant's personal history (including past criminal conduct), and the bail (if any) that can be posted. The statute, while generally stated, is reflective of 1987 MCA 46-9-301.

Subsection (3) permits either party to request a hearing to determine whether the conditions imposed upon a defendant's release were appropriate. The provision operates in conjunction with the court's discretion to amend a release order at any time.

46-9-110. Release order.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute establishes the requirement that a release order include a written statement of any conditions or restrictions on the defendant's release. The purpose of adopting this provision is to ensure that the defendant and the appropriate agencies are notified of the terms of the defendant's release. The statement of conditions or restrictions included in the order should be delivered to the appropriate agencies.

The Commission reviewed the federal code, which contained extensive requirements for a release order, but determined that this generally stated statute satisfied the Commission's concerns. The Commission saw no reason to recommend adoption of the extensive federal code requirements.

46-9-111. Release on own recognizance.

Commission Comments

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, section 110-2.

In Montana's present bail system a great inequity arises because an indigent accused is incarcerated pending further criminal proceedings while a moneyed counterpart is freed on bail.

In Bandy v. U.S., 82 Sup. Ct. 11, 13 (1961) Douglas said: "Further reflection has led me to conclude that no man should be denied release because of indigency. Instead, under our constitutional system, a man is entitled to be released on personal recognizance where other relevant factors make it reasonable to believe that he will comply with the orders of the court."

A second factor which raised the issue of bail and recognizance is the work of the Vera Foundation. The purpose of the project was to test the hypothesis that a great number of defendants could safely be released on their own recognizance. The results of the project show that of 2,900 released on their own recognizance only 19 failed to appear. This is fewer than 1%—a smaller percentage than those that jump bail.

This proposal does not provide that all indigents or other defendants will automatically be at liberty pending trial. The court has discretion whether to allow a person pretrial freedom on personal recognizance. This decision by the court should only be made after investigation. This investigation could be carried on by such an agency as the parole board [now Board of Pardons and Parole].

The scope of personal recognizance is intended to cover a person that might be too poor a risk to grant pre-trial freedom unless provisions are made for additional supervision. An example of this would be to allow an accused person freedom pending trial on the condition he "check in" every day or remain in jail when not at work.

No Showing That Defendant's Rights Violated by Failure to Make Bail or to Be Released on Own Recognizance — Writ of Habeas Corpus Denied: Following Miller's arrest on charges of negligent homicide and failure to remain at the scene of an accident, the District Court set bail at $30,000. When Miller could not make bail, the amount was reduced to $10,000. Indigent, Miller could not pay the reduced bail and remained incarcerated. Miller petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus, arguing that his continued incarceration was a violation of 46-9-106 and this section and the constitutional guarantees of bail and against excessive sanctions. The Supreme Court noted that a defendant has a presumptive right to be released on a reasonable bail or on the defendant's own recognizance on conditions that will protect the community. However, the burden in a habeas corpus proceeding is on the petitioner to present a record that is sufficient to make a prima facie showing that the District Court's order constituted a violation, deprivation, infringement, or denial of the petitioner's constitutional, statutory, or legal rights. After considering the meager record and the seriousness of the allegations, the Supreme Court was not convinced that Miller had no ability to provide any bail or that the District Court could have released Miller on conditions that could be enforced and that could ensure the protection of the community. Thus, Miller failed to show that his rights were violated, and his petition for a writ of habeas corpus was denied. Miller v. District Court, 2007 MT 58, 336 M 207, 154 P3d 1186 (2007).

1991 Comment: This statute requires that the court in which a charge is pending be notified of the defendant's release and the conditions of that release, including the amount of bail, if any, that was required. The statute also requires that the court with trial jurisdiction obtain the bail posted as a condition of the release. Although stated in more general terms, the statute preserves the practice established in the 1987 code. See 1987 MCA 46-9-202.

If the defendant is brought before a judge other than the court in which the charge is pending, the judge must establish and accept bail and set the time for the appearance of the defendant in the court in which the charge is pending. The purpose of this section is to eliminate the practice of automatically setting bail entirely on the basis of the crime involved. The objection to setting bail amounts using the seriousness of the offense charged as the major criterion is that other factors which might indicate that the defendant is a "good risk" are completely ignored. This section is intended to implement Montana Constitution [1889], Article III, section 20 [now Art. II, sec. 22, 1972 Mont. Const.] which states that "Excessive bail shall not be required."

Good Time Credit for Indigent Defendant Confined to County Detention Facility: The decision in Bearden v. Ga., 461 US 660, 76 L Ed 2d 221, 103 S Ct 2064 (1983), clearly and unambiguously stands for the principle that to deprive a criminal defendant of freedom simply because, through no want of bona fide effort, willful refusal, or fault of the defendant, the defendant lacks the financial resources to buy liberty is contrary to the fundamental fairness required by the 14th amendment to the U.S. Constitution. This is not to say that poverty insulates a defendant from having to post a reasonable bond should the facts and circumstances of the case so require. However, if a criminal defendant is unable to secure presentence freedom by posting bail for no other reason than indigency, that defendant is entitled to good time credit for the presentence time spent in a county detention facility to the same extent that the law allows good time credit to the criminal defendant who is able to post bail and thus serve the entirety of a sentence in the state correctional facility. In the present case, it was not clear from the record whether defendant was offered or denied bail and whether, if offered, the sole reason for defendant's inability to post bail was indigency; nevertheless, the Supreme Court granted defendant's petition for writ of habeas corpus and remanded to the District Court for a determination of whether defendant was entitled to good time credit for time served in the county detention facility. MacPheat v. Mahoney, 2000 MT 62, 299 M 46, 997 P2d 753, 57 St. Rep. 291 (2000), following MacFarlane v. Walter, 179 F3d 1131 (9th Cir. 1999), and followed in Eisenman v. St., 2000 MT 170, 300 M 322, 5 P3d 542, 57 St. Rep. 704 (2000), in which the case of an indigent defendant was remanded for a determination of whether defendant was detained presentence in a county detention facility because he was too poor to post bail and thus entitled to credit for good time under the MacPheat test. However, see also McGinnis v. Royster, 410 US 263, 35 L Ed 2d 282, 93 S Ct 1055 (1973). MacPheat was distinguished in Sebastian v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 88, 305 M 158, 25 P3d 163 (2001).

Bail of $300 for Indigent Not Excessive: The Supreme Court held that a $300 bail for an indigent accused of two traffic offenses was not excessive because the sum equaled the maximum amount of the fines and the defendant had failed three times to appear on the charges. Billings v. Layzell, 242 M 145, 789 P2d 221, 47 St. Rep. 558 (1990).

Indigent Intentionally Prolonged Incident — No Constitutional Violation: The defendant, an indigent, failed three times to appear to answer charges on two traffic violations. The lower court ordered him held in jail until his trial, which was set for 65 days later, with bail set at $300. The Supreme Court stated that the record indicated that the City Court Judge had engaged in a wholly inappropriate exercise of judicial power to punish the defendant by setting the bail in an amount the defendant could not pay and then setting an excessively late trial date. While incarceration of indigents is not prevented in every case, a court must search for the least oppressive alternative. However, the Supreme Court refused to find a constitutional violation because the defendant had $47 and could have obtained a surety bond for $50 and made no attempt to obtain the additional $3 he needed. Billings v. Layzell, 242 M 145, 789 P2d 221, 47 St. Rep. 558 (1990).

Bail Not Excessive: Defendant was not effectively denied his right to bail by reason of excessive bail. The court considered the factors in this section and set bail in an amount calculated to ensure defendant's presence at future criminal proceedings. St. v. Pease, 227 M 424, 740 P2d 659, 44 St. Rep. 1203 (1987).

Right to Bail: It was not reversible error for trial court to set the appellant's bail at $500,000 originally and then lower it to $50,000 a week later. The imposition of bail is an area that is largely within the discretion of the trial court, and the amount set will always be upheld if it is reasonable. St. v. Lance, 222 M 92, 721 P2d 1258, 43 St. Rep. 1086 (1986).

Factors to Be Considered: The trial judge in determining the amount of bail to be fixed should take into consideration, inter alia, the enormity of the crime, the maximum penalty, the pecuniary condition of the defendant, the probability of the defendant's flight, his general character and reputation, and the apparent strength of the proof as bearing upon the probability of his conviction. St. v. McLeod, 131 M 478, 311 P2d 400 (1957).

Attorney General's Opinions

Authority of Municipal Court to Grant Time-Pay Bail Bonds: A time-pay bail bond system, which allows a defendant to make payments in monthly or weekly installments in an amount and frequency set by a court to correspond with the requirement that the defendant pay the full bail amount before the date of trial, promotes the constitutional policy of providing bail except in capital cases. The system also comports with statutory requirements that the bail amount not be oppressive and be considerate of the defendant's financial ability. The system requires a defendant to pay cash for the bond, albeit in installments paid over a period of time. Because a court has discretion to set the appropriate bail amounts and to accept personal property in lieu of cash, the court also has discretion to set the timing on the payment of any cash bond. Therefore, a Municipal Court Judge is authorized to release a defendant on a time-pay bail bond in an amount set by the judge to be paid in installments. 49 A.G. Op. 18 (2002).

46-9-302. Bail schedule — acceptance by peace officer.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: Subsection (1) is an adaptation of the 1987 code that permitted a court to establish a bail schedule for minor offenses. It was determined that the bail schedule should not be limited to misdemeanor offenses. The Commission recognized that there are some felony offenses that may be compatible with a bail schedule. The development of a bail schedule allows law enforcement agencies to expedite a defendant's release without violating the constitutional mandate that bail be set by the court. This statute does not override more specific statutes that require the court to personally review the case before setting the amount of bail.

Subsection (2) is a newly developed provision intended to consolidate two 1987 statutes. See 1987 MCA 46-9-302 and 46-9-303. Both of these statutes addressed those instances in which a peace officer may accept bail on behalf of a judge. Subsection (2) recognizes that bail may be accepted in accordance with a bail schedule or as expressed in the terms of an arrest warrant. Subsection (3) is a restatement of the procedure upon the acceptance of bail. The required procedure includes the issuance of a receipt and delivery of bail to the judge. The consolidation of these two statutes does not alter established procedure.

Source: New.

This provision is designed to establish a constitutional procedure for the determination, acceptance, and forfeiture of bail for certain minor offenses such as traffic, fish and game, and minor liquor violations. Under the present practice peace officers both determine and accept bail for traffic and other minor offenses (see [44-1-1101 and 44-1-1102]). In order to comply with the constitutional requirements, bail must be set by a judicial officer. The procedure provided for in this section is for the convenience of the offender, peace officer, magistrate and the state.

The schedule shall establish what is acceptable for bail, i.e., cash, checks, or other collateral. Further, it may include the release of an individual on his own recognizance if the judge desires.

Chapter 425 in (1), at end, substituted "partner, as defined in 45-5-206" for "household member".

1991 Amendment: Throughout section substituted "judge" for "justice of the peace or city judge"; in (1), in first sentence before "bail", deleted "cash" and at end substituted "over which the judge has original jurisdiction" for "except for offenses amounting to felonies and the offense of domestic abuse" and inserted second sentence requiring appearance for domestic offenses; at end of (2)(a) inserted "established under subsection (1)"; inserted (2)(b) concerning bail specified in arrest warrant; and made minor changes in style.

1985 Amendment: At end of (1) substituted "except for offenses amounting to felonies and the offense of domestic abuse" for "not amounting to a felony".

Case Notes

"In Accordance With the Schedule": The court's finding of a violation of this section was not supported by substantial evidence when the record failed to show that the bond accepted by an officer in reliance on his everyday experience and memory was any different from that listed in the bond schedule. This section includes "substitutions" of bail as well as increasing bail as referred to in the old code. The most important change is that either side must have notice of any proposed change in the status of the bail. Either side may move for a change in the bail. This applies to all stages of bail. Revocation of bail shall occur only for cause.

Case Notes

Concurrent Notice and Revocation Reasonable: Concurrent notice and revocation of bail at petitioner's hearing on his application for a Writ of Habeas Corpus was reasonable as petitioner had left the state and did not return until the time of hearing. In re Petition of Gray, 184 M 363, 603 P2d 230 (1979).

Revocation — "Law of the Case" Principle: When petitioner in a habeas corpus proceeding had been released on bail for 15 months, the revocation of bail by a judge other than the judge who had originally admitted the defendant to bail did not violate the "law of the case" principle. In re Petition of Gray, 184 M 363, 603 P2d 230 (1979).

Revocation of Bail by Court on Its Own Motion: A court may act on its own motion to revoke bail. In re Petition of Gray, 184 M 363, 603 P2d 230 (1979).

Denial of Reduction: The court did not err in refusing the defendant's motion to reduce bail when the person assaulted was in a very precarious condition and it was not known whether he would live or die. St. v. McLeod, 131 M 478, 311 P2d 400 (1957).

Restitution Not to Be Made From Forfeited Appearance Bond: A judge is without the authority to order restitution to be made from a forfeited appearance bond. Restitution is not a "cost" of the case that may be defrayed. Section 46-18-603 refers specifically to costs incurred by the county, not by the victim. The money from the forfeited bond is to be paid to the County Treasurer. 38 A.G. Op. 96 (1980).

46-9-401. Forms of bail.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is modeled after the 1987 code and establishes the types of property that may be used to satisfy a bail requirement. The statute is chiefly a restatement of the code, but some amendments have been made to expand the established procedure.

A new provision has been added to subsection (1) that "certificates of deposit or other personal property" may be accepted as satisfaction for a bail requirement. Subsection (2) amends the 1987 code to impose certain restrictions on a commercial surety bond. Subsection (3) is a new provision that expressly recognizes that the surety may surrender the defendant, whether or not other types of bail have been posted, whenever the surety considers himself insecure.

The statute alters established procedure by expanding the types of personal property that may be posted as bail and by regulating certain aspects of the surety bond. It is not anticipated that these changes will greatly affect the defendant's ability to post bail.

Case Notes

Conflicting Evidence Whether Indemnity Note on Bail Bond Considered Valid Contract — District Court's Finding Not Clearly Erroneous: Rohrich signed an indemnity agreement with Anderson, who owned a bail bond business, to secure a bond posted for the release of Brummer. When signing the indemnity note, Rohrich did not question Anderson about the note and signed it without discussion regarding the effect of his signature. The note provided that should Anderson become liable for the forfeiture of the bail bond, the indemnitor would indemnify Anderson, with interest, and also pay reasonable attorney fees in the event that a suit was necessary to collect the amount owed. Brummer subsequently fled the state, and the County Attorney moved for bail forfeiture. The District Court ordered that judgment in the full amount of bail be entered against Brummer and against Anderson as the surety. After Anderson satisfied the judgment, he waited to see if Rohrich would indemnify him, but Rohrich did not do so; therefore, Anderson brought an action to enforce the indemnity note. At trial, Rohrich maintained that the note was blank when he signed it and that therefore he did not sign a valid contract. Rohrich also contended that the date on the note, which was 1 year after Brummer was released from prison, was further evidence that Anderson did not complete the terms of the note prior to Rohrich's signature. Anderson testified that the note did contain all essential terms when Rohrich signed it, and that testimony was affirmed by Anderson's assistant. Anderson also testified that the date was a typographical error and that as a matter of business practice, he would not provide an indemnitor with a blank note. Further, Rohrich was familiar with indemnity notes, having signed notes on three prior occasions with Anderson, including two that he signed for himself. After weighing the conflicting evidence, the District Court ordered Rohrich to pay the full amount, plus attorney fees, interest, and costs. Rohrich appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed, paying substantial deference to the trial court because as the factfinder, the trial court was in the best position to evaluate the testimony and judge the credibility of the witnesses. Anderson v. Rohrich, 2001 MT 106, 305 M 274, 26 P3d 99 (2001).

Criminal Defendant Entitled to Interest Earned on Cash Deposited as Bail Bond — Constitutional Issues: Richland County sought to retain the interest earned on a defendant's $50,000 cash bail bond that had been deposited with the court in an interest-bearing account and to apply the money to the county's general fund. Applying the general rule in Webb's Fabulous Pharmacies, Inc. v. Beckwith, 449 US 155, 66 L Ed 2d 358, 101 S Ct 446 (1980), the Supreme Court held that, absent a statutory provision allowing retention of the interest, the county is no more entitled to retain interest on a cash bail bond than it would be to retain accruing dividends on a deposit of stocks or bonds or the appreciated value on a pledge of real estate under this section. Retention of interest by the county would also violate several constitutional provisions as well, including: (1) the guarantee in Art. II, sec. 17, Mont. Const., that a citizen cannot be deprived of property without due process of law; (2) the guarantee in Art. II, sec. 29, Mont. Const., that property cannot be taken for public use without just compensation; and (3) a potential thwarting of Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., which guarantees a speedy trial, through the incentive by the county to prolong a criminal prosecution as long as possible in order to earn more interest on a bond deposit. Therefore, if the Clerk of Court deposits bond money in an interest-bearing account, then interest earned on the deposit belongs to the owner of the funds that generated the interest. Siroky v. Cash Bail Required — Findings in Record Required: Defendant contended that by ordering his $25,000 bail bond to be comprised of $15,000 by the normal surety method and $10,000 in cash, the District Court violated Art. II, sec. 21, Mont. Const., and 46-9-401. The issue was moot as to defendant. The Supreme Court said in the future it would closely scrutinize a requirement of bail in the form of cash which could effectively prevent a person from being free on bail pending trial and clash with the presumption of innocence. If a court believes a cash bail is necessary, it must make specific findings to that effect and include those findings in the record for purposes of review. St. v. Rodriguez, 192 M 411, 628 P2d 280, 38 St. Rep. 578F (1981).

Attorney General's Opinions

Authority of Municipal Court to Grant Time-Pay Bail Bonds: A time-pay bail bond system, which allows a defendant to make payments in monthly or weekly installments in an amount and frequency set by a court to correspond with the requirement that the defendant pay the full bail amount before the date of trial, promotes the constitutional policy of providing bail except in capital cases. The system also comports with statutory requirements that the bail amount not be oppressive and be considerate of the defendant's financial ability. The system requires a defendant to pay cash for the bond, albeit in installments paid over a period of time. Because a court has discretion to set the appropriate bail amounts and to accept personal property in lieu of cash, the court also has discretion to set the timing on the payment of any cash bond. Therefore, a Municipal Court Judge is authorized to release a defendant on a time-pay bail bond in an amount set by the judge to be paid in installments. 49 A.G. Op. 18 (2002).

State Financial Responsibility for Sentenced Inmate Upon Oral Pronouncement of Sentence: A sentencing hearing represents the only common date by which the criminal justice system can definitely measure when legal and financial responsibility for an inmate shifts from a county to the state. Oral pronouncement of sentence from the bench in the presence of a defendant constitutes final judgment (see St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998)). Once sentenced, an inmate is considered to be in the legal custody of the Department of Corrections, even though a local or regional detention center may serve as a place of temporary detention until the inmate can be placed by the Department. Therefore, upon oral pronouncement of sentence that transfers legal custody of an inmate to the Department, the financial responsibility for the inmate transfers to the Department as well. 49 A.G. Op. 13 (2001).

The object of this section is to protect the attorneys working on criminal cases and the officials who administer the bail provisions. It will also prevent any unfavorable implications which might arise if attorneys and bail officials were allowed to act as sureties.

46-9-403. Qualifying property as bail.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is chiefly a restatement of the 1987 code that established certain qualifications for posting bail. See 1987 MCA 46-9-403. The key changes adopted under this statute provide for closer regulation of the use of commercial surety bonds.

Subsection (1) has been amended to require a defendant or surety to file a schedule describing all personal property posted to meet a bail requirement. The 1987 code required this listing only when stocks or bonds were posted as bail. The amendment provided by the statute recognizes that bail may be satisfied by certificates of deposit and other personal property, as well as by stocks or bonds.

Subsection (4) preserves the code's recognition that a commercial surety bond may be executed by any qualified surety company. However, the provision has been amended to establish minimum form requirements for such an undertaking. Such requirements were considered necessary for better regulation of commercial sureties and for establishing uniformity in statewide practice. The Insurance Commissioner shall prescribe a form for commercial bonds that meets the minimum requirements stated in this statute.

Subsection (5) is a new provision that expressly recognizes the court's authority to investigate the sufficiency of an undertaking posted to satisfy bail. This provision should not cause a change in established procedure.

The last half of subsection (1) of R.C.M. 1947, section 94-8403 which allowed the magistrate to refuse to accept any person on bail who is not a resident of the county where bail is offered has been deleted. It was determined that under modern conditions the bailor need not be a resident of the county. A surety's financial condition can be easily checked any place in Montana today. The remainder of paragraph [(1)] is taken verbatim from the prior section.

Case Notes

Criminal Defendant Entitled to Interest Earned on Cash Deposited as Bail Bond — Constitutional Issues: Richland County sought to retain the interest earned on a defendant's $50,000 cash bail bond that had been deposited with the court in an interest-bearing account and to apply the money to the county's general fund. Applying the general rule in Webb's Fabulous Pharmacies, Inc. v. Beckwith, 449 US 155, 66 L Ed 2d 358, 101 S Ct 446 (1980), the Supreme Court held that, absent a statutory provision allowing retention of the interest, the county is no more entitled to retain interest on a cash bail bond than it would be to retain accruing dividends on a deposit of stocks or bonds or the appreciated value on a pledge of real estate under 46-9-401. Retention of interest by the county would also violate several constitutional provisions as well, including: (1) the guarantee in Art. II, sec. 17, Mont. Const., that a citizen cannot be deprived of property without due process of law; (2) the guarantee in Art. II, sec. 29, Mont. Const., that property cannot be taken for public use without just compensation; and (3) a potential thwarting of Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., which guarantees a speedy trial, through the incentive by the county to prolong a criminal prosecution as long as possible in order to earn more interest on a bond deposit. Therefore, if the Clerk of Court deposits bond money in an interest-bearing account, then interest earned on the deposit belongs to the owner of the funds that generated the interest. Siroky v. 46-9-503. Violation of release condition — forfeiture.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute combines elements of the 1987 state code and the federal code into a single statute concerning the violation of release conditions. The amendments adopted in this statute should not cause a significant change in established procedure.

Subsection (1) reflects a provision from the federal code that allows the prosecutor to seek a revocation of a release order when conditions imposed by the court are not being observed. See 18 U.S.C. 3148. The statute recognizes the prosecuting attorney's right to make a motion for a revocation of release, allows the judge to issue an arrest warrant for a violator of release conditions, and requires that the defendant be brought before a judge for an initial appearance upon arrest. The last requirement is expressly provided to avoid any question about the defendant's entitlement to an appearance following arrest.

Subsection (2) provides that bail posted as a condition of release may be forfeited only if a defendant fails to appear as required. The 1987 code was unclear as to when bail could be forfeited. The Commission determined that forfeiture should be an option only when the defendant fails to appear. The provision requires notice of forfeiture to the defendant and the bail sureties and allows that such notice may be mailed to their last- known address.

Subsection (3) retains the 30-day notice period recognized in the 1987 code. See 1987 MCA 46-9-503(3). If during that period the defendant appears as required or the defendant's failure to appear is explained, the court may order the forfeiture discharged. The actual procedure required for a proper forfeiture is provided in 46-9-511.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 420 in (3) near middle of first sentence after "sureties" inserted "surrender the defendant pursuant to 46-9-510 or ", after "judge" substituted "shall" for "may", and at end substituted "without penalty" for "upon terms as may be just"; inserted (5) providing that if a surety returns a defendant within 90 days of forfeiture of a bond, the forfeiture must be discharged without penalty; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 18, 2003.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 456 in (3), near beginning, extended time after forfeiture from 30 days to 90 days; and inserted (4) concerning exoneration.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 270 at end of (2) inserted "within 10 working days or the bond becomes void and must be released and returned to the surety within 5 working days"; and in first sentence of (3), near beginning after "the forfeiture", deleted "the defendant or" and inserted second sentence providing that if the defendant appears within 90 days after forfeiture with a satisfactory excuse, the forfeiture must be discharged.

1991 Amendment: In (1) substituted present language concerning violation of condition of release and arrest for former text that read: "If the accused does not comply with the conditions of the bail bond, the court having jurisdiction shall enter an order declaring the bail to be forfeited"; in (2) substituted first sentence concerning forfeiture of bail for failure to appear for former text that read: "If such forfeiture is declared by a district court" and in second sentence substituted "defendant" for "accused"; in (3), after "defendant or", substituted "the defendant's sureties appear and satisfactorily excuse the defendant's failure to appear, the judge" for "his bail appear and satisfactorily excuse his negligence or failure to comply with the conditions of the bail, the court, in its discretion"; deleted (4) that read: "(4) If such forfeiture is declared by a district court and if the forfeiture is not discharged as provided in this section, the court shall enter judgment for the state against the accused and his sureties for the amount of the bail and costs of the proceedings"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Conflicting Evidence Whether Indemnity Note on Bail Bond Considered Valid Contract — District Court's Finding Not Clearly Erroneous: Rohrich signed an indemnity agreement with Anderson, who owned a bail bond business, to secure a bond posted for the release of Brummer. When signing the indemnity note, Rohrich did not question Anderson about the note and signed it without discussion regarding the effect of his signature. The note provided that should Anderson become liable for the forfeiture of the bail bond, the indemnitor would indemnify Anderson, with interest, and also pay reasonable attorney fees in the event that a suit was necessary to collect the amount owed. Brummer subsequently fled the state, and the County Attorney moved for bail forfeiture. The District Court ordered that judgment in the full amount of bail be entered against Brummer and against Anderson as the surety. After Anderson satisfied the judgment, he waited to see if Rohrich would indemnify him, but Rohrich did not do so; therefore, Anderson brought an action to enforce the indemnity note. At trial, Rohrich maintained that the note was blank when he signed it and that therefore he did not sign a valid contract. Rohrich also contended that the date on the note, which was 1 year after Brummer was released from prison, was further evidence that Anderson did not complete the terms of the note prior to Rohrich's signature. Anderson testified that the note did contain all essential terms when Rohrich signed it, and that testimony was affirmed by Anderson's assistant. Anderson also testified that the date was a typographical error and that as a matter of business practice, he would not provide an indemnitor with a blank note. Further, Rohrich was familiar with indemnity notes, having signed notes on three prior occasions with Anderson, including two that he signed for himself. After weighing the conflicting evidence, the District Court ordered Rohrich to pay the full amount, plus attorney fees, interest, and costs. Rohrich appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed, paying substantial deference to the trial court because as the factfinder, the trial court was in the best position to evaluate the testimony and judge the credibility of the witnesses. Anderson v. Rohrich, 2001 MT 106, 305 M 274, 26 P3d 99 (2001).

Court's Discretion Not Limited to Actual Damages: This section does not limit the court's discretion to actual damages. When assessing costs in a bond forfeiture case, the court should consider: (1) the willfulness of the defendant's violation of bail conditions; (2) the surety's participation in locating or apprehending the defendant; (3) the cost, inconvenience, and prejudice suffered by the state as a result of the violation; (4) any intangible costs; (5) the public interest in ensuring a defendant's appearance; and (6) any mitigating factors. St. v. Am. Bankers Ins. Co. of Fla., 229 M 183, 745 P2d 687, 44 St. Rep. 1879 (1987).

Incarceration by Foreign Sovereign Not Per Se Satisfactory Excuse: Defendants were arrested and detained by authorities in a foreign jurisdiction, resulting both in their failure to appear in Montana for an omnibus hearing and in a subsequent bond forfeiture. Their surety argued that such detention was an excuse satisfactory to suspend surety's responsibility except for actual costs incurred in returning defendants to Montana. However, defendants' incarceration was a direct result of their own criminal acts. Defendants could not avail themselves of their own wrong to escape accountability in Montana, nor could the surety avail itself of an excuse not available to defendants. Incarceration by a foreign sovereign was not a per se satisfactory excuse for failure to appear, but it was a factor for the District Court to consider in determining discharge. St. v. Am. Bankers Ins. Co. of Fla., 229 M 183, 745 P2d 687, 44 St. Rep. 1879 (1987).

Surety's Liability Not Excused by State's Failure to Seek Extradition: Surety argued that the state had a duty to seek the return of defendants incarcerated in a foreign jurisdiction. However, the state is not the surety's surety and has no duty to remedy the surety's breach of contract. The state need only refrain from obstructing or interfering with surety's efforts, and failure to seek extradition did not constitute such interference. St. v. Am. Bankers Ins. Co. of Fla., 229 M 183, 745 P2d 687, 44 St. Rep. 1879 (1987).

Immediate Forfeiture Upon Nonappearance Not Required: Nothing in this section requires a court to declare a forfeiture immediately upon a defendant's first nonappearance. St. v. Sunday, 224 M 340, 729 P2d 1319, 43 St. Rep. 2235 (1986).

Jurisdiction Not Lost Due to Delay in Mailing Notice of Bond Forfeiture: A 77-day delay between the date bond was forfeited and the date surety agent was notified did not deprive the District Court of jurisdiction simply because notice was not mailed "forthwith" as required by this section. As long as the 30-day period elapsed between the notice of forfeiture and judgment on the forfeiture, the statutory requirements and mandates of due process were met. (See 1993, 1997, and 2003 amendments.) St. v. Sunday, 224 M 340, 729 P2d 1319, 43 St. Rep. 2235 (1986).

Grounds for Vacation of Forfeiture — Particular Facts: Damage to and expenses of the county are not the only factors the court may consider in discharging forfeiture of a bail bond. This section directs the court to order discharge upon such terms as may be just, and the court should consider other factors and circumstances peculiar to the case. St. v. Musgrove, 202 M 516, 659 P2d 285, 40 St. Rep. 251 (1983).

Partial Excuse Allowable: This section does not require a complete as opposed to a partial excuse, and Supreme Court would not read such a requirement into this section. St. v. Musgrove, 202 M 516, 659 P2d 285, 40 St. Rep. 251 (1983).

Vacation of Forfeiture Granted — Mentally Disturbed Defendant: District Court had jurisdiction to order vacation of $45,000 worth of a $50,000 bail bond forfeiture, based on its findings that defendant thought he was being "railroaded" at trial, claimed a total emotional breakdown and a desire to go to Texas and commit suicide, did not think he knew what he was doing, and was diagnosed by a psychiatrist in Texas as having psychotic depression and suicidal tendencies. St. v. Musgrove, 202 M 516, 659 P2d 285, 40 St. Rep. 251 (1983).

Review of Decision — Test: Since this section directs the court to use its discretion, the general rule on the scope of review applies and the court will not disturb the decision below absent a clear abuse of discretion, the test being whether the court acted arbitrarily without the employment of conscious judgment or exceeded the bounds of reason. St. v. Musgrove, 202 M 516, 659 P2d 285, 40 St. Rep. 251 (1983).

Bail Forfeiture Not to Be Imposed as a Penalty: The surety bond was forfeited following defendant's failure to appear. Later the defendant turned himself in and was convicted. The surety petitioned the District Court to discharge the bond forfeiture contending that the defendant's mental condition constituted a satisfactory excuse for his failure to appear. The trial court improperly excluded the defendant's wife's opinion concerning her husband's mental condition and indicated a bias that resulted in effectively denying the surety an opportunity to establish its case of excuse in order to exonerate its bond forfeiture. The trial court also caused half of the bond to be forfeited as a penalty, which is not the purpose of bail. The cause was remanded for a determination of "just terms" for discharging the bail. St. v. Musgrove, 187 M 549, 610 P2d 710 (1980).

Bond Forfeiture — Notice Procedure in Justice's Court: The statutory procedures for bond forfeiture are equally applicable to bond forfeiture proceedings in Justice's Court; therefore, such court is required to give written notice of forfeiture and allow a 30-day "waiting period" (see 1997 and 2003 amendments) during which the forfeiture may be discharged. Failing to do so, the court may not refuse further bonds from the surety. Wilshire Ins. Co. v. Carrington, 570 P2d 301, 34 St. Rep. 1135 (1977) (not reported in Montana Reports).

46-9-510. Surrender of defendant.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute replaces the 1987 code and allows the defendant's surrender while forfeiture of bail proceedings are pending. See 1987 MCA 46-9-205. The statute is a generally stated provision and makes no major changes in established procedure.

Subsection (1) recognizes the two events that would avoid a pending forfeiture; the defendant may personally surrender or a surety may arrest and surrender the defendant. The statute does not require the defendant's surrender to any particular person but allows surrender to either the court or any peace officer of this state. This amendment has been made to provide some latitude in the manner in which a defendant's appearance is ultimately obtained.

Subsection (2) retains 1987 MCA 46-9-205(2). That provision provides that once the defendant has surrendered, the court may order the bail exonerated.

Source: R.C.M. 1947, sections 94-8701 and 94-8702.

This section is a combination of two sections from the present code which allow the defendant to be surrendered before forfeiture of bail by the surety or the defendant himself. 1991 Amendment: Deleted former (1) that read: "(1) Unless restitution is ordered as provided for in subsection (2), the court having jurisdiction shall proceed with the disposition of forfeited bail as follows:

(a) If judgment be rendered or the forfeiture not discharged and the defendant has deposited money as bail, the court with whom it is deposited must, immediately after receiving notice of said judgment or order of forfeiture, pay over the money deposited to the treasury of the city or county wherein the bail was taken.

(b) When judgment is entered in favor of the state or the order of forfeiture is not discharged on any bail, execution may be issued forthwith for levy on stocks or bonds deposited with the court or upon the real estate described in the bail schedule. Such stocks, bonds, and real estate shall be sold in the same manner as in execution sales in civil actions. The proceeds of such sale shall be used to satisfy all court costs and prior encumbrances, if any, and from the balance a sufficient sum to satisfy the judgment or forfeiture shall be paid into the treasury of the city or county wherein the bail bond was taken. The balance shall be returned to the owner. The real estate so sold may be redeemed in the same manner as real estate may be redeemed after execution sales in civil actions.

(c) When judgment is entered in favor of the state and against the sureties or the surety company or when the forfeiture has not been discharged, execution may be issued against the sureties or the surety company in the same manner as executions in civil actions"; in (1), in second sentence, deleted "Except as provided in 87-1-111" and at end substituted "by law" for "in 46-18-243"; at end of (3) substituted "46-9-511" for "subsection (1)"; and made minor changes in style.

1989 Amendment: At beginning of second sentence of (2) inserted exception clause. Amendment effective March 18, 1989.

1985 Amendment: In (1) inserted "Unless restitution is ordered as provided for in subsection (2)"; and inserted (2) relating to payment of forfeited bail as restitution.

Case Notes

Bond Forfeiture Not Generally Synonymous With Conviction — No Double Jeopardy for Assault Proceedings: Toth forfeited bond for disorderly conduct that occurred on the same day that he was charged with assault with a weapon. Toth claimed that if the bond forfeiture arose from the same events that led to the assault charge, double jeopardy would bar further conviction for assault. The Supreme Court disagreed. Absent specific legislation to that effect, bond forfeiture is not generally synonymous with a conviction for double jeopardy purposes. Bond forfeiture is essentially a civil action and is not admissible as evidence in any other civil action, but bond forfeiture is included within the definition of conviction for particular statutorily delineated purposes only, not including assault. Thus, even if Toth's felony assault charge bond forfeiture arose out of the same transaction as the disorderly conduct, jeopardy did not attach by the bond forfeiture, so Toth's claim failed. St. v. Toth, 2008 MT 404, 347 M 184, 197 P3d 1013 (2008). See also Scott v. S. Carolina, 513 SE 2d 100 (S.C. 1999).

Entrance of Judgment Against Sureties on Bond — Jurisdiction Exceeded: While the District Court may summarily enter judgment against the person charged with a crime who fails to appear according to the condition of his bond, it exceeds its jurisdiction when it goes further than to authorize proceedings by the County Attorney against the sureties by proper action and at once enters judgment against them for the amount of the bond. State ex rel. Van v. District Court, 54 M 577, 172 P 540 (1918).

Suit to Recover on Bond — Complaint: In a suit to recover the amount of a bond for failure of a defendant to appear in the District Court in accordance with the condition of the bond, it is not necessary to allege in the complaint that the defendant made default of appearance "without excuse". St. v. Wrote, 19 M 209, 47 P 898 (1897).

Attorney General's Opinions

Forfeited Appearance Bonds — Credited to Elementary School District Foundation: Forfeited appearance bonds should be credited by the County Treasurer to the equalization of the county elementary school district foundation programs (now BASE funding program), in the same manner as fines are credited under 20-9-331. This is the general method practiced as shown by audits of local government units. 38 A.G. Op. 96 (1980).

CHAPTER 10
PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

1991 Chapter Comments: This chapter retains a substantial part of the 1987 code governing the preliminary examination. The Commission recommended a subsequent general rule for the closure of any criminal proceeding. See 46-11-701.

Chapter Case Notes

Options for Determining Probable Cause — Time Limits: Where defendant was out on bond, a delay of 10 days between initial appearance and the determination of probable cause by leave to file an information was not unreasonable, nor was defendant entitled to a preliminary hearing. The purpose of the preliminary hearing is to determine whether there is probable cause to believe that a felony has been committed. The probable cause determination may be made in a preliminary examination in Justice's Court (46-10-105), or it may be made by application to the District Court Judge, presenting by affidavit such evidence as the judge may require (46-11-201). The only requirement is that there is an independent judicial determination of probable cause within a reasonable time. The defendant had no vested right to either procedure. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980). See also St. v. McElderry, 284 M 365, 944 P2d 230, 54 St. Rep. 922 (1997).

Preliminary Hearing — Not "Fishing Expedition": The preliminary hearing is not meant to be a "fishing expedition" for all possible evidence, and if probable cause is established to the satisfaction of the District Judge by the County Attorney's affidavit, the defendant has little reason to complain. In addition, though the defendant argued that failure to hold a preliminary examination in this case may have allowed an important witness to get away without ever being interviewed, that witness had no relevance to his defense of alibi. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980).

Case Notes

No Error in Refusing to Dismiss Charges for Failure to Hold Timely Probable Cause Hearing: Brown was arrested on February 13, but no probable cause hearing was held until February 18. Brown moved for dismissal on due process grounds of failure to hold a probable cause hearing within 48 hours of arrest, citing County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 US 44, 114 L Ed 2d 49, 111 S Ct 1161 (1991), but the dismissal motion was denied. Brown appealed. The Supreme Court pointed out that the question to be decided was not whether Brown was accorded a timely probable cause determination, but rather whether the District Court erred in refusing to dismiss the charges as a remedy for failure to hold a probable cause hearing. Dismissal of charges is not the correct remedy for failure to timely charge a person who was arrested without a warrant. Under St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985), the proper remedy is the exclusion of evidence acquired as a result of the delay. The trial court did not err in refusing the motion to dismiss. St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 339, 297 M 427, 993 P2d 672, 56 St. Rep. 1346 (1999). See also St. v. Dieziger, 200 M 267, 650 P2d 800, 39 St. Rep. 1734 (1982).

Reasonable Time for Preliminary Examination or Leave to File Information — Time for Commencement of "Reasonable Time" — Higley Clarified: McElderry was arrested on October 14 for DUI, fifth offense; reckless driving; and driving while her license was revoked. On October 16, she made her initial appearance in Lake County Justice's Court and was charged by complaint with the offenses for which she was arrested. On October 25, the state filed a motion in District Court for leave to file an information. The motion was granted on October 28, and an information was filed the same day. On October 29, McElderry filed a motion in District Court to dismiss the charges, arguing that this section, as interpreted by the Supreme Court in St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043 (1980), required that a determination of probable cause be made within 10 days after a defendant's initial appearance. The District Court dismissed the information, reasoning that the state failed to hold a preliminary examination in Justice's Court or to obtain leave from the District Court to file the information within the reasonable time required by this section. The Supreme Court held that the District Court erred in calculating the reasonable time as beginning with the time of McElderry's arrest because the plain language of this section requires that the period be calculated from the date of initial appearance of the defendant. The Supreme Court therefore recalculated the total delay at 12 days, rather than 14 days. The Supreme Court further explained that its use of the 10-day time period in Higley was intended to mean that the 10-day period at issue in that case was not unreasonable but was not intended to limit the period of reasonable time to 10 days in all cases. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that the District Court erred in interpreting Higley to apply a 10-day limitation in every case.

Because the District Court erred in determining the start of the reasonable time and in applying Higley, the Supreme Court held that a new time must be calculated. However, the Supreme Court was unable to tell how the District Court would properly apply its discretion in redetermining a reasonable time and therefore vacated the judgment of the District Court and remanded the case for further proceedings consistent with the Supreme Court's opinion. St. v. McElderry, 284 M 365, 944 P2d 230, 54 St. Rep. 922 (1997), followed in St. v. Robison, 2003 MT 198, 317 M 19, 75 P3d 301 (2003).

Options for Determining Probable Cause — Time Limits: Where defendant was out on bond, a delay of 10 days between initial appearance and the determination of probable cause by leave to file an information was not unreasonable, nor was defendant entitled to a preliminary hearing. The purpose of the preliminary hearing is to determine whether there is probable cause to believe that a felony has been committed (46-10-101, now repealed). The probable cause determination may be made in a preliminary examination in Justice's Court, or it may be made by application to the District Court Judge, presenting by affidavit such evidence as the judge may require (46-11-201). The only requirement is that there is an independent judicial determination of probable cause within a reasonable time. The defendant had no vested right to either procedure. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980), followed in St. v. Farnsworth, 240 M 328, 783 P2d 1365, 46 St. Rep. 2165 (1989). See also St. v. Procedure at Preliminary Examination

Part Case Notes

Defendant Not to Appear Handcuffed in Prison Clothes: Defendant claimed he was entitled to a new trial because the trial court refused his motion that he be permitted to attend his preliminary hearing without handcuffs and prison clothes. Although the Supreme Court found no prejudice in this case, they reminded trial courts of their duty to avoid potential prejudice caused by the appearance of a defendant. They urged trial courts to stop this practice and order custodial officials to bring defendants into court dressed in their own clothes without handcuffs. This is especially necessary since courts have been opened to the news media. St. v. Rodriguez, 192 M 411, 628 P2d 280, 38 St. Rep. 578F (1981).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute retains 1987 MCA 46-10-202 and governs the presentation of evidence at the preliminary examination. Minor amendments for clarity and gender neutrality have been made.

Subsection (3) is an addition to the 1987 code and adopts a provision present in the federal rules. See Rule 5.1(a), Fed. R. Crim. P.

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, section 109-3, and R.C.M. 1947, sections 94-6109 and 94-6110.

This provision is similar to the existing law.

The preliminary examination is not intended to be a trial of the issues of the case, nor is it considered a part of the trial. It should not be confused with the arraignment which is detailed in chapter 16. It is only a preliminary procedure for determining whether there is "probable cause to believe a felony has been committed by the defendant." Nothing more is required. As a result [46-10-202(1) and 46-10-203] may not be expanded into a detailed "fishing expedition" allowing for complete discovery by either side. The section must only be used to determine whether there is sufficient reason to continue the case through the filing of an information as provided by [46-11-203].

[Section 46-10-201, now repealed] is intended to protect the accused (and others) at the preliminary stage from possible unfavorable publicity. This protects the innocent and allows the court to avoid some of the prejudice that might otherwise be engendered in the more notorious cases by allowing everyone or anyone to witness the pre-trial examination. The provision is intended to give the court the necessary direction without including unnecessary detail. It is intended that one be committed to this means of initiating a prosecution once a preliminary examination has begun. However, simply scheduling a preliminary hearing after the initial appearance, does not commit the prosecution to this procedure. One of the other alternatives may be employed, i.e., leave to file an information, or use of the grand jury indictment.

46-10-203. Disposition of defendant.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an adaptation of 1987 MCA 46-10-203, with amendments adopted from the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The Commission recommended the amendments for reasons of clarity. The statute should effect no substantive change in established practice or in law. The Commission believed that the statute is flexible enough to allow the court to reduce the charge to a misdemeanor and retain the case in Justice's Court if the evidence establishes only probable cause to believe a misdemeanor has been committed.

See commission comments to 46-10-202.

Evidence of Discharge: The best evidence of plaintiff's discharge after preliminary examination on a charge of grand larceny was the endorsement on the warrant on which he was arrested, but parol evidence is admissible upon loss of the warrant. Hawley v. Richardson, 60 M 118, 198 P 450 (1921).

Probable Cause Sufficient: On a preliminary examination, all that is required of the County Attorney is to submit proof sufficient to show probable cause to believe the defendant to be guilty of the charge. In re Jones, 46 M 122, 126 P 929 (1912).

46-10-204. Record of preliminary examination.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute preserves, for the most part, 1987 MCA 46-10-204. The Commission recognized no benefit to the distinction between homicides and other offenses. This statute requires that the testimony be recorded only upon request.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In (1), after "witness", deleted "in cases of homicide, must be reduced to writing as a deposition by a court-appointed stenographer. In cases other than homicide, the testimony of each witness"; in (2) substituted "judge" for "justice" and after "answer" inserted "a charge"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Use at Trial of Testimony: The testimony of a witness given at the preliminary hearing in the defendant's presence, when the witness had been cross-examined by the defendant's counsel and the testimony had been recorded and transcribed by a court reporter, was expressly admissible in evidence under this section when a proper foundation had first been laid by showing that the witness could not be located for trial. St. v. Bouldin, 153 M 276, 456 P2d 830 (1969).

Chapter Case Notes

Jury Instructions — Presumption of Innocence: In a criminal prosecution based on theft of an automobile in which the defendant timely requested and was twice denied an instruction on presumption of innocence, it was per se reversible error to deny the instruction. The purpose of the instruction is to caution the jury against conclusions based only on the arrest and prosecution of the defendant, and an instruction on the State's burden of proof can therefore not supplant the instruction requested. St. v. Williams, 184 M 111, 601 P2d 1194 (1979).

Prosecutor's Quasi-Judicial Immunity From Prosecution: Plaintiff's civil action against a County Attorney, based upon alleged unlawful arrest by certain policemen and challenging the legality of the criminal prosecution against him, must be dismissed because the County Attorney enjoys absolute immunity for prosecutorial actions done in a quasi-judicial capacity. 1991 Part Comments: The first two sections of this part are a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-11-101 and 46-11-102. These statutes reflect the constitutional requirements concerning the initiation of a criminal proceeding. See Art. II, sec. 20, Mont. Const. Minor changes in language have been made for brevity and clarity. Under the 1987 statutes, the complaint provisions appear in chapter 6, which relates to arrest warrants, because the purpose of the complaint is often to justify an arrest warrant. Case Notes

Filing on Leave of Court More Than Thirty Days After Waiver of Preliminary Examination — Switch in Procedure for Commencing Prosecution: Although 46-11-203 requires an information to be filed within 30 days after a waiver of a preliminary examination, there was no error when: (1) defendant waived preliminary examination in Justice's Court on August 27; (2) on September 27, the County Attorney filed in District Court a motion for leave to file an information; and (3) on September 28, the motion was granted and the information filed. This section provides that filing an information after leave of court has been granted is an alternative to filing after a preliminary examination or waiver of a preliminary examination. The information in this case was filed within 30 days after leave to file was granted. The court rejected a claim that the state cannot switch midstream from using the preliminary examination process in Justice's Court to using the leave to file an information process in District Court. Defendant had no vested right to a particular procedure for a probable cause determination. St. v. Strobel, 268 M 129, 885 P2d 503, 51 St. Rep. 1214 (1994).

Indictment by Information Acceptable: Defendant was not denied his constitutional rights under the 5th or 14th amendment to the United States Constitution by being indicted by an information rather than by a grand jury. His argument is contrary to past holdings of the U.S. and Montana Supreme Courts. Also, this statute provides that an indictment by information is acceptable. St. v. Pease, 227 M 424, 740 P2d 659, 44 St. Rep. 1203 (1987).

Illegal Pretrial Process and Procedure — State's Right to Charge and Try Case: Youth Court petition initiating proceedings did not state the facts constituting the offense youth was charged with in ordinary and concise language so as to enable a person of common understanding to know what was intended. The petition did not include a witness list. An arrest warrant was issued out of the Youth Court, although there is no provision in the Youth Court Act for issuance of an arrest warrant. Presumably the warrant was issued under 46-6-201, but there was no showing of probable cause supported by oath or affirmation reduced to writing. The youth had already been arrested in Oklahoma at the time the warrant was issued. By what process and authority he was arrested in Oklahoma was not shown, nor was it shown he was arrested by a law enforcement officer. He was subsequently transferred to the District Court for trial as an adult and convicted of two counts of deliberate homicide. The Youth Court proceedings from issuance of the warrant for arrest onward were patently defective. However, this did not preclude the State from having him transferred to the District Court, proceeding against him, and obtaining a conviction. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Transfer From Youth Court to District Court — Youth Court Hearing — Valid Initiation of District Court Action: At Youth Court hearing at which it was decided to transfer youth to District Court for trial as an adult, testimony established probable cause for filing of an information in the District Court. This procedure satisfied the state constitutional requirement that a criminal action in the District Court be initiated either by an information after examination and commitment by a magistrate or after leave granted by the District Court. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Sufficiency of Complaint: A complaint was sufficient when it stated facts constituting a public offense and charged a violation that was a misdemeanor within the jurisdiction of the Justice's Court. State ex rel. Borberg v. District Court, 125 M 481, 240 P2d 854 (1952).

Issues Narrowed From General Allegations to Specific Averments: When general allegations in a complaint are followed by specific averments, the issues are narrowed to those embraced within the particular allegations. St. v. Schnell, 107 M 579, 88 P2d 19 (1939).

Offense Erroneously Named — Nonfatal Defect: The general rule is that when the facts, acts, and circumstances are set forth with sufficient certainty to constitute an offense, it is not a fatal defect that the complaint gives the offense an erroneous name; the name of the crime is controlled by the specific acts charged, and an erroneous name of the charge does not vitiate the complaint. St. v. Schnell, 107 M 579, 88 P2d 19 (1939).

When Motion for Leave to File Necessary: It is only when there has been no examination or commitment by a magistrate that the County Attorney must move for leave to file an information. St. v. Byrd, 41 M 585, 111 P 407 (1910).

Compiler's Comments

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 near middle substituted "sworn complaint or" for "complainant and" and at end, after "whether", substituted "probable cause exists to allow the filing of a charge" for "a charge may be filed"; and deleted (2) that read: "If it appears from an affidavit filed with the charge or from testimony of the complainant that there is probable cause to believe that an offense has been committed and that the person against whom the charge is made has committed it, the court shall issue a summons or an arrest warrant."

Case Notes

Probable Cause Determined Six Months After Filing Charges "Timely" — No Reversible Error: Following a car accident, Ditton was arrested on December 20 and charged with DUI, but no probable cause determination was made until 6 months after the charge was filed. Ditton moved for dismissal, arguing that the Municipal Court's failure to provide a specific, timely order finding probable cause violated the statute and required dismissal of the DUI charge. The District Court ruled that the Municipal Court, although providing no written order of probable cause, properly followed the statute and made the necessary determination of probable cause at the time that the charge was filed. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's decision that the Municipal Court Judge's determination of probable cause was timely made at the time that the DUI charge was filed and was consistent with the judge's actions in setting Ditton's case for trial, which would not have been necessary without a determination of probable cause. St. v. Ditton, 2006 MT 235, 333 M 483, 144 P3d 783 (2006).

Sworn Complaint by Peace Officer Not Required: A peace officer may file a complaint without swearing to it. St. v. Allum, 2005 MT 150, 327 M 363, 114 P3d 233 (2005).

No Error in Refusing to Dismiss Charges for Failure to Hold Timely Probable Cause Hearing: Brown was arrested on February 13, but no probable cause hearing was held until February 18. Brown moved for dismissal on due process grounds of failure to hold a probable cause hearing within 48 hours of arrest, citing County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 US 44, 114 L Ed 2d 49, 111 S Ct 1161 (1991), but the dismissal motion was denied. Brown appealed. The Supreme Court pointed out that the question to be decided was not whether Brown was accorded a timely probable cause determination, but rather whether the District Court erred in refusing to dismiss the charges as a remedy for failure to hold a probable cause hearing. Dismissal of charges is not the correct remedy for failure to timely charge a person who was arrested without a warrant. Under St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985), the proper remedy is the exclusion of evidence acquired as a result of the delay. The trial court did not err in refusing the motion to dismiss. St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 339, 297 M 427, 993 P2d 672, 56 St. Rep. 1346 (1999). See also St. v. Dieziger, 200 M 267, 650 P2d 800, 39 St. Rep. 1734 (1982).

1991 Comment: This statute is a newly developed provision that allows a complaint to be amended under the same procedure as amending an information.

Part 2
Filing of Information

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: This part governs the use of an information as a charging document. The statutes are essentially a restatement of the 1987 statutes and should not result in a significant change in established procedure.

Two 1987 statutes, concerning application and granting leave to file an information, have been combined into a single statute. Compare 1987 MCA 46-11-201 and 46-11-202.

The Commission determined that 1987 MCA 46-11-204, regarding the procedure to be followed when the County Attorney decides not to file, was an unnecessary provision. That section was not often followed in practice and burdened the County Attorney with an unneeded procedure. The section was repealed.

Part Case Notes

Institutional Delay Chargeable to State: Institutional delay in an arson case was caused by a separate suit brought by a newspaper to test the constitutionality of 46-10-201 (now repealed), which defendant invoked to close the proceedings to the press and public, and by the state's inaction in the face of that suit, resulting in a 214-day delay in prosecution. Although institutional, the delay was chargeable to the state, which had the power to choose the method of prosecution but also had a concomitant duty to bring the accused to trial. The delay was excessive and unjustified, and the information was properly dismissed by the trial court. St. v. Wombolt, 231 M 400, 753 P2d 330, 45 St. Rep. 714 (1988).

Determination of Probable Cause to File Criminal Charges — No Preclusion of Later Malicious Prosecution Suit: A judicial determination of probable cause to hold a party answerable to criminal charges does not preclude the party from subsequently bringing suit for malicious prosecution. The fact that the party was held to answer the criminal charge is considered presumptive but not conclusive evidence of the existence of probable cause to initiate the criminal action. The party in a malicious prosecution action can overcome the presumption by showing by a preponderance of the evidence that there was no probable cause for filing the original criminal action. Watkins v. Spring Creek Colony, 188 M 467, 614 P2d 508 (1980).

Officer Signing: A Deputy County Attorney may present an information in his own name. St. v. Larson, 75 M 274, 243 P 566 (1926).

46-11-201. Leave to file information.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: Subsections (1) and (2) adopt the provisions of 1987 MCA 46-11-201(1) in combination with 1987 MCA 46-11-202(1), and these statutes were amended to allow only the Chief Justice to grant leave to file an information against a District Court Judge.

Subsection (3) has been amended to allow use of a summons as well as a warrant after leave to file has been granted and does not require the arrested person to be brought before the issuing court.

Commission Comment Not Divided: This section is a recodification of part of section 95-1301, R.C.M. 1947. Section 46-11-202 (now repealed) is also derived from section 95-1301. The commission comments to section 95-1301 are printed in their entirety under 46-11-201.

This operates as a substitute for a preliminary examination or a grand jury investigation thereby assuring the accused that the prosecuting officer must satisfy some judicial officer as to the existence of probable cause to believe that the accused has committed an offense before any formal information can be filed against him. This approach is created by the [1889] Montana Constitution, Article III, section 8 [slightly modified in Art. II, sec. 20, 1972 Mont. Const.]. This approach would seem to give the accused less protection than the other available approaches, since in preliminary examination the defendant is present and in the grand jury investigation five jurors must be convinced of the existence of probable cause after a thorough investigation. In practice, however, direct leave to file may serve the purpose of "proof of probable cause" as well or better than the other two. The district judge is more knowledgeable as to the essentials of a criminal prosecution than either a grand jury or a justice of the peace. The requirement of satisfying the district judge as to probable cause already exists—or very nearly so by case law—"It seems to us that there must be sufficient facts and information presented to the court to move the discretion of the court . . ." (State ex rel. Juhl v. Dist. Ct., 107 Mont. 309, 84 P.2d 979.) Obtaining leave to file an information is not a mere perfunctory matter, but rests in the sound discretion of the district judge. The application must be complete in itself, and contains such salient facts as will allow the district judge to make an independent determination that an offense has been committed. It is impossible to delineate here what facts would be necessary for all cases, however a recitation of the fact the defendant had been arrested, that he was accused of a crime, and that there is good evidence (eye-witnesses), etc., implicating him with the crime would seem sufficient. (See State v. Kacar, 74 Mont. 269, 274, 240 P. 365.)

The section may appear to overrule State ex rel. Harrison v. District Court, 135 Mont. 365, 340 P.2d 544, but it does not because a hearing comparable to a preliminary examination is conducted by the district judge in each case and there is no need to remand for a preliminary examination.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In (1), near beginning of first sentence, substituted "prosecutor" for "county attorney" and inserted second sentence concerning judge as defendant; in (2), in two places after "judge", inserted "or chief justice"; in (3), after "warrant", inserted "or summons" and after "arrest" substituted "or appearance" for "and he must be brought before the court unless the court orders otherwise"; inserted (4) concerning filing of information against District Court Judge; and made minor changes in style.

GENERAL

Prejudicial Error to Amend Information by Jury Instruction: At the close of a criminal trial, the prosecution admitted that the information had cited the wrong statutes for official misconduct and the judge allowed a jury instruction that contained language from the proper statute. The Supreme Court ruled that the trial court abused its discretion in accepting a proposed jury instruction that essentially amended the original instruction after the defendant had presented his case and based his defense on the statutes cited in the original information rather than arraigning the defendant on the new charges. St. v. Later, 260 M 363, 860 P2d 135, 50 St. Rep. 1099 (1993), distinguished in St. v. Neary, 284 M 409, 944 P2d 750, 54 St. Rep. 942 (1997).

Incorrect Statutory Reference — Charge Not Invalid:

The name of a crime is controlled by the specific acts charged. When the facts, acts, and circumstances are set forth with sufficient certainty to constitute an offense, it is not a fatal defect that the complaint gives the offense an erroneous name. An erroneous statutory reference will not invalidate the charge. St. v. Collins, 226 M 188, 734 P2d 686, 44 St. Rep. 576 (1987).

A complaint which used the statutory language of 61-8-401 to describe the offense but which listed a citation to 61-8-406 was not made defective by the incorrect reference since the complaint adequately described and gave notice of the offense. The District Court did not err in granting a motion to amend the complaint to correct the statutory reference. St. v. Handy, 221 M 365, 719 P2d 766, 43 St. Rep. 897 (1986), followed in St. v. Moehr, 227 M 253, 738 P2d 499, 44 St. Rep. 1058 (1987).

Substantial Evidence to Show Common Scheme Bad Check Writing: Defendant was convicted of issuing bad checks, common scheme, a felony, after issuing or delivering a total of nine checks to various businesses and individuals over the course of a year, knowing the checks would not be paid by his bank. The court found there was sufficient evidence to support conviction as there was substantial evidence of defendant's wrongdoing. St. v. Fleming, 225 M 48, 730 P2d 1178, 44 St. Rep. 31 (1987).

Information Naming Wrong Offense Saved by Supporting Facts: Victim was twice assaulted the night of his death. Defendant admitted to the first; the second caused victim's death. The information charged defendant with deliberate homicide; he was convicted of aggravated assault arising from the first assault, and the information stated facts which made it clear the State intended to prove the nonfatal first assault as part of its deliberate homicide theory, so that defendant was informed of what was intended to be charged and could not have been surprised or misled at the trial. Therefore, an otherwise fatal defect inherent in the fact that, under the charge, defendant could have been convicted of the lesser included offense of aggravated assault in relation to the second assault but not the first, and was in fact convicted in relation to the first assault, was saved by the facts stated in the information. Therefore, the holding below that defendant was convicted of an uncharged offense and the grant of acquittal notwithstanding the guilty verdict were reversed. St. v. Longneck, 196 M 151, 640 P2d 436, 38 St. Rep. 2160 (1981), affirmed, 201 M 367, 654 P2d 977, 39 St. Rep. 2170 (1982).

Sufficiency of Information — Wrongly Named Offense: The test for sufficiency of an information is whether a person of common understanding would know what is intended to be charged. Generally, when the facts, acts, and circumstances are set forth with sufficient certainty to constitute an offense, it is not a fatal defect that the complaint gives the offense an erroneous name. St. v. Longneck, 196 M 151, 640 P2d 436, 38 St. Rep. 2160 (1981), affirmed, 201 M 367, 654 P2d 977, 39 St. Rep. 2170 (1982), distinguished in St. v. Later, 260 M 363, 860 P2d 135, 50 St. Rep. 1099 (1993), and followed in St. v. Brogan, 261 M 79, 862 P2d 19, 50 St. Rep. 1204 (1993), and St. v. Bahr, 2009 MT 378, 353 M 294, 224 P3d 610 (2009).

Right to Counsel: A motion for leave to file an information is not a "critical stage" entitling the defendant to the right to assistance of counsel. State ex rel. Brackman v. District Court, 172 M 24, 560 P2d 523 (1977).

Conclusionary Statements Inadequate: Conclusionary statements will not suffice to obtain leave to file an information. State ex rel. Murphy v. McKinnon, 171 M 120, 556 P2d 906 (1976).

District Court's Power to Amend Procedural Defect: The District Court has the power to allow the filing of an amended application and affidavit to remedy omissions, establishing probable cause to believe an offense has been committed, in the original affidavit since the defect was a procedural matter and not a substantive issue involving the jurisdiction of the District Court. The District Court's power to amend is essential to efficient administration of justice and the basic right of the defendant to prepare his own defense. St. v. Emerson, 169 M 284, 546 P2d 509 (1976).

Leave to File When Preliminary Hearing Ordered: When a preliminary hearing was ordered for the defendant after an initial appearance before a Justice of the Peace, the prosecutor was not precluded thereby from subsequently applying for leave to file an information under this section. St. v. Dunn, 155 M 319, 472 P2d 288 (1970).

Examination Before Leave to File: When a District Judge assumed to act upon an application for leave to file an information, he should have directed an examination before himself as magistrate or some other magistrate. State ex rel. Harrison v. District Court, 135 M 365, 340 P2d 544 (1959).

Sufficiency of Facts in Information: When the motion for leave to file the information disclosed that the decedent was shot at close range with a high-powered rifle and killed on the defendant's farm, that the Coroner's jury verdict was that the killing was intentional, that evidence of the commission of the crime and guilt of the defendant was introduced at a habeas corpus hearing, that the County Attorney had made a complete investigation, and that as a result he believed the defendant was guilty, the motion was sufficient to grant leave to file information. St. v. London, 131 M 410, 310 P2d 571 (1957).

AFFIDAVIT

Sufficiency of Charging Documents — Probability, Not Prima Facie Showing, That Defendant Committed Crime of Theft Sufficient: Harlson allegedly stole a pickup and drove it 60 miles an hour through downtown Billings. Harlson was charged with theft, criminal endangerment, and DUI. Harlson moved to dismiss on grounds that the charging documents failed to show probable cause or allege a specific location, a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury, a speed limit, or the presence of people in the area. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Citing St. v. Elliott, 2002 MT 26, 308 M 227, 43 P3d 279 (2002), the court noted that the sufficiency of the charging documents is established by reading the information together with the affidavit in support of the motion for leave to file the information. The affidavit need not make out a prima facie case that defendant committed an offense. A mere probability that the offense was committed is sufficient. In addition, the charging documents made clear that Harlson allegedly committed theft of a vehicle and drove the vehicle at high speed through downtown Billings, exceeding the speed limit and endangering any pedestrians in the area. Harlson was acquitted of the DUI charge, so the sufficiency of the charging document as to DUI was not at issue. The theft and endangerment charges were thus supported by the charging documents, and the motion to dismiss was properly denied. St. v. Harlson, 2006 MT 312, 335 M 25, 150 P3d 349 (2006).

Information Charging Death of Newborn Child Sufficient in Alleging Probability of Homicide Despite Lack of Evidence That Child Born Alive: Elliott was charged with deliberate homicide of her newborn child. She moved to dismiss the information as insufficient because the state medical examiner offered no opinion as to whether the child was ever born alive and, without proof that the child was a person who was born and was alive, she should not have been charged with the death of a human being. The Supreme Court affirmed. The sufficiency of the charging documents is established by reading the information together with the affidavit in support of the motion for leave to file the information. The affidavit need not make out a prima facie case that defendant committed an offense. A mere probability that the offense was committed is sufficient. Thus, to withstand a motion to dismiss, the state needed only to show a probability that the baby was born alive and that Elliott committed the offense charged. In this case, the circumstances of the delivery of the baby, Elliott's hospitalization, her differing stories, the skull fractures suffered by the baby, and the concealment of the baby's body, all provided a sufficient basis to find probable cause for the deliberate homicide charge, and the District Court did not err in denying the motion to dismiss the information. St. v. Elliott, 2002 MT 26, 308 M 227, 43 P3d 279 (2002), followed, with regard to sufficiency of information, in St. v. Harlson, 2006 MT 312, 335 M 25, 150 P3d 349 (2006).

Journal Entries and Statements to County Attorney Detailing Incidents Supported Sex Crimes Charges: An affidavit in support of the information charging sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault, which contained a long excerpt from the victim's journal detailing the abuse and vividly recounting the progression of the abuse and the particular incidents and which also contained the County Attorney's statements that the victim had told him that sexual contact took place during one incident and penetration took place during another incident, constituted more than sufficient probable cause to support the information. St. v. Mason, 283 M 149, 941 P2d 437, 54 St. Rep. 539 (1997).

Affidavit Not Demonstrating Prima Facie Case: The defendant argued that the information filed against him was incomplete because it alleged only that the he possessed the stolen items and did not establish that he had stolen the items. The Supreme Court held that the state did not have to demonstrate a prima facie case at the time the information was filed. The court held that the District Court reviewing an affidavit for probable cause may use common sense and draw permissible inferences. St. v. Ramstead, 243 M 162, 793 P2d 802, 47 St. Rep. 1101 (1990), followed in St. v. Williams-Rusch, 279 M 437, 928 P2d 169, 53 St. Rep. 1224 (1996).

Witness' Statement Not Referred to in Affidavit — No Ex Post Facto Problem — Admissible as Prior Inconsistent Statement: Defendant was convicted of operating a motor vehicle while designated a habitual traffic offender. Proceeding pro se, the defendant argued on appeal that failure to refer to a witness' statement in the affidavit supporting leave to file information constituted an ex post facto problem. The court held that he simply misunderstood that legal theory. The court further held that the statement, which asserted that defendant drove from Great Falls to Loma, was admissible as a prior inconsistent statement because the witness testified at trial that he, not the defendant, drove that distance. St. v. Grant, 217 M 357, 704 P2d 1064, 42 St. Rep. 1248 (1985).

Use of Motion's Supporting Language to Interpret Information: Motion for leave to file information served as the supporting affidavit for the information and could thus be considered in determining the meaning of the language contained in the information because an affidavit supporting a motion for leave to file an information may be considered in determining the meaning of the language contained in the information. St. v. Longneck, 196 M 151, 640 P2d 436, 38 St. Rep. 2160 (1981), affirmed, 201 M 367, 654 P2d 977, 39 St. Rep. 2170 (1982), followed in St. v. Madera, 206 M 140, 670 P2d 552, 40 St. Rep. 1558 (1983).

Common Scheme Forgery — Affidavit to Support Information: The District Court held that the affidavit accompanying an information charging common scheme forgery was insufficient. An affidavit must include sufficient facts to convince a judge that there is probable cause to believe the named defendant may have committed the crime described in the information. Proof of "common scheme" requires proof that the suspect series of acts constitute a common criminal scheme. These acts must be either individually incomplete, such that they show that a single crime had been committed, or be acts which follow one another evidencing a continuing design. In this case, the affidavit had an insufficient connection between activities. There was no showing of continuous design between the money orders, building permits, forgery activity, and defendant's other activities described in the affidavits. St. v. Renz, 192 M 306, 628 P2d 644, 38 St. Rep. 720 (1981).

Preliminary Hearing — Not "Fishing Expedition": The preliminary hearing is not meant to be a "fishing expedition" for all possible evidence, and if probable cause is established to the satisfaction of the District Judge by the County Attorney's affidavit, the defendant has little reason to complain. In addition, though the defendant argued that failure to hold a preliminary examination in this case may have allowed an important witness to get away without ever being interviewed, that witness had no relevance to his defense of alibi. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980).

Mere Probability Sufficient: Defendant, charged with mitigated deliberate homicide, argued that the affidavit in support of the application for leave to file an information was insufficient without statements which were suppressed on his motion. The court disagreed, saying that a prima facie case showing that defendant committed an offense was not necessary in the affidavit. A mere probability is sufficient for probable cause. Evidence to establish probable cause need not be as complete as evidence to establish guilt. Judges reviewing such affidavits should use their common sense in determining whether probable cause exists. There is no requirement that the affidavit claim that no other persons had access to the home where the deceased was found. The court concluded that a common-sense reading of the affidavit, with the parts objected to deleted, indicates that the statutory and decisional guidelines were more than adequately met by the affidavit. St. v. Hamilton, 185 M 522, 605 P2d 1121 (1980).

Jurisdiction of District Court: The failure of the Commissioner of Campaign Finances and Practices (now Commissioner of Political Practices) to recite, in an affidavit supporting a request for leave to initiate prosecution by information, the fact that the County Attorney had waived under 13-37-124 his right to prosecute the defendant was not a jurisdictional defect, and the court improperly granted the defendant's motion to dismiss. Such a defect is a procedural matter, not a substantive one, and does not require dismissal of the charge. St. v. Matthews, 183 M 405, 600 P2d 188 (1979).

Affidavit Plus Indictment Sufficient: The Supreme Court held that an affidavit revealing an admission to setting a fire was sufficient, along with an indication that the fire was intentionally set, to warrant granting leave to file an information. St. v. Hallam, 175 M 492, 575 P2d 55 (1978), followed in St. v. Arrington, 260 M 1, 858 P2d 343, 50 St. Rep. 905 (1993).

Sufficiency of Motion to Amend: Certified motion for leave to file second amended information, which was signed by the County Attorney but not supported by separate affidavit, was sufficient by itself as an affidavit within the meaning of this section. State ex rel. McKenzie v. District Court, 165 M 54, 525 P2d 1211 (1974).

Additional Evidence: In its discretion, the District Court may require evidence other than the affidavit for support before it grants permission for the direct filing of an information with the District Court. State ex rel. Bell v. District Court, 157 M 35, 482 P2d 557 (1971).

Specific Time and Place: An affidavit that does not give the specific time and place is insufficient to show probable cause even though it alleges that the defendant committed the offense. State ex rel. Bell v. District Court, 157 M 35, 482 P2d 557 (1971).

Sufficient to Establish Jurisdiction: An affidavit is sufficient to establish the jurisdiction of the District Court if it specifies that the offense was committed within the county even though the county contains an Indian reservation and the affidavit has not negated the possibility that the offense was committed within the reservation. State ex rel. Bell v. District Court, 157 M 35, 482 P2d 557 (1971).

Absence of Supporting Affidavit: Absence of a supporting affidavit for leave to file an information, contrary to 46-11-201, was not a fatal error since it is a procedural matter and does not affect the substantial rights of the defendant. St. v. Logan, 156 M 48, 473 P2d 833 (1970).

Affidavit of Witness Not Required: There is no requirement under subsection (1) that a supporting affidavit of a witness having direct knowledge of facts sufficient to establish probable cause be filed with the application to file an information. St. v. Dunn, 155 M 319, 472 P2d 288 (1970).

PROBABLE CAUSE

Sufficient Probable Cause for Filing Information — No Requirement That Information Supporting Charge Be Excised Before Determination of Probable Cause Made: Attorney Holt pleaded not guilty to five counts of felony theft of clients' funds, then moved to dismiss two of the counts, alleging that the affidavit supporting the information did not establish probable cause. The motion was denied. Pursuant to a subsequent plea agreement, Holt pleaded nolo contendere to the contested counts, but reserved the right to withdraw the plea if the agreed sentences were not imposed. Following conviction, Holt appealed on grounds that the District Court erred by not dismissing the counts because the affidavit in support of the information did not allege independent admissible evidence that Holt exercised unauthorized control over the money that was allegedly stolen, asserting in effect that the affidavit contained evidence that must be excised and that without that evidence, the affidavit failed to establish probable cause. The Supreme Court affirmed. A showing of a mere probability that a defendant committed the offense charged is sufficient to establish probable cause to file an information. It is not required that information in the affidavit supporting a charge, which might later be found inadmissible at trial, be excised before a determination of probable cause is made. At the time that Holt entered a plea, it was too early in the case to hold that a motion to dismiss would be successful at the conclusion of the state's case in chief, so denial of the dismissal motion was not error. St. v. Holt, 2006 MT 151, 332 M 426, 139 P3d 819 (2006).

Sufficient Probable Cause in Affidavit to Warrant Charge of Sexual Assault: Kern contended that the state failed to establish probable cause in its affidavit charging sexual assault. The Supreme Court noted that pursuant to St. v. Arrington, 260 M 1, 858 P2d 343 (1993), an affidavit in support of a motion to file an information need not make out a prima facie case that a defendant committed an offense; rather, a mere probability is sufficient. Evidence to establish probable cause need not be as complete as the evidence necessary to establish guilt, and the determination whether a motion to file an information is supported by probable cause is left to the discretion of the trial court. Here, the factual allegations that defendant forced the victim to engage in sexual conduct were sufficient to establish the mere probability that defendant committed the offense. Kern also asserted that it was necessary that the affidavit require allegations that he committed the touching and that he did so to gratify his sexual response. The Supreme Court disagreed with both arguments. Nothing in 45-5-502 requires that a defendant commit the actual touching, nor was the affidavit required to allege the purpose of the sexual contact because that element is incorporated by reference in the statute. St. v. Kern, 2003 MT 77, 315 M 22, 67 P3d 272 (2003), following St. v. Steffes, 269 M 214, 887 P2d 1196 (1994).

No Error in Refusing to Dismiss Charges for Failure to Hold Timely Probable Cause Hearing: Brown was arrested on February 13, but no probable cause hearing was held until February 18. Brown moved for dismissal on due process grounds of failure to hold a probable cause hearing within 48 hours of arrest, citing County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 US 44, 114 L Ed 2d 49, 111 S Ct 1161 (1991), but the dismissal motion was denied. Brown appealed. The Supreme Court pointed out that the question to be decided was not whether Brown was accorded a timely probable cause determination, but rather whether the District Court erred in refusing to dismiss the charges as a remedy for failure to hold a probable cause hearing. Dismissal of charges is not the correct remedy for failure to timely charge a person who was arrested without a warrant. Under St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985), the proper remedy is the exclusion of evidence acquired as a result of the delay. The trial court did not err in refusing the motion to dismiss. St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 339, 297 M 427, 993 P2d 672, 56 St. Rep. 1346 (1999). See also St. v. Dieziger, 200 M 267, 650 P2d 800, 39 St. Rep. 1734 (1982).

Probable Cause Found for Sexual Intercourse Without Consent and Sexual Assault — Corroboration Not Required: Little was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault. Before trial, Little argued that the affidavit filed in support of the information was insufficient because the victims' allegations were not corroborated and because the affidavit did not contain sufficient information to support a probability that he committed the offenses charged. The Supreme Court reviewed the standard applicable to an affidavit supporting an information and found that the information contained allegations by the two minor victims of the defendant that showed penetration. Since the victims were under 16 years old and could not consent, the affidavits indicated a probability that Little had committed intercourse without consent. The Supreme Court also noted that the standard for probable cause did not require corroboration of the victims' allegations. St. v. Little, 260 M 460, 861 P2d 154, 50 St. Rep. 1124 (1993).

District Court Jurisdiction — Invoked by Probable Cause in Leave to File Information — Res Judicata After Appeal Process: The issue of subject matter jurisdiction cannot be waived or conferred by consent of a party and may be raised at any stage of a judicial proceeding or sua sponte by the court; but if the question of jurisdiction turns upon a finding of whether the affidavit of application for leave to file an information shows probable cause and the defendant has been found guilty and the judgment has not been appealed or has been affirmed on appeal, the issue of probable cause is res judicata. St. v. Davis, 210 M 28, 681 P2d 42, 41 St. Rep. 898 (1984).

Probable Cause, Not Prima Facie Case, Needed in Pleading: Defendants were charged with illegal possession of a slot machine. The District Court dismissed for lack of probable cause, saying the game was essentially the same as that previously found legal in Treasure St. Games v. St., 170 M 189, 551 P2d 1008 (1976). Defendants were also charged with "maintaining a bingo/keno game in which cards/chances may be purchased in excess of $.50 in violation of 23-5-412". The District Court dismissed this charge for lack of probable cause, saying the plurality language of the charge did not state an offense. On appeal, the Supreme Court found the dismissal to be error, saying the State need not demonstrate a prima facie case in the charging documents but need only show probable cause to believe an offense has been committed. St. v. Johnson, 203 M 153, 660 P2d 101, 40 St. Rep. 359 (1983). See also St. v. Buckingham, 240 M 252, 783 P2d 1331, 46 St. Rep. 2102 (1989), St. v. Arrington, 260 M 1, 858 P2d 343, 50 St. Rep. 905 (1993), and St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

Options for Determining Probable Cause — Time Limits: Where defendant was out on bond, a delay of 10 days between initial appearance and the determination of probable cause by leave to file an information was not unreasonable, nor was defendant entitled to a preliminary hearing. The purpose of the preliminary hearing is to determine whether there is probable cause to believe that a felony has been committed. The probable cause determination may be made in a preliminary examination in Justice's Court (46-10-105), or it may be made by application to the District Court Judge, presenting by affidavit such evidence as the judge may require. The only requirement is that there is an independent judicial determination of probable cause within a reasonable time. The defendant had no vested right to either procedure. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980), followed in St. v. Farnsworth, 240 M 328, 783 P2d 1365, 46 St. Rep. 2165 (1989). See also St. v. Sor-Lokken, 246 M 70, 803 P2d 638, 47 St. Rep. 2264 (1990), and St. v. McElderry, 284 M 365, 944 P2d 230, 54 St. Rep. 922 (1997).

Larceny by Bailee: An affidavit in support of a motion for leave to file an information charging the defendant with larceny by a bailee under section 94-2701, R.C.M. 1947 (now part of 45-6-301), which listed the alleged victims and set out three fact situations alleging the issuance of insurance settlement checks and that the victims had sometime thereafter received their portion of the settlement with or without an accounting from the defendant or had not received any portion of the settlement, was sufficient to establish probable cause given the improbability that the facts alleged resulted from innocent bookkeeping errors or clerical mistakes. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Presence of Probabilities: The Supreme Court concluded that the lower court properly relied on the presence of probabilities in finding probable cause to believe that an offense was committed by the defendant, in light of the large array of facts presented by the County Attorney when seeking leave to file the information. St. v. McGuinn, 177 M 215, 581 P2d 417 (1978).

Possession of Explosives: The District Judge, on reading the affidavit, had probable cause to believe that the defendant committed the offenses charged regarding illegal possession of explosives, despite the defendant's contentions to the contrary. St. v. McBenge, 175 M 362, 574 P2d 260 (1978).

Standard for Determination: When there was confusion by witnesses whether the defendant was seen inside a burglarized store and one witness made positive identification, probable cause was established to support an information because probable cause means that there is a probability that a crime has been committed by the person named in the warrant. A prima facie showing is not necessary as affidavits of probable cause are subject to much less rigorous standards than the admissibility of evidence. St. v. Miner, 169 M 260, 546 P2d 252 (1976).

Probable Cause Found: The certified motion for leave to file an information, which included four pages of facts discovered during the investigation of homicide, together with the autopsy report, was adequate to support the finding of probable cause. State ex rel. McKenzie v. District Court, 165 M 54, 525 P2d 1211 (1974).

Probable Cause — Burglary: The arrest of the defendant in the presence of the codefendant at the site of one burglary and the subsequent discovery in the codefendant's automobile of property stolen in another burglary earlier in the same evening did not establish probable cause for an information against the defendant for the earlier burglary. State ex rel. Wilson v. District Court, 159 M 439, 498 P2d 1217 (1972).

Warrantless Arrest: When the relators were arrested and charged with possession of dangerous drugs, the District Court did not err in granting leave to file informations against such persons since probable cause existed for the arrest of these persons without a warrant. State ex rel. Glantz v. District Court, 154 M 132, 461 P2d 193 (1969).

PRELIMINARY HEARING BYPASSED

No Right to Preliminary Hearing: When the evidence in the supporting affidavit established probable cause to the satisfaction of the District Judge, the defendant had no right to a preliminary hearing. St. v. Dunn, 155 M 319, 472 P2d 288 (1970).

Permissibility:

Leave to file an information directly, without a preliminary hearing, under the statute and Constitution, was not error or abuse of the statutory privilege to bypass the preliminary hearing when the motion to file directly was supported by an affidavit and when a preliminary hearing would clearly serve no purpose nor secure an advantage to the defendant. St. v. Johnson, 149 M 173, 424 P2d 728 (1967).

The right of the court to grant leave to file an information without previous examination by a committing magistrate is settled law in this state. It is authorized by Art. III, sec. 8, 1889 Mont. Const. (now Art. II, sec. 20, 1972 Mont. Const.), and confirmed by numerous decisions of the court, and there can be no interpretation put upon any statute which will take it away. St. v. Foot, 100 M 33, 48 P2d 1113 (1935); St. v. Vuckovich, 61 M 480, 203 P 491 (1921); St. v. Bowser, 21 M 133, 53 P 179 (1898); St. v. Brett, 16 M 360, 40 P 873 (1895).

Leave to file an information without a preliminary examination is within the sound discretion of the District Court when no statement is made to the District Court of the evidence upon which the State relies for a conviction, and a Writ of Supervisory Control to revise such discretion will be denied. State ex rel. Donovan v. District Court, 26 M 275, 67 P 943 (1902).

1991 Comment: This statute retains the substance of 1987 MCA 46-11-203. The provision allowing the County Attorney to be prosecuted for failure to pursue an action has been eliminated.

Source: R.C.M. 1947, section 94-6204.

The proposed language is nearly identical except the new provision is more specific as to the time (preliminary examination or leave to file) after which the county attorney must file or risk contempt of court. The word "testimony" has been changed to "evidence" which seems to be more inclusive and would allow greater breadth in the charge than may be contained in the information.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In (1), at beginning, substituted "a finding of probable cause following a preliminary examination or waiver of a" for "the defendant has been examined and held to answer or has waived", after "examination" deleted "as provided in chapter 10", after "granted" deleted "as provided in 46-11-201 and 46-11-202", substituted "prosecutor" for "county attorney", after "offense" deleted "for which he is held to answer", at end substituted "supported by probable cause" for "disclosed by the evidence", and deleted second sentence that read: "If the county attorney fails to file the information within the time specified, he may be found guilty of contempt and may be prosecuted for neglect of duty"; inserted (2) concerning dismissal for failure to timely file information; and made minor change in style.

Case Notes

Filing on Leave of Court More Than Thirty Days After Waiver of Preliminary Examination — Switch in Procedure for Commencing Prosecution: Although this section requires an information to be filed within 30 days after a waiver of a preliminary examination, there was no error when: (1) defendant waived preliminary examination in Justice's Court on August 27; (2) on September 27, the County Attorney filed in District Court a motion for leave to file an information; and (3) on September 28, the motion was granted and the information filed. Section 46-11-101 provides that filing an information after leave of court has been granted is an alternative to filing after a preliminary examination or waiver of a preliminary examination. The information in this case was filed within 30 days after leave to file was granted. The court rejected a claim that the state cannot switch midstream from using the preliminary examination process in Justice's Court to using the leave to file an information process in District Court. Defendant had no vested right to a particular procedure for a probable cause determination. St. v. Strobel, 268 M 129, 885 P2d 503, 51 St. Rep. 1214 (1994).

New Information Filed: When the prosecution had dismissed a first information charging receipt of stolen property and filed a new one charging both grand larceny and receipt of stolen property, the second information was timely with respect to the additional larceny count since the first information had not been amended but had been dismissed and permission had been granted to file a new information. St. v. Tritz, 164 M 344, 522 P2d 603 (1974), certiorari denied, Tritz v. St., 420 US 909 (1975).

Waiver of Irregularity:

The objection to a failure to timely file the information must be made in writing and before the demurrer or plea or it is waived. St. v. Chevigny, 48 M 382, 138 P 257 (1914).

When the County Attorney fails to comply with 46-11-203, any advantage thereof must be taken by the defendant by motion to set aside the information, and failure to so take advantage of the irregularity waives it. St. v. Lagoni, 30 M 472, 76 P 1044 (1904).

This section [as enacted made] no substantial change in the existing law. [A 1981 amendment of subsection (1) responded to a finding of unconstitutionality in St. v. Cardwell, 187 M 370, 609 P2d 1230 (1980).]

1991 Amendment: Deleted (1)(b) that read: "(b) When the prosecution seeks leave to amend an information as to a matter of substance, the prosecuting attorney shall file"; in (1), in first sentence after "motion", substituted "is filed in a timely manner" for "for leave to amend stating" and after "affidavit" deleted "in compliance with 46-11-201(1)"; in (2), after "If", deleted "the motion is timely and the amended information is supported by probable cause"; deleted former (3) that read: "(3) No charge may be dismissed because of a formal defect which does not tend to prejudice a substantial right of the defendant"; and made minor changes in style.

1981 Amendment: Substituted "information" for "charge"; deleted "once" following "amended" in first sentence; substituted "with leave" for "without leave" in (1)(a); and inserted (1)(b) through (1)(e) relating to what the prosecutor must file, when leave to amend will be granted, arraignment without unreasonable delay, and time for defendant to prepare for trial, respectively.

GENERAL

Factual Basis for Amended Charge Same as Factual Basis for Initial Charge — Second Omnibus Hearing Not Required: Adkins was originally arraigned on a charge of intent to distribute dangerous drugs, which was predicated on Adkins' possession of dangerous drugs, and an omnibus hearing was held on the charge. The state subsequently dropped the intent to distribute charge and amended the information to include only a straight possession charge.

Adkins contended that a second omnibus hearing was required on the possession charge. The Supreme Court disagreed. The factual basis for the straight possession charge was identical to the factual basis underlying the intent to distribute charge for which an omnibus hearing had been held. Therefore, when the state amends an information to charge an alternate lesser included offense that is supported by an identical factual basis, a new omnibus hearing is not required. St. v. Adkins, 2009 MT 71, 349 M 444, 204 P3d 1 (2009).

Filing of Amended Information — New Omnibus Hearing or Persistent Felony Offender Notice Not Required: Potter asserted that because he was not notified anew that the state would seek a persistent felony offender designation following the filing of an amended information adding an additional felony charge, the trial court erred in sentencing him as a persistent felony offender. The Supreme Court disagreed. Nothing in statute requires either a new omnibus hearing or a new persistent felony offender notice upon the filing of an amended information. Potter knew for over a year that the state would seek a persistent felony offender designation, and nothing in the record indicated that he was prejudiced by the timing of the notice. The persistent felony offender designation was affirmed. St. v. Potter, 2008 MT 381, 347 M 38, 197 P3d 471 (2008).

Admissibility of Evidence Related to Tampering Charge Not Considered Improper Amendment of Information on Day of Trial: On the morning of Wilson's trial on charges of tampering with evidence in a vehicle suspected to have been used in a homicide, the state announced that part of the tampering charge would concern Wilson's concealing or tampering with a gun allegedly used in the homicide. Wilson objected because neither the information nor the affidavit used in support of the information contained any allegation that Wilson had tampered with a gun. The trial court noted that the information charged Wilson with tampering with the vehicle and its contents, so if the gun was in the vehicle, the evidence was admissible. Following conviction, Wilson argued on appeal that the trial court abused its discretion by allowing a de facto amendment of substance to the information on the day of trial by allowing the state to argue that Wilson tampered with the gun. The Supreme Court disagreed. Although amendments of substance are prohibited within 5 days of trial, amendments of form are allowed any time before a verdict. In this case, raising the issue of tampering with the gun was not an amendment of substance or form and in fact was not an amendment at all. Based on the charging document itself, Wilson should not have been surprised that the state would argue that contents of the vehicle were tampered with, including the murder weapon, and allowing argument regarding the gun was not an abuse of discretion. In addition, denial of Wilson's motion for a directed verdict based on the fact that the gun evidence was based on the uncorroborated testimony of a coconspirator also was not error because there was sufficient testimony and circumstantial evidence from sources other than the coconspirator to support the charge of tampering with the vehicle and its contents. St. v. Wilson, 2007 MT 327, 340 M 191, 172 P3d 1264 (2007), distinguishing Red Lodge v. Kennedy, 2002 MT 89, 309 M 330, 46 P3d 602 (2002).

No Violation of Defendant's Substantial Rights by Filing Amended Information on Day of Trial to Include Reference to Statutorily Mandated Sentencing Range for Repeat Offender: Gardipee was charged by information with misdemeanor partner abuse. On the morning of trial, the District Court granted the state's request to amend the information to include a reference to the statutorily mandated sentencing range for repeat offenders in 45-5-206(3) because of Gardipee's prior domestic abuse convictions. Following conviction, Gardipee appealed on grounds that allowing the amended information on the day of trial violated his substantial rights. The Supreme Court disagreed. The elements of the charged crime were not changed, and the only difference between the informations was the recognition that pursuant to the statute, a persistent offender was subject to an enhanced sentence for a third or subsequent conviction, so the amendment did not violate Gardipee's substantial rights. St. v. Gardipee, 2004 MT 250, 323 M 59, 98 P3d 305 (2004).

Substantial Evidence to Show Common Scheme Bad Check Writing: Defendant was convicted of issuing bad checks, common scheme, a felony, after issuing or delivering a total of nine checks to various businesses and individuals over the course of a year, knowing the checks would not be paid by his bank. The court found there was sufficient evidence to support conviction as there was substantial evidence of defendant's wrongdoing. St. v. Fleming, 225 M 48, 730 P2d 1178, 44 St. Rep. 31 (1987).

Court Not Required to Give Notice Before Accepting Amended Information: Appellant appealed from conviction of intimidation and alleged that court erred in accepting amended information. The Supreme Court held that where the amended information was accepted on December 6, 1984, and trial began January 28, 1985, appellant had a reasonable amount of time to prepare for trial on the amended information, which did not differ materially or state a separate charge from the original information. Neither the statute nor due process requires the court to give a defendant notice before the amended information may be accepted by the court. St. v. Lance, 222 M 92, 721 P2d 1258, 43 St. Rep. 1086 (1986).

Trial Under Original Information Following Dismissal of Amended Information: Appellant alleged that the filing of an amended information left the original information of no effect. He argued that when the amended information was dismissed there was no information then existing and that he was thereafter illegally detained. The Supreme Court disagreed, saying then when an unauthorized or otherwise improperly amended information is quashed or dismissed, further proceedings may be had on the original information. St. v. Cardwell, 191 M 539, 625 P2d 553, 38 St. Rep. 451 (1981), following St. v. Thompson, 392 S. W. 2d 617 (Mo. 1965).

Constitutionality: The term "prosecuted" used in Art. II, sec. 20, Mont. Const., means to institute and carry forward. Section 46-11-403(1) (renumbered 46-11-205) as it read prior to amendment in 1981 was unconstitutional under this interpretation of "prosecute" because it allowed amendments without leave of court in direct conflict with the constitutional provision. St. v. Cardwell, 187 M 370, 609 P2d 1230 (1980).

Sufficiency of Charge: The fact that an amendment was in fact made does not affect the sufficiency of the information if it was sufficient before the addition was made. St. v. Davis, 141 M 197, 376 P2d 727 (1962).

Waiver of Objection: When, after a plea of not guilty, the County Attorney asked permission to amend the information and counsel for the defendant stated there was no objection, any objection to the amendment of the information to include a prior conviction was waived. State ex rel. Treat v. District Court, 122 M 249, 200 P2d 248 (1948).

When Insufficiency of Information Does Not Warrant Dismissal: Insufficiency of the information does not warrant a dismissal of the action if in the opinion of the court the objection may be avoided by an amended information. State ex rel. Freebourn v. District Court, 105 M 77, 69 P2d 748 (1937).

SUBSTANTIVE AMENDMENT

Addition of New Stalking Incidents to Original Complaint — Acceptance of Substantive Amended Complaint on Day of Trial — New Trial Warranted: Kennedy was charged with a stalking incident on October 5, 1999, and was convicted in City Court. Kennedy appealed to District Court for a trial de novo. No new information or complaint was filed in District Court to reiterate the charge, but on the morning of trial, the City Attorney filed an amended complaint alleging six specific incidents of stalking, including the October 5 incident, that had occurred between December 1997 and October 1999. Kennedy moved to dismiss the stalking charge on grounds that the city failed to state the offense of repeated stalking behavior in its complaint, while the city contended that evidence of the other alleged criminal stalking offenses constituted a continuing course of conduct within the meaning of 45-1-205. The District Court denied Kennedy's motion to dismiss and allowed the amended complaint over Kennedy's objection. The trial proceeded as scheduled, and Kennedy was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that an information must reasonably apprise the accused of the charges in order to provide an opportunity to prepare and present a defense and that alteration of a complaint is allowed at any time prior to verdict, but that acceptance of a substantive amendment is prohibited within 5 days of trial under this section. An amendment of form is one that charges the same crime, and the elements of the crime and the proof required remain the same. A substantive amendment alters the nature of the offense, the essential elements of the crime, the proofs, and the defenses. Here, the amended complaint alleging several new episodes of stalking, together with the allegation that all the incidents formed a continuous course of conduct dating back over 2 years, constituted a substantive change that added new proofs to the prosecution's burden and required Kennedy to prepare new defenses. The proposed substantive amendment was not timely filed at least 5 days before trial as required, nor did the District Court follow the procedures for motioning and rearraignment. Thus the District Court abused its discretion by accepting the amended complaint on the morning of trial, and the case was reversed for a new trial. Red Lodge v. Kennedy, 2002 MT 89, 309 M 330, 46 P3d 602 (2002).

Amending Information Not Prosecutorial Vindictiveness: Mahoney moved to withdraw his guilty plea on the basis that the prosecution's amendment of the information (under the former statute) to charge him with attempted rape and attempted homicide rather than aggravated assault constituted prosecutorial vindictiveness. The Supreme Court noted that the prosecution had moved to amend the information well before the trial date and that the defendant had not objected at that time and had subsequently pleaded guilty. The Supreme Court held that amending the information when the facts of the case supported more than one crime was a matter of prosecutorial discretion and further that Mahoney was limited to objecting to the voluntariness of his plea. St. v. Mahoney, 264 M 89, 870 P2d 65, 51 St. Rep. 160 (1994). See also St. v. Walsh, 281 M 70, 931 P2d 42, 54 St. Rep. 64 (1997).

Arson Count: The amendment of an arson count on the opening day of the trial to charge the defendant under (1)(b) rather than (1)(a) of 45-6-103 was substantive and therefore not allowable. St. v. Hallam, 175 M 492, 575 P2d 55 (1978).

What Constitutes Different Offense: When the defendant was charged under one subsection of the aggravated assault statute and had pleaded not guilty, amendment of the charge to allege an offense under another subsection with different elements constitutes a different offense. St. v. Brown, 172 M 41, 560 P2d 533 (1976).

Charging a Different Offense, Destroying Alibi Defense: When the defendant pleaded not guilty, prepared his alibi defense, and furnished the names of alibi witnesses, to allow the State to change the date, the elements of the crime, and the drug involved would destroy the defense and would in substance charge a different offense. The court correctly refused to grant a motion to amend the information. St. v. Tropf, 166 M 79, 530 P2d 1158 (1975).

Filing of Second Information: Where defendant did not move to dismiss or demur to second information which was filed after defendant had pleaded to first information, and thus was improperly filed under this section as it read at that time, but rather entered plea to second information and moved to dismiss first information, and where defendant entered no objection to second information at subsequent trial and did not question the information on appeal, defendant waived any right he may have had to object to second information as improper amendment to first information. Gransberry v. St., 149 M 158, 423 P2d 853 (1967).

Adding Charge of Prior Conviction:

When the State on the day of trial filed an amended information changing the charge from robbery to robbery and a prior conviction of forgery, and the defendant was given no opportunity to either admit or deny the previous conviction, such amendment was substantive, increased the minimum penalty, and was reversible error. St. v. Knight, 143 M 27, 387 P2d 22 (1963).

There was no error in permitting the information to be amended to allege a prior conviction when there was no objection by the defendant and the defendant's attorney consented to its filing. State ex rel. Treat v. District Court, 122 M 249, 200 P2d 248 (1948).

Under a former statute it was held that when the defendant was charged by information with a misdemeanor (liquor violation) and some 4 months after a plea of not guilty the County Attorney was permitted over objection to amend the information by adding a charge of prior conviction, thereby changing the offense from a misdemeanor to a felony, the action of the District Court in allowing the amendment constituted error. St. v. Fisher, 79 M 46, 254 P 872 (1927).

AMENDMENT AS TO FORM

No Prejudice in Amendment of Form but Not Substance of Information: The trial court allowed the state to amend an information 11 months after leave was granted to file the information. Defendant contended that the amendment was untimely, implicitly suggesting that the changes to the information were substantive and not changes of form. The Supreme Court disagreed. The amendment merely changed the date ranges of three of the four counts against defendant by a few months. The same crimes were charged, the elements and proof required did not change, and defendant was informed of the charges. Thus, the amendment was a change of form rather than a change of substance, and defendant was not prejudiced in any way by the change, so the trial court did not err in allowing the amendment. St. v. Yecovenko, 2004 MT 196, 322 M 247, 95 P3d 145 (2004).

Amendment Charging Possession of Different Dangerous Drug One of Form Rather Than Substance: The state's original information charged Clark with two counts of possession of methamphetamine. The state later filed a motion to amend the information to consolidate the two counts of possession and to change the drug identified from methamphetamine to amphetamine. Clark moved to set aside the verdict and dismiss the amended information on grounds that the court failed to arraign on the charges contained in the amended information. The Supreme Court concluded that the amendment was one of form only. The criminal offense and the elements that the state was required to prove remained the same. Following St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367 (1991), arraignment on the amended information was not required because the information was amended in form only, not in substance. St. v. Clark, 1998 MT 221, 290 M 479, 964 P2d 766, 55 St. Rep. 919 (1998).

Names of Offenses Correctly Cited, but Wrong Statutes Cited — Proper to Refuse to Dismiss Charges: Three charges against defendant erroneously cited the penalty statutes instead of the statutes containing the substantive offense. The lower court did not err in allowing the state to amend the cites after the trial started and in refusing to dismiss the charges. The charges correctly named the offenses and clearly set forth the acts with which defendant was charged. St. v. Romero, 279 M 58, 926 P2d 717, 53 St. Rep. 1050 (1996).

Amendment After Case in Chief Permitted — Change in Form, Not Substance: Allen was originally charged with aggravated assault against Evans and assault against D.E., a minor. Prior to trial, the state charged Allen by amended information with aggravated burglary, aggravated assault against Evans, attempted deliberate homicide against Evans, and assault against D.E. Allen objected to the amended information because it stated that Allen remained in Evans's home and assaulted both Evans and D.E., but it did not refer to a separate offense as grounds for an aggravated burglary charge. After its case in chief, the state again amended the information, making the assault against Evans the basis for the aggravated assault and burglary charges, while the assault against D.E. was the additional charge forming the basis of the charge of aggravated burglary. Allen contended that the amendment constituted a substantive change because it changed the nature of the charge and lowered the state's burden of proof. The Supreme Court held that the amendment was allowable because it was a change in form rather than substance. Although the changes were made after the state's case in chief, Allen was charged with the same crime, the elements remained the same, the proof remained the same, and Allen was fully informed of the charges against him and was not prejudiced by the amendments. St. v. Allen, 278 M 326, 925 P2d 470, 53 St. Rep. 935 (1996), following St. v. Matson, 227 M 36, 736 P2d 971 (1987), and St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367 (1991).

Failure to Arraign on Amended Information — No Error When Amendment Not Affecting Original Charges: Defendant contended the District Court erred when it accepted an information amended to add a reference to the requisite mental states but did not arraign him on the amended information. The amendment was in form only and did not make substantial changes in the charges set out in the original information. Failure to arraign defendant on charges set forth in the amended information did not constitute reversible error. St. v. Cameron, 253 M 95, 830 P2d 1284, 49 St. Rep. 150 (1992).

Amendment of Information as to Form — Addition of Witnesses — Arraignment Not Necessary: An original information charged defendant with sexual assault and incest over a continuous period of time. Three months before trial, the state amended the information to add witnesses and to exclude the period of time the victim lived outside defendant's home. The amendment was one of form and not substance, and expanding the witness list did not prejudice the substantial rights of defendant. St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367, 48 St. Rep. 142 (1991).

Amended Information Not Prejudicial — Change in Form, Not Substance: An amendment to the information was properly allowed in adding the word "serious" before the phrase "bodily injury" in a charge of aggravated assault. The amendment was one of form and not of substance, no additional or different offense was charged by the amendment, and the amendment did not prejudice the defendant's substantial rights or change the nature of the offense, elements of the crime, or burden of proof. St. v. Matson, 227 M 36, 736 P2d 971, 44 St. Rep. 874 (1987).

Incorrect Statutory Reference — Charge Not Invalid: A complaint which used the statutory language of 61-8-401 to describe the offense but which listed a citation to 61-8-406 was not made defective by the incorrect reference since the complaint adequately described and gave notice of the offense. The District Court did not err in granting a motion to amend the complaint to correct the statutory reference. St. v. Handy, 221 M 365, 719 P2d 766, 43 St. Rep. 897 (1986), followed in St. v. Moehr, 227 M 253, 738 P2d 499, 44 St. Rep. 1058 (1987).

District Court's Power to Amend Procedural Defect: The District Court has the power to allow the filing of an amended application and affidavit to remedy omissions, establishing probable cause to believe an offense has been committed, in the original affidavit since the defect was a procedural matter and not a substantive issue involving the jurisdiction of the District Court. The District Court's power to amend is essential to efficient administration of justice and the basic right of the defendant to prepare his own defense. St. v. Emerson, 169 M 284, 546 P2d 509 (1976).

Amendment Proper — Incest: The amendment of an information charging the defendant with incest by changing "fornication" to "adultery" was not a substantial change in the charge and only touched a matter of form. Whether the defendant was married or unmarried at the time is not a material ingredient of the offense. St. v. Kuntz, 130 M 126, 295 P2d 707 (1956).

Clerical Error: A typographical error in the information was not fatal. St. v. Polich, 70 M 523, 226 P 519 (1924).

Change of "Malicious Destruction" to "Malicious Burning": An information charging "the malicious destruction of property" may properly be amended by substituting the word "burning" for the word "destruction". St. v. Sieff, 54 M 165, 168 P 524 (1917).

Technical Defect: Under former law an information need not contain a specific allegation that the prosecution is conducted in the name and by the authority of the State, as required by the Montana Constitution, when it appears from the record that it is so conducted, is in the proper form, and is otherwise sufficient. St. v. Barry, 45 M 582, 124 P 774 (1912).

Language Defects:

Stating facts charging a crime in the form of participial clauses does not render an information abortive. However, the proper way to make the charge is by direct allegation. St. v. Pemberton, 39 M 530, 104 P 556 (1909).

An information is not objectionable on the ground that it does not contain a statement of facts constituting the offense in ordinary and concise language or that it is not direct and certain in its statements. St. v. Phillips, 36 M 112, 92 P 299 (1907).

Technical Error in Pleading Prior Conviction: A technical error in pleading a prior conviction in another state will not work a reversal if the punishment imposed does not exceed the proper limit. St. v. Paisley, 36 M 237, 92 P 566 (1907).

Misspelling: The information was not fatally defective because of the mere misspelling of a word. St. v. Lu Sing, 34 M 31, 85 P 521 (1906).

PREJUDICE OF SUBSTANTIAL RIGHT

Failure of State to Comply With Statutory Requirements Regarding Amendment of Information — Harmless Error: Kern was charged with one count of felony sexual assault, three counts of felony assault, and two counts of misdemeanor child endangerment. Subsequently, the state amended the information three times, ultimately reducing the charges to a single count of felony sexual assault and one count of misdemeanor child endangerment. Kern alleged that the state failed to comply with the requirements of this section each time that the information was amended because, despite repeated objections, the state never filed a motion in writing stating the nature of the proposed amendment but chose to orally request leave to file each amended information. The Supreme Court confirmed that the state failed to adhere to the procedural requirements for amending the information but concluded that the state's inattention to procedural detail did not amount to reversible error. The nature of the offenses did not change despite the repeated amendments, and the essential elements of the crimes, the proofs required, and the defenses remained the same; thus, the amendments were of form rather than of substance. Kern was made aware, although not in writing, each time that the state undertook to amend the information, so Kern's substantial rights were not prejudiced by the state's failure to fully comply with this section. St. v. Kern, 2003 MT 77, 315 M 22, 67 P3d 272 (2003).

Amendment Charging Greater Offense — Procedural Safeguards Not Denied: Appealing her conviction for deliberate homicide and aggravated assault, the defendant claimed that the information, which first had charged her with mitigated deliberate homicide, was amended in violation of this section and both the state and federal constitutions. The allegation of error was rejected for three reasons. First, the appellant had relied on a case which construed this section before its 1977 amendment; the shootings had occurred in 1978 and the 1977 amendment removed the limitation construed by the case and argued by appellant. Second, the claim that the burden had been shifted unconstitutionally to the defendant to prove an element of mitigated deliberate homicide was untenable because one justification for the motion to amend the information was the fact that the defendant had failed to supply the State with the names of witnesses who would justify retaining the lesser offense; when it allows affirmative defenses at all, the State may regulate the burden of producing evidence and the burden of persuasion as long as it does not thereby shift to the defendant its own burden of proof as to each of the elements of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt. Third, the argument that the 1980 Cardwell decision should be applied retroactively was rejected. Cardwell sets out procedural safeguards of the defendant's constitutional rights when an information is amended. Although the statute on its face did not require leave of the trial court to file an amended information, [a 1981 amendment required a substantive amendment to be with leave of court] such leave was obtained, thereby substantially complying with the procedural requirements of Cardwell. It was noted that the defendant had adequate notice and time to prepare her defense and that the State had the burden of proving the same elements under both homicide charges in any event. St. v. Sorenson, 190 M 155, 619 P2d 1185, 37 St. Rep. 1834 (1980).

Reliance on Unconstitutional Statute — Reversal Not Automatic — Prejudice Required: The defendant was charged with aiding and abetting in the commission of a burglary. Six days before trial an amended information was filed pursuant to 46-11-403(1) (renumbered 46-11-205) charging the defendant with burglary. Since that time, 46-11-403(1) (renumbered 46-11-205) has been declared unconstitutional as it allows a substantive amendment without leave of court. On review the Supreme Court said that it will not presume that the use of 46-11-403(1) (renumbered 46-11-205) is per se prejudicial. The requisite prejudice must be shown. It is clear from the record that the defendant received every procedural consideration concerning notice and arraignment and that he was afforded sufficient time to prepare his legal defense against the amended information. The use of 46-11-403 (renumbered 46-11-205) in no way prejudiced defendant's case or materially interfered with his rights to a fair trial. St. v. Olsen, 189 M 43, 614 P2d 1061 (1980). [A 1981 amendment to 46-11-403(1) (renumbered 46-11-205) required substantive amendments to be with leave of the court.]

Jurisdiction of District Court — Defective Affidavit of Probable Cause: The failure of the Commissioner of Campaign Finances and Practices (now Commissioner of Political Practices) to recite, in an affidavit supporting a request for leave to initiate prosecution by information, the fact that the County Attorney had waived under 13-37-124 his right to prosecute the defendant was not a jurisdictional defect, and the court improperly granted the defendant's motion to dismiss. Such a defect is a procedural matter, not a substantive one, and does not require dismissal of the charge. St. v. Matthews, 183 M 405, 600 P2d 188 (1979).

When Amendment Allowed After Plea: When an amendment of the information is desired subsequent to a defendant pleading, it is only allowed as to matters of form and only when no substantial right of the defendant is prejudiced. St. v. Brown, 172 M 41, 560 P2d 533 (1976).

Failure to File Affidavit: The failure of the County Attorney to support a request for a direct information with an accompanying affidavit, contrary to 46-11-201, was a procedural matter that did not affect the substantial rights of the defendant. St. v. Logan, 156 M 48, 473 P2d 833 (1970).

Offense Incorrectly Named but Correctly Described: The general rule is that when the facts, acts, and circumstances are set forth with sufficient certainty to constitute an offense it is not a fatal defect that the complaint gives the offense an erroneous name. St. v. Schnell, 107 M 579, 88 P2d 19 (1939).

Amendment When New Trial Granted: When a new trial was granted after the defendant was convicted, the court held that the information could be amended by leave of court to charge the same offense without violating any right of the defendant and without the right of defendant to plead former jeopardy. St. v. Aus, 105 M 82, 69 P2d 584 (1932).

Defective Information:

The Supreme Court will not reverse a judgment of conviction on account of technical errors or defects in the information, when the defendant was fully advised of the nature of the charge against him to enable him to prepare to meet that charge and his substantial rights were not affected by the defect. St. v. Wehr, 57 M 469, 188 P 930 (1920).

An information charging an attempt to obtain money by false pretenses, though defective in form and containing immaterial averments, is sufficient to sustain a conviction when it is apparent that the defendant has suffered no prejudice. St. v. Phillips, 36 M 112, 92 P 299 (1907).

Sufficiency of Charge — Variance in Name of Victim:

A mistake in the name of the person injured is not to be considered material if the injury is so described in other respects as to identify it. St. v. Moxley, 41 M 402, 110 P 83 (1910).

A variance between the name of the victim in the information and the actual name is fatal. St. v. Lee, 33 M 203, 83 P 223 (1905).

Sufficiency of Charge — Forgery: An information charging forgery of a promissory note, although containing superfluous averments, was not fatally defective. St. v. Mitten, 36 M 376, 92 P 969 (1907).

Sufficiency of Charge — False Pretenses: An information charging an attempt to obtain money by false pretenses, though defective in form and containing immaterial averments, is sufficient to sustain a conviction when it is apparent that the defendant has suffered no prejudice. St. v. Phillips, 36 M 112, 92 P 299 (1907).

Name of Victim — Robbery: An information for the crime of robbery may be amended at the close of the testimony for the State so as to change the name of the person from whom it is alleged the property was feloniously taken. St. v. Oliver, 20 M 318, 50 P 1018 (1897).

Part 3
Grand Jury

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: Notwithstanding negative connotations to the use of the grand jury as a method of filing an indictment, this option was retained. Two substantive changes were made. The judge summoning the grand jury must specifically delineate the matters to be considered, and the County Attorney has been given more control of the investigation. The remaining changes are in format and are intended to clarify the process.

Part Compiler's Comments

Section Not Codified: Section 95-1401, R.C.M. 1947, was not codified in the MCA because it is redundant with 3-15-602 and 46-11-331(2). This section has not been repealed and is still valid law. Citation may be made to sec. 1, Ch. 196, L. 1967, as amended by sec. 1, Ch. 3, L. 1973.

Part Case Notes

Immunity of Witness Before Grand Jury: Transactional immunity from prosecution provisions of 46-15-311 (renumbered 46-15-331 in 1985) apply to proceedings before grand juries because the grand jury is a judicial inquisitorial body. Kelly v. Grand Jury, 170 M 284, 552 P2d 1399 (1976).

Implied Power to Appoint Special Prosecutor: When the County Attorney is disqualified from acting as prosecutor because of being one of the subjects of a grand jury investigation, in the exercise of legislative express powers, the District Judge must have the implied power to appoint a qualified special prosecutor, otherwise grand jury proceedings in such a case could be brought to a halt and the entire grand jury investigation frustrated. State ex rel. Forsythe v. Coate, 169 M 384, 546 P2d 1060 (1976).

Anonymous Witnesses on Indictment: Under former law, if a person went to trial under an indictment on which the witnesses' names were designated as Richard Roe and John Doe and was convicted, the Supreme Court was required to sustain the conviction if possible and the burden was on the defendant to show prejudice. State ex rel. Porter v. District Court, 124 M 249, 220 P2d 1035 (1950).

46-11-301. Summoning grand jury.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an adaptation of 1987 MCA 46-11-301. The statute adopts the 1987 statute, with the exception of replacing the term "necessary" with the standard phrase "to be in the public interest" that is found in Rule 6(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

Source: R.C.M. 1947, sections 94-6301 and 94-6302.

The provision merely implements the portion of Article III, section 8 of the [1889] Montana Constitution [slightly modified in Art. II, sec. 20, 1972 Mont. Const.] dealing with grand juries.

Alternate jurors are provided for as a safeguard so that the grand jury does not have to be dismissed in the middle of an investigation, if one of the regular grand jurors gets sick or for some other reason has to miss some of the proceedings. It is intended that at least seven jurors must be present during the entire investigation before a grand jury can return a valid indictment. If one of the regular jurors has missed part of the grand jury proceedings he shall be disqualified and dismissed and an alternate juror will be substituted by the judge. The same general procedure may be followed as is described in [25-7-210] for the selection of alternate trial jurors. In Montana a grand jury is normally summoned to consider particular problems and can be reconstituted to pursue another case.

Review by Supreme Court: The judicial authority of the District Court to empanel a grand jury is discretionary, but it is not an absolute, unbridled discretion. When the District Court abuses its discretion the Supreme Court may review the decision and reverse it. State ex rel. Woodahl v. District Court, 166 M 31, 530 P2d 780 (1975).

46-11-302. Challenges to grand jury or grand jurors.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is essentially a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-11-302. The introductory clause "The state" has been replaced with "The county attorney or attorney general". This amendment clarifies the fact that challenges are an option belonging to the prosecutor. The federal rule provision that allows a defendant in custody to challenge the panel or a juror on the same basis had been rejected. See Rule 6(b)(1), Fed. R. Crim. P.

A limiting phrase from the federal rules that permits challenges only until the jury is sworn has been adopted. The failure to challenge is not a waiver of any other potential objection at a later date.

The provision dealing with excusing jurors has been retained in subsection (2). The subsection parallels Rule 6(g) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

Subsection (3) retains the substance of 1987 MCA 46-11-302(2). A minor change has been made to conform the provision with the statute format.

Source: Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure[, Rule] 6(b)(1) and (2).

The reasons for challenging an individual juror are not specifically enumerated. The change is consistent with the section on the challenge of trial jurors. The reasons for challenging a juror will remain the same as at present plus any other valid reasons the ingenuity of the challenger may produce. The motion to dismiss is available to persons other than the state. Both sides have the right to object.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute controls those instances in which the Attorney General or County Attorney is the subject of a grand jury investigation. The statute has no counterpart in either the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure.

46-11-307. Closed hearing.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute adopts a provision from Rule 6(e)(5) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The 1987 code provided that the grand jury retire to a private room to conduct its inquiry. See 1987 MCA 46-11-312(1). This statute makes it clear that the grand jury proceeding will be closed.

The statute allows the hearing in a contempt proceeding to be open if the proceeding is open as a matter of right. An open hearing for a contempt citation, however, must be requested by the defendant and may still be restricted. See Levine v. U.S., 362 US 610 (1960).

46-11-308. Who may be present.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is modeled after Rule 6(d) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, concerning who may be present before the grand jury. This statute specifically identifies those persons entitled to appear before the grand jury. The statute also clarifies that only the jurors may be present during deliberations.

46-11-310. Duties of grand jurors.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute represents a substantial departure from 1987 MCA 46-11-312. This provision establishes a broadly stated rule that governs duties of the grand jury. The laundry list contained in 1987 MCA 46-11-312(3) is eliminated in favor of a more specific charge by the judge, and the statute limits the grand jury to those designated matters presented by the prosecutor that are consistent with or developed in the proceedings.

The statute eliminates the grand jury's authority to hire an expert when necessary. See 1987 MCA 46-11-312(5). If the grand jury feels that an expert is necessary, it may petition the court for such assistance.

It is not the intent of this statute to impede the ability of a grand jury to conduct an investigation. The Commission recognized the grand jury's responsibility to thoroughly investigate the matters before it. See In re Secret Grand Jury Inquiry, 170 Mont. 354 (1976). The intent is only to restrict the grand jury proceedings to those matters in which the grand jury is charged.

46-11-311. Charge to grand jury.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an adaptation of 1987 MCA 46-11-311. The statute narrows the authority of the grand jury to investigate any potential offense of which it is aware. It requires the judge to inform the grand jury of the matters it may consider.

In addition, the statute allows the prosecutor to bring additional matters before the grand jury that are consistent with the original charge or that are developed during the proceedings. This authority is reserved for the prosecutor who will, in almost any event, assist the grand jury throughout the investigation.

Commission Comment Not Divided: This section is a recodification of part of section 95-1404, R.C.M. 1947. Sections 46-11-312 (now repealed) and 46-11-318 are also derived from section 95-1404. The commission comments to section 95-1404 are printed in their entirety under 46-11-311.

Source: California Penal Code, sections 914 and 915.

This provision is substantially the same as the existing law except the grand jury is allowed to function if their business has not been completed even though the court has adjourned.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In second sentence, before "court", inserted "district", after "shall" substituted "instruct the jury" for "give the grand jurors such information as it deems proper or as is required by law", and at end substituted "the matters that jurors may consider" for "as to any charges of public offenses known to the court and likely to come before the grand jury" and inserted last sentence concerning additional matters developed during proceedings; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Supervision of Grand Jury by Court: The District Court has limited power over a grand jury. Once called, it is not subject to control except when it exceeds the scope of statutes or performs unconstitutional acts. In re Secret Grand Jury, 170 M 354, 553 P2d 987 (1976).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute preserves the authority regarding who may issue a subpoena contained in 1987 MCA 46-11-313(1). Subsections (2) and (3) make the general procedure for use of subpoenas applicable to establish uniform provisions governing criminal procedure.

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

1991 Amendment: In (1) deleted last sentence that read: "The subpoena may be directed to witnesses in the state in support of the prosecution, those witnesses whose testimony, in the opinion of the issuer, is material in an investigation before the grand jury, and such other witnesses as the grand jury may direct"; inserted (2) concerning fees and mileage of witnesses; and inserted (3) concerning applicability of subpoenas in criminal actions.

Case Notes

Quashing Grand Jury Subpoena: A District Court may not interfere with a grand jury's subpoena power except when: (1) the subpoena duces tecum is overbroad; (2) the subpoena requires self-incrimination; (3) there is a clear case of grossly abusive conduct; (4) the grand jury's investigation goes beyond the scope set forth in the court's charge; or (5) if the court did not interfere, the result would be an abuse of process. In re Secret Grand Jury, 170 M 354, 553 P2d 987 (1976).

46-11-314. Reception of evidence.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-11-314(1). Any reference to the discovery provisions of this title has been deleted. The substance of the statute, however, is retained, and the statute should not cause any change in established procedure.

Subsection (2) of 1987 MCA 46-14-314 has not been retained. The determination was made that this provision was unnecessary. The deletion is not intended to result in a change in established procedure. The Commission recognized that revealing exculpatory evidence and allowing the grand jury to hear evidence from the defendant are basic principles that need not be restated in this statute.

[Section 46-11-314(1)] is substantially the same as the existing law except that it does not include a provision for hearing depositions. The majority of states that have this provision have held that the requirement of "legal evidence" is not mandatory.

46-11-315. Advice and assistance to grand jury.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute retains the key provisions of 1987 MCA 46-11-315. The statute changes the code to clarify the provisions relating to advice and assistance to the grand jury.

Subsection (1) establishes a single rule describing when a judge may offer advice to the grand jury. Unless advice is sought by the grand jury, the judge may not guide or advise the grand jury proceedings.

Subsection (2) provides a distinct rule on when the prosecutor may advise or otherwise assist the grand jury. The subsection preserves the first sentence of 1987 MCA 46-11-315(2). The prosecutor is referred to in this statute in order to recognize the provisions of 46-11-304, which authorize appointment of a special prosecutor when the County Attorney is under investigation.

Subsection (3) provides that the prosecutor may employ, with the approval of the court, certain individuals to assist or advise the grand jury. The court must also approve the compensation being paid to such individuals. Under 1987 MCA 46-11-315(4), the court had control of the compensation for an interpreter, but this control has now been extended to all persons specially employed to assist or advise the grand jury. This change was made to effect controls over the cost of a grand jury.

This statute does not expressly provide for the grand juror's authority to request assistance, but the ability to do so remains unchanged under this statute. The prosecutor had the discretion to employ assistance of certain persons. See 1987 MCA 46-11-315(3).

1991 Amendment: In (1), at end of first sentence, substituted "the judge" for "the court or the judge thereof, the attorney general, or the county attorney"; in (2), at beginning, substituted "prosecutor" for "county attorney or the attorney general" and deleted second and third sentences that read: "When a charge against or involving the county attorney, deputy county attorney, or anyone employed by or connected with the office of the county attorney is being investigated by the grand jury, the county attorney, deputy county attorney, or all or any one or more of them shall not be allowed to be present in an official capacity before the grand jury when the charge is being investigated. They or he shall only be present while a witness and after appearing as a witness shall leave the place where the grand jury is holding session"; in (3) substituted present language concerning employment of certain people for former (3) that read: "(3) When requested to do so by the grand jury of any county, the attorney general or county attorney may employ special counsel and investigators who shall investigate and present the evidence acquired in such investigation to the grand jury"; deleted (4) that read: "(4) The grand jury or county attorney may require by subpoena the attendance of any person before the grand jury as interpreter. While his services are necessary, the interpreter may be present at the examination of witnesses before the grand jury. The compensation for the services of the interpreter constitutes a charge against the county and shall be fixed by the grand jury in an amount to be approved by the court. It shall be paid out of the county treasury on a warrant of the county auditor upon an order of the judge of the district court"; and made minor changes in style.

Off-the-Record Statements — Prosecutorial Misconduct: Allegations of improper statements by an Assistant Attorney General and prosecutorial misconduct do not reach the merits of the charges and are a weak basis for seeking dismissal of the charges. St. v. Scanlon, 33 St. Rep. 1355 (1976), replaced by opinion in 174 M 139, 569 P2d 368 (1977).

Delegation to Special Prosecutor: The County Attorney cannot delegate to an unofficial counsel his right to advise the grand jury, assist them in their investigations, and examine witnesses, and an order of the District Judges appointing such a special prosecutor when the County Attorney was present and able to act could not give such authority. State ex rel. Porter v. District Court, 124 M 249, 220 P2d 1035 (1950).

Presence of Unauthorized Person: Under former law, the very appearance of an unauthorized "special prosecutor" before the grand jury was sufficient to set aside the indictments without a showing of prejudice. The statute required the indictment to be set aside if the person was present while the charge was under consideration. "Under consideration" included when witnesses were being examined. State ex rel. Porter v. District Court, 124 M 249, 220 P2d 1035 (1950), distinguished in St. v. Cockrell, 131 M 254, 309 P2d 316 (1957).

46-11-316. Recorded proceedings.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an adaptation of 1987 MCA 46-11-316. The procedure to be followed has been substantially revised, but these revisions should not adversely affect the rights of any party to the proceeding.

Subsection (1) is chiefly a restatement of the first sentence of 1987 MCA 46-11-316(1). Rather than being discretionary, however, the statute requires that a record be made of the grand jury proceedings. As in the 1987 code, the statute allows that the record be either written or electronically recorded.

Subsection (2) requires that the record and a transcript of the record be filed with the Clerk of the District Court. This provision reflects a basic requirement present in the code. Only this basic statute is preserved. The 1987 code also required filing transcripts within a fixed time and distributing those transcripts to certain parties. The Commission felt that once the record is certified and filed, it is accessible by any party and, therefore, distribution was unnecessary. Any party may request a copy of the record at his own expense.

Subsection (3) adopts a provision from Rule 6(e)(1) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, providing that the prosecution will not fail if the recording is incomplete.

read: "The reporter shall complete the certification and filing within 10 days after the indictment has been found unless the court for good cause makes an order extending the time. The clerk of the district court shall deliver the original of the transcript filed with him to the county attorney immediately upon his receipt thereof, retain one copy for use only by judges in proceedings relating to the indictment, and deliver a copy of the transcript to each defendant or his attorney"; inserted (3) concerning failure of recording; and made minor changes in style.

46-11-317. Secrecy of proceedings — disclosure.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an adaptation of 1987 MCA 46-11-317. Several provisions from the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure were incorporated, making the statute more flexible but just as protective of grand jury proceedings.

Subsection (1) combines provisions from the code with elements of the federal rule to establish a primary rule concerning grand jury secrecy. Compare 1987 MCA 46-11-317(1) and Rule 6(e)(2), Fed. R. Crim. P. The statute identifies those persons charged with secrecy and conveys the obligation to secrecy in an affirmative manner. Like the federal rule, the statute does not impose any obligation of secrecy on witnesses.

Subsection (2) establishes a principal and automatic exception to the rule of secrecy. Under the 1987 code, disclosure of matters before the grand jury was allowed to be made to the County Attorney for use in performing his duties. See 1987 MCA 46-11-317(1). The federal lead is followed in this area, and the statute permits disclosures to any prosecutor or official investigator who can use the information in the performance of duties. This statute fosters cooperation between state, local, and federal prosecutors in need of such information.

Subsection (3) provides three other instances in which the proceedings before a grand jury may be revealed. Unlike subsection (2), the disclosure of information in these instances requires court approval.

The Commission recognized that this statute would present some change in established procedure. The statute arises from a studied review of the matter and should aid in making the grand jury a more viable option.

Source: Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, [Rule] 6(e).

Since its inception the proceedings of the grand jury have been shrouded in secrecy. The reasons most frequently articulated for the policy of secrecy are:

(1) to prevent the escape of those whose indictment may be contemplated;

(2) to insure the utmost freedom in grand jury deliberations, and to prevent persons subject to indictment or their friends from importuning the grand jurors;

(3) to prevent intimidation or tampering with witnesses to testify before the grand jury;

(4) to encourage free disclosure by persons having knowledge of commission of crimes;

(5) to protect an innocent accused person from public knowledge that he has been under investigation.

After the grand jury has investigated an individual's activity and he has been indicted and apprehended, all of the above reasons lose most of their weight. California's actual experience indicates that the dangers of disclosure of grand jury testimony are seriously overrated. California has followed the procedure of providing the defendant in a criminal prosecution with a copy of the transcript of the grand jury testimony before trial. This law appears to have had no adverse effect, as the grand jury has remained a vital and active force in California.

In interpreting Federal Rule 6(e) in Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. Wisconsin, 360 U.S. 395 (1959), the U.S. Supreme Court decided that for disclosure to be allowed the defendant had to show some "particularized need" outweighing the policy of secrecy. This requirement leads to a complicated determination of whether there is such a particularized need. The old trend was one of undue emphasis on the policy of secrecy which many times restricted the defendant's ability to prepare his case—this is out of step with the modern liberalization of criminal discovery.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In (1), after "made to", substituted "any prosecutor or investigator of this state and prosecutors or investigators from any other state or the federal government" for "county attorney"; in (2), in first sentence after "juror", deleted "attorney", after "testimony" inserted "or the prosecutor", and at end substituted "except as otherwise permitted by Title 46" for "only when so directed by the court preliminary to or in connection with a judicial proceeding" and inserted second and third sentences concerning obligation of secrecy and contempt; inserted (3) and (3)(a) concerning disclosure directed by District Court; at end of (3)(b) deleted "under 46-11-302(2)"; substituted (3)(c) concerning disclosure to defendant pursuant to discovery for "No obligation of secrecy may be imposed upon any person except in accordance with this rule"; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) The court may direct that an indictment shall be kept secret until the defendant is in custody or has given bail, and no person shall disclose the finding of the indictment except when necessary for the issuance and execution of a warrant or summons"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Improper Admonition of Secrecy: An admonition of secrecy to grand jury witnesses is not proper unless given in accordance with this section. The effect can be vitiated by lifting the improper requirement to enable adequate preparation of the defense. St. v. Commission Comments 1991 Comment: This statute preserves the provision of 1987 MCA 46-11-319. Some amendments to this statute have been adopted, but these changes should not cause any significant changes in established procedure.

Subsection (1) has been amended to reflect the fact that special prosecutors, experts, investigators, and interpreters are all paid in the same manner. This subsection controls such payments.

Subsection (3) has been amended to avoid mention of specific code provisions. The references deleted were 1987 MCA 3-5-902(1), 3-5-903 [now repealed], and 46-15-104.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 585 in (1) at end of first sentence after "must be paid by the" inserted "county" and in second sentence after "treasurer of the county" inserted "shall pay the expenses" and near middle after "general fund of the county" inserted "or out of the district court fund, if any"; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) If the county has a district court fund, all expenses of a grand jury must be paid out of that fund"; in (2) substituted "The state shall pay the expenses of juror and witness fees and witness expenses as provided in 3-5-901 and 3-5-902" for "Subject to the procedures established by law, the state shall reimburse the court for juror and witness fees and witness expenses. The county shall deposit the amount reimbursed in its general fund unless the county has a district court fund. If the county has a district court fund, the amount reimbursed must be deposited in that fund"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2002.

Saving Clause: Section 55, Ch. 585, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

1991 Amendment: In (1), after "special", substituted "prosecutors" for "counsel", before "investigators" inserted "experts", and after "investigators" inserted "and interpreters"; in (3), in first sentence after "established", substituted "by law" for "under 3-5-902(1)", after "reimburse the" substituted "court" for "county", after "fees" deleted "as provided in 3-5-903", and at end deleted "as provided in 46-15-104"; and made minor changes in style.

1985 Amendments: Chapter 66 near middle of (1), inserted "except as provided in subsection (2)"; and inserted (2) providing for payment of grand jury expenses from a District Court fund.

Chapter 680 inserted (3) requiring state to reimburse juror and witness fees.

46-11-331. Finding indictment.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is chiefly a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-11-331 and is intended to specify when an indictment may be found. In providing a separate provision for indictment, the statute distinguishes between the grand jury investigative process and the resulting charge, if any. The statute does not retain the requirement of a "true bill" and eliminates the phrase "uncontradicted or unexplained" as superfluous.

Subsection (2) retains 1987 MCA 46-11-333(2). The provision requires the notification of the District Court Judge that an indictment has been found if other charges are pending. The introductory clause of the code provision, "If the defendant is in custody or has been given bail", is replaced with language from the federal rule. Compare 1987 MCA 46-11-333(2) and Rule 6(f), Fed. R. Crim. P.

Commission Comment Not Divided: This section is a recodification of part of section 95-1410, R.C.M. 1947. Sections 46-11-332 and 46-11-333 (now repealed) are also derived from section 95-1410. The commission comments to section 95-1410 are printed in their entirety under 46-11-331.

Part 4
The Charge

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: This part provides the general statutes governing the criminal charge, whether by complaint, indictment, or information. These statutes combine provisions from both the 1987 code and the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure were considered but were not used. These statutes attempt to preserve the substance of the code and the established procedure concerning the criminal charge.

The code provision that required that a record book be kept of charges filed by indictment or information has not been retained. See 1987 MCA 46-11-402. The Commission recognized that the requirement was not often followed and that the practice was antiquated. The remainder of the 1987 code concerning the criminal charge is retained in these statutes.

Brady, 249 M 290, 816 P2d 413 (1991), the Supreme Court held that the state has the authority to charge under any statute if the conduct of the defendants meets the elements of the crime. St. v. Fertterer, 255 M 73, 841 P2d 467, 49 St. Rep. 846 (1992).

46-11-401. Form of charge.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an adaptation of 1987 MCA 46-11-401. Although in different terms and format, the statute preserves all of the stated elements of a charge as denoted in the 1987 code.

The qualifying provision that a charge be expressed "in ordinary and concise language and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended" has been replaced. The more direct language in the federal rule that the charge be plain, concise, and definite has been used. Compare 1987 MCA 46-11-401(1)(c)(iii) and Rule 7(c)(1), Fed. R. Crim. P. All other requirements of a charge are retained, and the basic purpose of a charge—to apprise the person of the charges and prevent surprise prosecutions—is unaffected. See St. v. Holmes, 207 Mont. 176 (1983).

Subsection (5) adopts a provision from the federal rule that allows surplusage to be removed from an indictment or information. See Rule 7(d), Fed. R. Crim. P. The authority of the court to strike such surplusage is limited to doing so on the defendant's motion. See comment for Rule 7(d), Fed. R. Crim. P., Federal Criminal Code and Rules, West Pub. Co., p. 34 (1986 ed.).

Subsection (6) preserves the 1987 code provision recognizing that defects not affecting a defendant's substantial rights will not result in failure of a charge. See 1987 MCA 46-11-403(3). The provision is retained in this statute because it is intended to apply to all forms of charges.

Commission Comment Not Divided: This section is a recodification of part of section 95-1503, R.C.M. 1947. Section 46-11-402 (now repealed) is also derived from section 95-1503.

GENERAL

Gopher Rule Relates to Instructions on Lesser Included Offenses, Not Alternative Offenses: Beavers was charged with criminal endangerment, but maintained that he was entitled to a jury instruction on reckless driving as an alternative theory under the rule in St. v. Gopher, 194 M 227, 633 P2d 1195, 38 St. Rep. 1521 (1981), that a defendant is entitled to an instruction to cover every issue or theory having support in the evidence. However, Gopher applies only to instructions on lesser included offenses, not alternative offenses. The rule of law applied to alternative offenses is that of prosecutorial discretion. When the facts support a possible charge of more than one crime, the crime charged is a matter of prosecutorial discretion. (See St. v. Booke, 178 M 225, 583 P2d 405 (1978).) Beavers was properly disallowed arguing an alternative offense theory that involved an offense that was not a lesser included offense of the offense charged. St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371, 56 St. Rep. 1035 (1999).

Aggravated Assault — Sufficiency of Circumstantial Evidence — Extraneous Allegation of Use of Weapon Held Not to Affect Conviction — Instruction Properly Refused: Neary was charged with aggravated assault of a female friend. The evidence at trial consisted of statements by witnesses who placed him, in an angry mood, with the injured woman at the top of some stairs and who heard admissions against interest and inconsistent statements from Neary about the circumstances of the woman's injury. The state also introduced expert medical testimony that the woman's injuries were consistent with a blow to the head with an object or a fall down some stairs onto an object. A neurologist testified for Neary that the woman's injuries could have been caused in the same manner and that the woman's blood showed evidence of alcohol, amphetamines, and a prescription drug, which, in combination, would cause a propensity to fall. Neary contended that the state's case was circumstantial and that the verdict was not supported by the evidence. The Supreme Court held that Neary's inconsistent statements, his other statements, and his actions before, during, and after the incident supported the jury's verdict. The Supreme Court distinguished St. v. Gould, 216 M 455, 704 P2d 20 (1985), and St. v. Gommenginger, 242 M 265, 790 P2d 455 (1990), by pointing out that in Gommenginger, unlike the case before it, testimony came from a drug informant with a motive to lie and that in Gould, the defendant had moved to suppress pretrial admissions, that Neary had not. The Supreme Court also held that the District Court did not err in refusing to amend one of the state's jury instructions to provide that Neary had committed the elements of aggravated assault "with a weapon". The Supreme Court noted that the fact that the text of the state's information alleged that Neary struck the woman "with some type of blunt weapon" did not change the fact that the jury was correctly given the elements of the offense of aggravated assault and that the jury was not required to find that Neary used a weapon to find him guilty of aggravated assault. Distinguishing St. v. Later, 260 M 363, 860 P2d 135 (1993), in which the defendant had been charged under the wrong statute, the Supreme Court held that Neary was not prevented from preparing an adequate defense by the statement in the information that Neary used a weapon. St. v. Neary, 284 M 409, 944 P2d 750, 54 St. Rep. 942 (1997).

Names of Offenses Correctly Cited, but Wrong Statutes Cited — Proper to Refuse to Dismiss Charges: Three charges against defendant erroneously cited the penalty statutes instead of the statutes containing the substantive offense. The lower court did not err in allowing the state to amend the cites after the trial started and in refusing to dismiss the charges. The charges correctly named the offenses and clearly set forth the acts with which defendant was charged. St. v. Romero, 279 M 58, 926 P2d 717, 53 St. Rep. 1050 (1996).

Use of Information and Surplus Language in Instructions Not Error: Mummey was found not guilty on the first count against him of aggravated assault against Miller. He was found guilty of the second count of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) against Darling. Mummey argued that he could not be found guilty of the second charge because it was inconsistent in its language in that it described the assault as having been perpetrated by the use of the same footwear worn in the assault of which he had been found innocent. The Supreme Court held that there was no error in incorporating the information into the jury instructions when they did not redefine the elements of the crime and that in view of all the instructions, the surplus language in the second count did not invalidate the verdict. St. v. Mummey, 264 M 272, 871 P2d 868, 51 St. Rep. 198 (1994).

Dismissal for Failure to Charge Offense of Which Convicted — Reckless Driving Not Lesser Included Offense of DUI: Barker was charged with DUI but was convicted of reckless driving by the Ravalli County Justice of the Peace. Barker appealed to the District Court and filed a motion to dismiss, which the District Court granted. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the reckless driving charge and the DUI charge were inapposite charges and that reckless driving was not a lesser included offense of DUI. The Supreme Court also held that the conviction should be set aside because Barker did not have notice that he was charged with reckless driving, which violated Barker's constitutional right to due process. St. v. Barker, 260 M 85, 858 P2d 360, 50 St. Rep. 970 (1993).

Information for Witness Tampering Statutorily Sufficient: The defendant contended that the information was insufficient to reasonably apprise him of the charges against him. The Supreme Court held that the information was statutorily sufficient in that it named the defendant, cited the statute, and recited the name of the crime, the facts of the crime, and the date and time of the offense. St. v. Matt, 245 M 208, 799 P2d 1085, 47 St. Rep. 1988 (1990).

Incorrect Statutory Reference — Charge Not Invalid:

The name of a crime is controlled by the specific acts charged. When the facts, acts, and circumstances are set forth with sufficient certainty to constitute an offense, it is not a fatal defect that the complaint gives the offense an erroneous name. An erroneous statutory reference will not invalidate the charge. St. v. Collins, 226 M 188, 734 P2d 686, 44 St. Rep. 576 (1987).

A complaint which used the statutory language of 61-8-401 to describe the offense but which listed a citation to 61-8-406 was not made defective by the incorrect reference since the complaint adequately described and gave notice of the offense. The District Court did not err in granting a motion to amend the complaint to correct the statutory reference. St. v. Handy, 221 M 365, 719 P2d 766, 43 St. Rep. 897 (1986).

Variance Between Information and Proof — No Prejudice: Appellant contended that a fatal variance between the information and the state's proof at trial required that the charges be dismissed. The basis of this contention was that while the affidavit in support of the information alleged that Valley Industrial Park (VIP) owned the fuel (which appellant was convicted of stealing) by virtue of a deed from the U.S. government, at trial they attempted to prove ownership by possession. Any variation between the proof and the information was found to be minor and insufficient to require dismissal of the charges. No substantial right of appellant had been prejudiced. St. v. Holmes, 212 M 526, 687 P2d 662, 41 St. Rep. 1535 (1984), followed in St. v. Steffes, 269 M 214, 887 P2d 1196, 51 St. Rep. 1463 (1994), and St. v. Parker, 1998 MT 6, 287 M 151, 953 P2d 692, 55 St. Rep. 16 (1998).

Statutory Language Used Without Statement of Facts: An information charging a homicide is sufficient if it charges the offense in terms of a statute without reciting supporting evidentiary facts. In this case the information is sufficient. It charged three theories of homicide: (1) that the defendant as a principal purposely or knowingly caused the death of the victim by engaging in one or more of four enumerated kinds of conduct; (2) that the defendant aided and abetted in purposely or knowingly causing the death of victim by engaging in one or more of four kinds of conduct; and (3) that the death of the victim occurred while defendant was engaged in or aiding and abetting in the commission of aggravated assault. St. v. Riley, 199 M 413, 649 P2d 1273, 39 St. Rep. 1491 (1982).

Time and Place of Offense: An information charging defendant with deliberate homicide charged that defendant engaged in various acts in three different counties over a period of about 2 years that resulted in the death of victim. Defendant argued that the information fails to state the time and place of the offense "as definitely as can be done". The court rejected this argument, stating that the law does not require that the time and place be stated with impossible precision; it merely requires that they be stated as definitely as possible under the circumstances, unless time is a material ingredient in the offense. St. v. Riley, 199 M 413, 649 P2d 1273, 39 St. Rep. 1491 (1982).

When Defendant Becomes "Accused" — Insufficient Reason for Delay of Trial — Prejudice to Defendant: Where 376 days elapsed between the filing of a complaint in Justice's Court charging the defendant with arson and the filing of an information in District Court and 423 days elapsed between the defendant's arrest and the defendant's scheduled trial, the court did not err in dismissing with prejudice for lack of a speedy trial the information charging the defendant with arson. The defendant became an "accused" on the day the complaint was filed against him in Justice's Court, the State failed without good reason to diligently pursue the charges against the defendant, and the defendant had asserted the denial of his right to a speedy trial and had shown prejudice in his plausible claims that he was no longer able to recall facts constituting an alibi and was no longer able to discover physical evidence for use in his defense independently of that evidence found by the prosecution. The defendant thus satisfied the requirements to prove a violation of his constitutional right to a speedy trial. St. v. Larson, 191 M 257, 623 P2d 954, 38 St. Rep. 213 (1981).

Charge as a Matter of Prosecutor's Discretion: When the facts of a case support possible charges of both aggravated assault and attempted deliberate homicide, the crime to be charged is a matter of prosecutorial discretion, which will not be interfered with if different proof is required under each statute and there is no clear and manifest legislative intent to the contrary. St. v. Booke, 178 M 225, 583 P2d 405 (1978). See also St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994).

Proper Notification in Information: An information stating the alleged facts, using the language of the statutes, and directing the defendant to the appropriate sections of the criminal code properly apprises the defendant of the nature and cause of the accusation being made. St. v. Booke, 178 M 225, 583 P2d 405 (1978).

Good Cause for Continuance: If a defendant wishes to protect himself from alleged prejudice incurred by the use of an approximate date in charging an offense and the proof offered at trial, he can move for a continuance under this section. St. v. Hall, 171 M 33, 554 P2d 755 (1976).

Effect of State's Noncompliance With Court Order: Reversal was required when the prosecution withheld evidence and notice of witnesses in violation of orders of the court. St. v. Keller, 170 M 372, 553 P2d 1013 (1976).

Bill of Particulars: In a criminal case no bill of particulars may be required or ordered. St. v. Bosch, 125 M 566, 242 P2d 977 (1952).

Certainty and Precision: An information must charge with certainty and precision the crime alleged to have been committed. St. v. Hem, 69 M 57, 220 P 80 (1923).

Essential Elements of Information: An information should state the proper title of the court and cause and contain a statement of the facts constituting the offense charged in ordinary and concise language. St. v. Paine, 61 M 270, 202 P 203 (1921).

Superfluous Language: Superfluous words or sentences inserted in an information charging a crime may be treated as surplusage and disregarded. St. v. McGowan, 36 M 422, 93 P 552 (1907).

Unverified Information: The fact that an information is not verified does not deprive the court of jurisdiction to try the case. State ex rel. Nolan v. Brantly, 20 M 173, 50 P 410 (1897).

SUFFICIENCY OF CHARGE

Discretion of Prosecutor in Charging Defendant When Facts Support Possibility of More Than One Crime: After threatening to shoot his estranged wife's boyfriend during a telephone call, Smith was charged with assault with a weapon. Smith contended that he should instead have been charged with violation of privacy in communications through intimidation over the telephone and that the assault with a weapon charge should have been dismissed. The Supreme Court disagreed. The two charges were distinctly different, and the facts of the case supported a charge for either crime. Thus, the crime to be charged was a matter of prosecutorial discretion, and the County Attorney did not abuse those broad discretionary powers in charging Smith with assault with a weapon. St. v. Smith, 2004 MT 191, 322 M 206, 95 P3d 137 (2004).

Sufficient Probable Cause in Affidavit to Warrant Charge of Sexual Assault: Kern contended that the state failed to establish probable cause in its affidavit charging sexual assault. The Supreme Court noted that pursuant to St. v. Arrington, 260 M 1, 858 P2d 343 (1993), an affidavit in support of a motion to file an information need not make out a prima facie case that a defendant committed an offense; rather, a mere probability is sufficient. Evidence to establish probable cause need not be as complete as the evidence necessary to establish guilt, and the determination whether a motion to file an information is supported by probable cause is left to the discretion of the trial court. Here, the factual allegations that defendant forced the victim to engage in sexual conduct were sufficient to establish the mere probability that defendant committed the offense. Kern also asserted that it was necessary that the affidavit require allegations that he committed the touching and that he did so to gratify his sexual response. The Supreme Court disagreed with both arguments. Nothing in 45-5-502 requires that a defendant commit the actual touching, nor was the affidavit required to allege the purpose of the sexual contact because that element is incorporated by reference in the statute. St. v. Kern, 2003 MT 77, 315 M 22, 67 P3d 272 (2003), following St. v. Steffes, 269 M 214, 887 P2d 1196 (1994).

Inadequacy of Amended Information Charging Commission of Undefined Sexual Crime: Hardaway was initially charged with burglary, and the information was amended to charge that Hardaway knowingly entered or remained unlawfully in an unoccupied structure with intent to commit theft or a sexual crime. Hardaway contended that the amended information should have been dismissed because the term "sexual crime" was not sufficiently definite in its legal meaning to reasonably apprise him of the charge against him so that he could prepare a defense. The Supreme Court agreed. An information is sufficient if it properly charges an offense in the language of the statute defining the offense charged and if a person of common understanding would know what was charged. Here, the amended information failed to adequately put Hardaway on notice of the nature or character of the offense that he was accused of intending to commit. Numerous offenses of a sexual nature are defined in Montana law, but the purported offense of sexual crime is not, nor did the information provide any factual allegations to indicate which of the potential offenses of a sexual nature Hardaway was accused of intending to commit, so he had no way of determining which of the potential offenses, if any, was being charged. St. v. Hardaway, 2001 MT 252, 307 M 139, 36 P3d 900 (2001). See also St. v. Steffes, 269 M 214, 887 P2d 1196 (1994).

Tolling of Statute for Certain Offenses Against Minors — Evidence Supporting Date of Offense and Retroactive Application: An act that enacted a statute providing that certain prosecutions may be commenced within 5 years after the victim reaches the age of 18 if the victim was less than 18 years of age at the time of the offense also provided that the act applies retroactively to offenses committed before the effective date of the act and for which the statute of limitations has not expired on the effective date of the act. Therefore, since the statute of limitations for the offenses referred to is 5 years and since the law took effect on March 24, 1989, an offense occurring between March 24, 1984, and March 24, 1989, could be prosecuted. The victim in this case contacted the County Attorney in April of 1992, when she was 19, and charges were filed in December of 1993. Testimony at trial for sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault showed that the victim was in the 5th grade in March of 1984 and that she testified that the offenses occurred while she was in the 7th and 8th grades, but she could not fix the dates with particularity. There was no evidence that the offenses occurred prior to March of 1984. The District Court did not err in refusing to dismiss the charges on the basis of the victim's vague references to the dates of their occurrence and an alleged violation of the statute of limitations. St. v. Mason, 283 M 149, 941 P2d 437, 54 St. Rep. 539 (1997).

Sufficiency of Information Charging Deviate Sexual Conduct Without Defining Specific Terms — Definitions as Legal Term of Art: Defendant contended that the information charging him with deviate sexual conduct was insufficient because the information did not specify that the sexual contact was for the purpose of gratifying the sexual desire of either party, thereby failing to inform him of all of the essential elements of the crime. Defendant cited Russell v. U.S., 369 US 749, 8 L Ed 2d 240, 82 S Ct 1038 (1962), for the holding that the words of a statute may not be sufficient in a charging document if the words themselves do not fully, directly, and expressly, without any uncertainty or ambiguity, set forth all of the elements necessary to constitute the offense intended to be punished. The Supreme Court instead relied on Hamling v. U.S., 418 US 87, 41 L Ed 2d 590, 94 S Ct 2887 (1974), in distinguishing between cases in which the offense charged depends upon a specific identification of fact and instances when the definition of the offense is not one of fact, but one of law. In the instant case, the information did not have to allege that the sexual contact was for the purpose of gratifying the sexual desire of either party because both "sexual contact" and "deviate sexual conduct" are legal terms of art defined elsewhere in the criminal code. Thus, the amended information citing the name of the offense, the statute alleged to have been violated, and the time and place of each offense was sufficient to apprise defendant of the charges against him. St. v. Steffes, 269 M 214, 887 P2d 1196, 51 St. Rep. 1463 (1994).

Theory of Accountability Not Required by Due Process to Be Set Forth in Information: Tower was arrested for sale of a dangerous drug. Over Tower's objection at trial, the jury was instructed on the issue of accountability under 45-2-301 and 45-2-302. Tower contended that as a matter of due process of law, he must have been given additional notice that he was going to be charged with the crime by a theory of accountability. Tower also claimed that he was surprised by the jury instruction on accountability given at trial. The Supreme Court reviewed the development of the law of accountability and the requirements applicable to charging documents. The Supreme Court also reviewed the trial record and determined that Tower had every reason to anticipate an accountability theory. Because accountability is not a separate offense, the Supreme Court held that due process did not require the state to set forth the theory in the information. St. v. Tower, 267 M 63, 881 P2d 1317, 51 St. Rep. 946 (1994), followed in St. v. Abe, 1998 MT 206, 290 M 393, 965 P2d 882, 55 St. Rep. 876 (1998).

Lack of Specificity of Date for Charges of Intercourse Without Consent and Sexual Assault: Little was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault on two minors. Before trial, Little argued that the information was insufficient because it alleged that the offenses had occurred "on or about 1990" and therefore deprived him of raising a meaningful alibi defense. Citing St. v. D.B.S., 216 M 234, 700 P2d 630 (1985), and St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230 (1988), the Supreme Court held that even if a continuing course of conduct is not alleged and an alibi defense is raised, time is not a material ingredient to the crime of sexual intercourse without consent or sexual assault. Moreover, the statements taken from the victims evidence that Little repeatedly subjected the children to sexual acts. To hold children to a standard that requires them to recall a specific time when children are less likely to distinguish dates and times with specificity would leave the defendant virtually immune from prosecution. St. v. Little, 861 M 154, 260 P2d 460, 50 St. Rep. 1124 (1993).

Substantial Evidence to Show Common Scheme Bad Check Writing: Defendant was convicted of issuing bad checks, common scheme, a felony, after issuing or delivering a total of nine checks to various businesses and individuals over the course of a year, knowing the checks would not be paid by his bank. The court found there was sufficient evidence to support conviction as there was substantial evidence of defendant's wrongdoing. St. v. Fleming, 225 M 48, 730 P2d 1178, 44 St. Rep. 31 (1987).

Evidence That Offense Occurred a Few Months After Charge Alleged It Did: Evidence, in trial for sexually assaulting a 10- and an 11-year old girl, that the offenses took place in the spring of 1984 was not error when complaint alleged the offenses occurred in the summer of 1984, nor did introduction of that evidence constitute prosecutorial misconduct. Section 46-11-401 does not require an allegation of the exact time, date, month, or even year of the charged offense. St. v. Cornell, 220 M 433, 715 P2d 446, 43 St. Rep. 505 (1986). See also St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230, 45 St. Rep. 1617 (1988).

Harmless Error in Information — Charge Sufficient: Instead of citing 45-9-102(4), the information cited 45-9-102(3). The court rejected appellant's contention that the state failed to prove all elements as charged. In this case, the information properly charged the offense of possession of cocaine in the language of the statute proscribing such possession. The information clearly put the defendant on notice that he was being charged with possession of cocaine. The fact that the information contained the wrong penalty provision did not prejudice defendant or in any way impair his ability to prepare a defense. The information contained harmless error and was therefore sufficient. St. v. Pearson, 217 M 363, 704 P2d 1056, 42 St. Rep. 1253 (1985), followed in St. v. Brogan, 261 M 79, 862 P2d 19, 50 St. Rep. 1204 (1993).

Reasonably Specific Date in Information — No Double Jeopardy: Information charging incest indicated a 10-month period during which the crime was committed. The court found the information sufficiently specific since victim resided with defendant father during entire period and defendant could not establish deprivation of alibi defense. The court applied the test set forth in St. v. Clark, 209 M 473, 682 P2d 1339, 41 St. Rep. 833 (1984), and held that the two-part test was satisfied. Defendant contended that the broad time frame alleged in the information subjected him to double jeopardy. The court rejected the argument, noting that the State is barred by Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const., from retrying defendant for the offense to this particular victim during the time in question. St. v. D.B.S., 216 M 234, 700 P2d 630, 42 St. Rep. 770 (1985). See also St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230, 45 St. Rep. 1617 (1988).

Requirements of Time and Place in Charged Offense — Definiteness:
Because defendant knew from the information with what crime he had been charged, an information which stated the place of the alleged sexual intercourse without consent, but not the time of the crime, was sufficient under this section. St. v. Sanderson, 214 M 437, 692 P2d 479, 42 St. Rep. 94 (1985).

Defendant was reunited with his wife and three stepchildren in April 1981. During a family argument in July, defendant's 12-year-old stepdaughter alleged he had raped her. Defendant battered the child and her mother. Defendant was arraigned in December on an information charging him with eight counts of sexual intercourse without consent. The information specified the days on which the rapes occurred. Defendant pleaded not guilty and on March 9, 1982, noticed an alibi defense. On April 9, 1982, the State noticed its intent to amend the information to allege the time of the rapes less precisely. Defendant objected, but the trial judge permitted the amended information to be filed. Defendant was found guilty on all counts and appealed. Defendant contended that while time is generally not a material element to the crime charged, the substituting of periods of time for specific dates precluded his use of his alibi defense. The Supreme Court stated that both informations set forth facts alleging a series of rapes by the stepfather upon the child. Where a continuing course of such conduct is alleged, further specificity is not required. Children are less likely to distinguish times and dates with specificity. Defendant's notice of intent to rely on alibi did not change the nature of the crime charged or incorporate time as a necessary element of the State's proof. The amended information stated the time and place of the charged offenses as definitely as could be done under the circumstances of the case. St. v. Clark, 209 M 473, 682 P2d 1339, 41 St. Rep. 833 (1984), followed in St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230, 45 St. Rep. 1617 (1988).

Motion to File Information — Sufficiency of Affidavit — Scope of Appellate Review: An affidavit in support of a motion to file an information need not make out a prima facie case that a defendant committed an offense; a mere probability that the defendant committed the offense is sufficient. Similarly, evidence to establish probable cause need not be as complete as the evidence necessary to establish guilt. The scope of appellate review of a District Court's ruling on a motion to file an information is limited to whether or not the District Court abused its discretion. St. v. Bradford, 210 M 130, 683 P2d 924, 41 St. Rep. 962 (1984), followed in St. v. Arrington, 260 M 1, 858 P2d 343, 50 St. Rep. 905 (1993).

Sufficiency of Information: Hankins was charged with the felony offense of trafficking in the unlawfully obtained body parts of a protected species. The information stated the offense essentially in the terms of the statute, with additional allegations of time and place. Montana follows the general rule that an information is sufficient if it properly charges an offense in the language of the statute describing the offense. An information need only be sufficient to apprise the accused of the crime charged; it need not be perfect. The information need not inform the accused of the potential punishments for the offense. St. v. Hankins, 209 M 365, 680 P2d 958, 41 St. Rep. 762 (1984).

Defendant Properly Apprised of Charge: Defendant ordered 37 television sets and one big-screen television in April 1981 on behalf of his employer. The invoice overstated the cost of the 37 television sets and did not reflect the cost of the big-screen set except in the inflated value of the 37 television sets. In August 1981, the defendant exerted unauthorized control over the big-screen television. The information must contain the time and place of the offense, and the information charging the defendant stated August 1981 as the date of the theft. The purpose of the requirement is to apprise the defendant of the charges brought against him so as to prevent surprise. The defendant was properly apprised in this case. St. v. Holmes, 207 M 176, 674 P2d 1071, 40 St. Rep. 1973 (1983).

Additional Sentence for Burglary Committed With a Weapon — Not in Charge: Defendant was convicted of the crime of aggravated burglary with a weapon, and the charging document, while omitting any mention of additional sentencing under 46-18-221, did mention that he was armed with a knife and was sentenced under 46-18-221 for an additional 5 years for the use of the knife. The defendant was not sentenced for a crime with which he was not charged because 46-18-221 does not create a separate substantive offense but enhances the penalty for an underlying offense. St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980).

Motion to Strike Information for Lack of Specificity: In prosecution for attempted deliberate homicide, the court did not err in denying defendant's motion to strike the information for lack of specificity of the applicable statutes. The motion was properly denied in that it was not made before the defendant's plea was entered, and the information was sufficiently clear even though it cited only the attempt statute, as it contained an allegation that the defendant attempted deliberate homicide. St. v. Kirkland, 184 M 229, 602 P2d 586 (1979).

Information Found Sufficient: The information filed in this case was sufficient since each count followed the language of the statutes for deliberate homicide, aggravated kidnapping, and sexual intercourse without consent. The State's attempt to amend the information did not aid the defendant in claiming the information was not sufficient. St. v. Coleman, 177 M 1, 579 P2d 732 (1978).

Possession of Explosives: When the State charged that on a certain day at a certain time the defendant had possession of explosives with intent that the same be used for the destruction of named persons and property, clearly the facts constituting the offense were stated so that a person of common understanding would know what was intended. St. v. McBenge, 175 M 362, 574 P2d 260 (1978).

Motion to Suppress Denied — Complaint Not Defective: When a complaint was issued in one county but the offense committed in another, it was not defective since the purpose of the complaint was not to charge the offense but to establish the basis for an arrest warrant. St. v. Benbo, 174 M 252, 570 P2d 894 (1977).

Murder:

The definitions of deliberate homicide and criminal accountability contemplate a more active role than was involved here before one can be charged as a principal or accessory to murder. State ex rel. Murphy v. McKinnon, 171 M 120, 556 P2d 906 (1976).

When two defendants, tried separately, had entered into a conspiracy to commit robbery of an officer in the perpetration of which the latter was killed by one of them, the information against the other charging a premeditated killing need not set forth the facts constituting the crime of robbery or allege that in the attempt to commit the latter crime the homicide was committed. St. v. Bolton, 65 M 74, 212 P 504 (1922).

An information charging murder in the first degree, otherwise sufficient, was not rendered insufficient by the absence of the words "a felony" after the words "murder in the first degree". St. v. Vuckovich, 61 M 480, 203 P 491 (1921).

Allegations sufficient for a common-law indictment for murder are sufficient for an information under the code. St. v. Hayes, 38 M 219, 99 P 434 (1909).

If a person of common understanding would, from the reading of an information, know that the defendant in a given case was charged with murder in the first degree, the defendant will be presumed to have had a like knowledge and be held not to have been prejudiced by the use of peculiar phraseology in it. St. v. McGowan, 36 M 422, 93 P 552 (1908).

An information for murder should directly allege that death resulted from the mortal wounds inflicted by the defendant. St. v. Keerl, 29 M 508, 75 P 362 (1904).

Time of Offense:

It is proper to charge that an offense took place "on or about" a date when the offense may have occurred within a span of 3 days and the precise time of the offense is not known. St. v. Hall, 171 M 33, 554 P2d 755 (1976).

An allegation in an information that the offense was committed "on or about" a certain date of a given year was held sufficient. St. v. Heaston, 109 M 303, 97 P2d 330 (1939).

The defendant was not prejudiced by the variance between the alleged date of commission and the date proved. St. v. Sorenson, 65 M 65, 210 P 752 (1922).

If a crime is charged as having been committed on one date while the evidence shows that it was done at another time but within the Statute of Limitations, the prosecution does not fail but there is a variance which may be material enough to justify a continuance. St. v. Gaimos, 53 M 118, 162 P 596 (1916).

In a prosecution for homicide it is sufficient if it appears that it was committed prior to the filing of the information. St. v. Vanella, 40 M 326, 106 P 364 (1910).

Unless time is a material ingredient in the offense or in charging the same, it is only necessary to prove that it was committed prior to the finding or filing of the information or indictment. St. v. Rogers, 31 M 1, 77 P 293 (1904).

An indictment that charges the commission of the offense "on or about" a certain day sufficiently states the time. St. v. Thompson, 10 M 549, 27 P 349 (1891).

Drug Offenses:

The information charging a drug offense was insufficient because it contained neither the identity of the informer nor specific facts concerning the offense and did not identify the time and place to protect the accused from double jeopardy. State ex rel. Offerdahl v. District Court, 156 M 432, 481 P2d 338 (1971).

The information charging the defendant with the sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs) was sufficient even though it failed to conform with specific requirements of this section, since the defendant was apprised of the charges against him. St. v. Dunn, 155 M 319, 472 P2d 288 (1970).

Same Transaction — Later Charge Not Particularized: An information that did not particularize the charge against the defendant was not fatally defective since prosecution for the same transaction that resulted in the earlier conviction is expressly barred. St. v. Dunn, 155 M 319, 472 P2d 288 (1970).

Attempting to Influence Jurors: A consolidated information that charged the defendant with attempting to influence two named jurors in a named action was sufficient. St. v. Bogue, 142 M 459, 384 P2d 749 (1963).

Test of Sufficiency of Information:

The test of the sufficiency of an information is whether the defendant is apprised of the charges brought against him and whether he will be surprised. St. v. Bogue, 142 M 459, 384 P2d 749 (1963), overruling St. v. Hale, 129 M 449, 291 P2d 229 (1955); St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986).

The test of the sufficiency of an information is whether a person of common understanding would know what is intended to be charged. St. v. Board, 135 M 139, 337 P2d 924 (1959), followed in St. v. Brogan, 261 M 79, 862 P2d 19, 50 St. Rep. 1204 (1993); St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986); St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Lewd and Lascivious Act on Child: An information charging the commission of a lewd and lascivious act on a child was sufficient although it did not allege the age of the defendant. St. v. Davis, 141 M 197, 376 P2d 727 (1962).

Obtaining Money Under False Pretenses: The information must expressly allege the facts which made the stated pretense false in a prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses. St. v. Hale, 129 M 449, 291 P2d 229 (1955), distinguished in St. v. Fairburn, 135 M 449, 340 P2d 157 (1959), overruled on other grounds in St. v. Bogue, 142 M 459, 384 P2d 749 (1963).

Language of Statute: Ordinarily, an information charging a public offense in the language of the statute is sufficient; if considered insufficient as to details and facts, the remedy of the defendant was formerly a request for a bill of particulars. St. v. Hahn, 105 M 270, 72 P2d 459 (1937).

Attempted Rape: An information charging the defendant with attempted rape was held sufficient against the objection that no overt act was charged and intent was insufficiently alleged. St. v. Stevens, 104 M 189, 65 P2d 612 (1937), overruled on other grounds in St. v. Bosch, 125 M 566, 242 P2d 977 (1952).

Perjury: If an information for perjury sets forth the substance of the matter in respect to which the offense was committed, in what court and before whom the oath alleged to have been false was taken, and that the court or the person before whom it was taken had authority to administer it, with proper allegations of the falsity of the matter on which perjury is assigned, it is sufficient. St. v. Jackson, 88 M 420, 293 P 309 (1930).

Liquor Laws:

The information in a prosecution charging sale of intoxicating liquor to a minor need not specify the particular kind of liquor. St. v. Baker, 87 M 295, 286 P 1113 (1930).

When the proof showed the sale of a liquor different from that described in the information, there was a variance which was not fatal. St. v. Sedlacek, 74 M 201, 239 P 1002 (1925).

An information charging the defendant with having permitted a female to be or remain in his saloon for the purpose of being there supplied with liquor, which alleged that the defendant was "then and there" the owner and manager having charge and control, was sufficient to apprise him that he was accused of being in control. St. v. Conway, 38 M 42, 98 P 654 (1908).

Theft: An information charging defendant with stealing "five Ford wire wheels and tires" was sufficient to advise him that five wire wheels and tires for a Ford automobile were the articles charged to have been stolen. St. v. Dimond, 82 M 110, 265 P 5 (1928).

Illegal Transportation of Liquor: Neither the time of day, the means of conveyance, the particular brand of liquor transported, nor the termini of the route over which it is carried are made constituent elements of the completed offense of illegal transportation, and therefore an information charging that crime is sufficient without allegations to that effect. St. v. Dow, 71 M 291, 229 P 402 (1924).

Sedition: An information charging sedition was defective for failure to set out the specific words characterized as disloyal, contemptuous, etc. St. v. Wolf, 56 M 493, 185 P 556 (1919). See also St. v. McGlynn, 60 M 416, 199 P 708 (1921); St. v. Smith, 58 M 567, 194 P 131 (1920); St. v. Wyman, 56 M 600, 186 P 1 (1919).

Technical Defect: Under former law an information need not contain a specific allegation that the prosecution is conducted in the name and by the authority of the State, as required by the Montana Constitution, when it appears from the record that it is so conducted, is in the proper form, and is otherwise sufficient. St. v. Barry, 45 M 582, 124 P 774 (1912).

Language Defects:

Stating facts charging a crime in the form of participial clauses does not render an information abortive. However, the proper way to make the charge is by direct allegation. St. v. Pemberton, 39 M 530, 104 P 556 (1909).

An information is not objectionable on the ground that it does not contain a statement of facts constituting the offense in ordinary and concise language or that it is not direct and certain in its statements. St. v. Phillips, 36 M 112, 92 P 299 (1907).

Forgery: An information charging forgery of a promissory note, although containing superfluous averments, was not fatally defective. St. v. Mitten, 36 M 376, 92 P 969 (1907).

False Pretenses: An information charging an attempt to obtain money by false pretenses, though defective in form and containing immaterial averments, is sufficient to sustain a conviction when it is apparent that the defendant has suffered no prejudice. St. v. Phillips, 36 M 112, 92 P 299 (1907).

Name of County: When, in an information for murder, the only mention of the county in which the crime was committed appeared in the caption describing the court and there was no expression such as "in the county aforesaid" or "said county", thus referring to the caption, the information did not allege the county in which the offense had been committed and was fatally defective. St. v. Beesskove, 34 M 41, 85 P 376 (1906).

Time and Place Essential: Time and place are essential elements and must be so alleged as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended by the charge. St. v. Beesskove, 34 M 41, 85 P 376 (1906).

Use of Aliases: The use of aliases in an information is sufficient. St. v. Howard, 30 M 518, 77 P 50 (1904).

LISTING WITNESSES

Failure to List Prosecution Witness — Actual Knowledge of Witness — Failure to Object to Court's Remedy: Hayworth, who was charged with attempted deliberate homicide, objected during the trial to the fact that he had not received formal, written notice of the calling of a prosecution witness. The prosecution had, however, given Hayworth's attorney oral notice of the calling of the witness, and when the District Court suggested that the witness be called later so that Hayworth could interview the witness, Hayworth's counsel did not object and did interview the witness. The Supreme Court held that under these circumstances, Hayworth was not prejudiced by the lack of formal, written notice and that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the prosecution witness to testify. St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998).

Negligent Suppression of Evidence — Harmless Error: In an appeal involving the negligent suppression of evidence, the court agreed with appellant that the state acted improperly in suppressing four taped witness statements during discovery and a possibly incriminating statement made by appellant during his arrest and in endorsing an additional witness on the first day of trial. However, the court found that the suppressed evidence was either repetitive of other testimony or minimally supportive of a self-defense theory, and that since the defense knew of the additional witness' connection with and importance in the case, it could not convincingly claim surprise at the endorsement. Therefore, all errors were held to be harmless and not grounds for reversal. St. v. Wallace, 223 M 454, 727 P2d 520, 43 St. Rep. 1908 (1986), followed, with regard to application of harmless error rule to admissibility of hearsay testimony, in St. v. Alexander, 265 M 192, 875 P2d 345, 51 St. Rep. 474 (1994).

Prosecution Witness Endorsed on Day of Trial — Failure to Request Continuance: Under the circumstances, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the prosecution to endorse a psychological counselor, an assistant to the doctor treating the victim, as a witness on the day of the trial. The counselor was previously interviewed by the defense, and the doctor had long been identified as a prosecution witness. The defense did not petition for a continuance, which should have been done if it was believed the endorsement left the defense inadequately prepared. St. v. Liddell, 211 M 180, 685 P2d 918, 41 St. Rep. 1293 (1984).

Witness List Amended — Continuance Denied: The trial court properly denied a defense motion for a continuance after permitting the State to amend its witness list on the morning of trial since the State informed the defendant's counsel of a change in the information within hours after the new witness negotiated a plea involving an agreement to testify. The defense counsel knew of the development on Friday but chose to keep other commitments, thus he was estopped from claiming surprise. St. v. McClean, 179 M 178, 587 P2d 20 (1978).

Endorsement of Additional Witness on First Day of Trial: The defendant was not prejudiced when, on the first day of the trial, the District Court endorsed two more witnesses for the prosecution because the defendant's counsel and the County Attorney had already discussed the endorsement, the two names were set out in the information as victims, the County Attorney showed good cause for failing to list the names specifically as witnesses prior to the trial, and the defendant's counsel could have asked for a postponement or a continuance. St. v. Booke, 178 M 225, 583 P2d 405 (1978).

Addition of Witnesses:

The lower court did not err in allowing the addition of the names of 58 new witnesses to the amended information on the day of trial when the defendant failed to ask for a continuance, the witnesses were not prejudicial to defendant, and the court was careful to provide the defendant with protection against surprise and to ensure that the defendant was able to prepare for the testimony. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

When the State moved 6 days before trial to list additional witnesses, alleging they were discovered after the original information was filed and were necessary to prove its case in light of the defendant's affirmative defense of mental disease or defect, good cause was shown and the motion should have been granted. State ex rel. Nelson v. District Court, 173 M 221, 566 P2d 1382 (1977).

Allowing the amendment of the witness list requested because of evidentiary matters developed during presentation of the State's case was not an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge when the court offered the accused a continuance and there was no objection to the witnesses based on surprise by the defendant. St. v. Klein, 169 M 350, 547 P2d 75 (1976).

When the defendant's attorney knew of a witness against the defendant but failed to discover the nature and extent of his potential testimony, assuming he would not be discovered, it was not reversible error to permit the witness's name to be endorsed on the information the day of the trial to permit the witness to testify. St. v. Cooper, 146 M 336, 406 P2d 691 (1965).

Failure to List Upon Request: When the State failed to list witnesses on an information and continually failed to provide a list of witnesses even after a request by the defendant to do so and a promise by the Deputy County Attorney to the District Court that he would do so, the State did not make a sufficient showing of "good cause" to add witnesses on the day of trial. Therefore, the defendant had no burden to move for a continuance of the trial date. St. v. Haag, 176 M 395, 578 P2d 740 (1978).

Addition of Expert Witness in Midtrial: The District Court did not err in permitting the endorsement of an x-ray by a radiologist as a witness added in midtrial by the prosecution when the defense counsel knew of the existence of the x-ray prior to trial and nothing indicated an intentional or deliberate withholding of evidence by the State or lack of good cause. St. v. Gafford, 172 M 380, 563 P2d 1129 (1977).

Amendment of Witness List — Remedy When Surprise Claimed: The proper procedure when surprise is claimed from the addition of witnesses is to ask for a continuance so that the defendant may prepare. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

Reasonable Anticipation of Unlisted Witness Negating Prejudice: The failure of the prosecutor to endorse on the information the State Chemist as a witness to identify marijuana was not prejudicial to the defendant constituting surprise because the defense counsel could reasonably anticipate such testimony. He had ample opportunity to rebut the evidence as he had been given a sample of the substance and had arranged for two experts to support his challenge to the prosecutor's identification of the substance. St. v. Paulson, 167 M 310, 538 P2d 339 (1975).

Adding Witnesses — Harmless Error: The defendant was not prejudiced by the prosecution's citation, when adding witnesses, of section 94-8904, R.C.M. 1947, which had been repealed and replaced by 46-15-301 (and which was itself, in 1985, repealed and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329), since that section is a continuation of section 94-8904, R.C.M. 1947. St. v. Rozzell, 157 M 443, 486 P2d 877 (1971).

Attorney General's Opinions

Charging of Minor for Traffic Offense — Citation of Underlying Charge: An officer who sees a minor commit a traffic offense should issue the minor a ticket charging him with unlawful operation of a motor vehicle under 61-12-601 (repealed, sec. 5, Ch. 484, L. 1987). In stating the facts of the offense, the officer should also describe the underlying traffic offense and cite the statute that sets forth the underlying offense. 41 A.G. Op. 87 (1986).

Concurrent Jurisdiction Over Certain Misdemeanors: Misdemeanor prosecutions which are within the concurrent jurisdictions of both a City Court and a Justice's Court may at the election of the prosecuting officer be brought in either court. Prosecution of such offenses must be instituted in the name of the state. 37 A.G. Op. 42 (1977).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute combines elements of the 1987 code and the federal rule and is intended to control the inclusion of more than one offense in a single charging document. The statute should not effect any significant changes in established procedure.

Subsection (1) is chiefly an adoption of Rule 8(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The language of the clearly phrased federal rule was preferred because it referred to charges arising from a common-scheme offense. The federal rule, as adopted, was amended by adding the phrase "or different statements of the same offense" and was amended to recognize that counts may be charged separately or alternatively. These amendments were made so that the statute more closely reflects federal law. The statute recognizes that allegations shared by several counts may be incorporated by reference.

Subsection (2) reflects the second sentence of 1987 MCA 46-11-404(1). The statute preserves the authority of the court to consolidate separate charges.

Subsection (3) preserves the final two sentences of 1987 MCA 46-11-404(1). The prosecutor need not choose between any of the several charges filed. The reference in the statute to 46-11-410 recognizes the limitation that a defendant may not be found guilty of multiple offenses in some instances.

Subsection (4) preserves 1987 MCA 46-11-404(3). The code mirrors the provisions of the federal rule. Compare 1987 MCA 46-11-404(3) and Rule 8(b), Fed. R. Crim. P.

The section is basically the same as existing law except [46-11-404(3)] broadens the present law by providing for the charging of two or more defendants in the same indictment or information.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: Substituted first sentence of (1) concerning charging of two or more offenses of similar character or based on same transaction or part of a common scheme for former sentence that read: "An indictment, information, or complaint may charge two or more different offenses connected together in their commission, different statements of the same offense, or two or more different offenses of the same class under separate counts"; in (3), in first sentence after "offenses", substituted "set forth in the charging document" for "or counts set forth in the indictment, information, or complaint" and at end inserted exception clause; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) The court in which the case is triable, in the interests of justice and for good cause shown, may, in its discretion, order that the different offenses or counts set forth in the indictment, information, or complaint be tried separately or divided into two or more groups and each of the groups tried separately. An acquittal of one or more counts shall not be considered an acquittal of any other count"; in (3), in first sentence after "information", inserted "or complaint" and after "same" deleted "series of acts or"; deleted former (4) that read: "(4) If it appears that a defendant or the state is prejudiced by a joinder of related prosecutions or defendants in a single charge or by joinder of separate charges or defendants for trial, the court may order separate trials, grant a severance of defendants, or provide any other relief as justice may require"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

No Error in Trial Court's Failure to Sever Counts of Sexual Assault and Sexual Abuse of Children — Defendant's Failure to Show Prejudice: Prior to trial, Yecovenko moved to sever charges of sexual abuse of his stepdaughters from charges of sexual abuse of children related to Yecovenko's downloading of child pornography from the Internet, asserting that prejudice would result, but failing to assert the type of prejudice that would occur if the charges were not severed, as required by St. v. Freshment, 2002 MT 61, 309 M 154, 43 P3d 968 (2002). Because Yecovenko failed in District Court to satisfy the threshold requirement of alleging the nature or type of prejudice that would occur, the Supreme Court declined to consider Yecovenko's prejudice arguments on appeal, and denial of the motion to sever was affirmed. St. v. Yecovenko, 2004 MT 196, 322 M 247, 95 P3d 145 (2004).

Actual Innocence Standard Applied to Postconviction Claim Based on Incomplete DNA Results at Trial — Burden of Postconviction Statute of Limitations Met: Pope's petition for postconviction relief was denied by the District Court as barred by the 5-year statute of limitations in the 1993 version of 46-21-102 (now 1 year) and because the issues were not raised on direct appeal. The court concluded that the jurisdictional bar could be overcome only by a clear miscarriage of justice and that the exception did not apply unless Pope did not commit the offense. The court relied on an inadmissible confession that Pope committed the crime, reasoning that even if the confession was not admissible at trial, it could be considered in a postconviction proceeding because it refuted Pope's claim of innocence. Pope contended that the exception applied because newly available DNA evidence tended to show that he did not commit the crime. The Supreme Court reversed. Based on Murray v. Carrier, 477 US 478 (1986), a petitioner must demonstrate that a constitutional violation at trial has probably resulted in conviction of an individual who is actually innocent and the claim must be supported by new evidence that indicates that the individual is innocent. Montana case law provides that the miscarriage of justice must be so obvious that the judgment is rendered a complete nullity and that the exception does not apply unless the defendant did not commit the crime from which relief is sought. Further, under Schlup v. Delo, 513 US 298 (1995), actual innocence requires that no reasonable, properly instructed juror would have found the defendant guilty. Schlup also allows review only of the record and new evidence to determine what a reasonable juror would find, so the District Court improperly relied on the failed plea confession to determine that Pope was not actually innocent. Pope correctly pointed out that the use of "and/or" language in the jury instructions made it impossible to determine whether Pope was convicted of raping one or two women. Thus, Pope satisfied the Schlup actual innocence burden in light of the complete DNA report, and when coupled with the error of using "and/or" language in the alternative charge, the jury instructions, and the verdict, waiver of the time bar in 46-21-102 was required by the clear miscarriage of justice, warranting reversal. St. v. Pope, 2003 MT 330, 318 M 383, 80 P3d 1232 (2003).

Original Misdemeanor Charges Dismissed and Refiled With Felony Charge — Joinder of Charges Establishing New Case: Following an automobile accident, Topp was charged in Justice's Court with two misdemeanors to which he pleaded not guilty. The charges were subsequently dismissed, and the state filed a new information in District Court recharging Topp with the misdemeanors plus felony criminal endangerment. Topp argued that the misdemeanor charges should be dismissed because they were not prosecuted within 6 months, as required by 46-13-401. The Supreme Court held that 46-13-401 did not apply in this case. When the original misdemeanor charges were dismissed, there were no longer charges pending against Topp, so there was no requirement for prosecution. As set out in St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), as long as Justice's Court jurisdiction is exhausted within 6 months by some action that authorizes appeal de novo to the District Court, 46-13-401 is satisfied. Thus, when the charges were joined in District Court, the action became a case de novo, so the District Court did not err in denying Topp's motion to dismiss the misdemeanor charges on speedy trial grounds. St. v. Topp, 2003 MT 209, 317 M 59, 75 P3d 330 (2003).

Similarities in Character of Two Counts of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent Sufficient to Warrant Joinder of Charges: Freshment moved to sever two counts of sexual intercourse without consent into separate trials because the counts were not similar, involving separate victims on separate occasions. The motion was denied, and Freshment appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. The counts satisfied most of the factors for the similarity in character test set out in St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3 (1999), so joinder was proper. Both counts involved inebriated 15-year-olds; both victims were initially introduced to Freshment through mutual friends; both alleged crimes occurred within 2 days; both crimes occurred in Billings; and in both instances, Freshment was alleged to know the ages of the victims. St. v. Freshment, 2002 MT 61, 309 M 154, 43 P3d 968 (2002).

Standard of Review for Severance of Counts: A criminal defendant seeking to sever counts into separate trials has the burden of proving that severing the counts is necessary to prevent unfair prejudice. It is not enough to prove that some prejudice will result from a joint trial or that a better chance of acquittal would be realized from separate trials; rather, defendant has the burden to prove that prejudice will prevent a fair trial. As enumerated in St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3 (1999), there are three types of prejudice that defendant may prove that must be considered by a trial court: (1) the accumulation of evidence may be such that a jury would find defendant to be a bad person and wish to convict defendant of something; (2) a jury might use evidence of guilt on one count to convict on another count, even though that evidence would be inadmissible at a separate trial on the latter count; and (3) defendant may suffer prejudice by wanting to testify on one count but not another. If the District Court fails to properly weight these types of prejudice against the judicial economy resulting from a new trial, an abuse of discretion occurs. In this case, Freshment conceded the third factor and failed to meet his burden to show prejudice under the other two factors, so although the case was reversed on other grounds, no abuse of discretion was ascribed to the denial of Freshment's motion to sever. St. v. Freshment, 2002 MT 61, 309 M 154, 43 P3d 968 (2002), followed in St. v. Yecovenko, 2004 MT 196, 322 M 247, 95 P3d 145 (2004), and St. v. Holt, 2006 MT 151, 332 M 426, 139 P3d 819 (2006).

Criminal Counts Part of Same Transaction Not Subject to Further Prosecution: In arguing that defendant's conduct attributable to Munchausen Syndrome by Proxy (MSBP) was part of the same transaction that led to joinder of offenses of similar character under this section, the state could not adopt a contrary position and argue that the counts were not part of the same transaction for purposes of further prosecution under 46-11-503. Although this section does allow joinder of offenses of the same or similar character as well as those arising out of the same transaction, the distinction was irrelevant in this case because the state's theory was always that defendant's conduct attributable to MSBP was part of the same transaction. The Supreme Court held that MSBP is a criminal objective—namely, seeking of attention through harming one's children—so defendant's actions toward two children came within the same transaction; thus, further prosecution for one child's death was barred by a former prosecution that resulted in a conviction for criminal endangerment of another child. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000). See also St. v. Waldrup, 264 M 456, 872 P2d 772 (1994).

Proper Denial of Motion to Sever Counts for Separate Trials — Balancing Process — Similarity of Counts and Applicability of Proof: Hocevar was charged with attempted deliberate homicide, two counts of deliberate homicide, criminal endangerment, and assault in connection with the deaths of her two sons. The District Court denied her pretrial motion to sever the two counts associated with the death of one son from the three counts associated with the death of her other son, finding instead that joinder was proper because the counts were similar in nature and much of the proof, which included many out-of-state professional witnesses, would apply to all counts. Hocevar appealed on grounds that the counts should have been severed and separate trials held. In determining whether to grant a motion to sever, the trial court must balance the possibility of prejudice to defendant against the judicial economy that results from a joint trial and the burden is on defendant to show that prejudice was so great as to prevent a fair trial (see St. v. Richards, 274 M 180, 906 P2d 222 (1995)). The Supreme Court, citing St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3 (1999), noted that joinder is proper in cases in which the charges are logically linked by motive and when overlapping proof must be offered. In this case, the state alleged that the deaths of both children were linked by motive through Hocevar's affliction with Munchausen Syndrome by Proxy, which is a pattern of behavior wherein a caretaker, usually a mother, fabricates or causes illness in another, usually a preverbal child, to gain attention. Thus, proof regarding all the charges overlapped, and joinder of the charges was proper. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Joinder of Criminal Counts of Similar Character — Factors in Determining Similarity of Crimes: Southern was charged with two counts of kidnapping, one count of burglary, one count of theft, and five counts of sexual intercourse without consent. Southern moved to sever the nine counts in the information into four separate trials, pursuant to 46-13-211, based on there being four different victims. Southern claimed a lack of similarity of the alleged crimes. The motion to sever was denied, and Southern was convicted on all nine counts and subsequently appealed. Although not determinative, some factors that are relevant to whether charges in an information are of the same or similar character include whether: (1) the charges are brought under the same statute; (2) the charges involve similar victims, locations, or modus operandi; (3) the conduct charged occurred in a narrow timeframe; and (4) the conduct charged occurred in a limited geographical area. Southern sought to differentiate the crimes by pointing out that the rapes occurred at different times of day, that some involved use of a knife while others did not, and that not all the rapes took place in the victims' homes. The Supreme Court held that despite these differences, the five counts of sexual intercourse without consent were properly joined because the crimes were of sufficiently similar character, being charged under the same statute. Counts may also be joined if the offenses constitute parts of a common scheme or plan. Thus, the kidnapping, burglary, and theft counts were also properly joined because, by definition, they were part of a common scheme linked by motive and because one charge precipitated the second charge, so overlapping proof would have been required regarding those counts and the accompanying counts of sexual intercourse without consent. St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3, 56 St. Rep. 395 (1999), following St. v. Richards, 274 M 180, 906 P2d 222, 52 St. Rep. 1176 (1995).

Joinder of Criminal Counts of Similar Character — No Prejudice: Southern was charged with two counts of kidnapping, one count of burglary, one count of theft, and five counts of sexual intercourse without consent. Southern moved to sever the nine counts in the information into four separate trials, pursuant to 46-13-211, based on there being four different victims. Southern asserted that joinder of the counts under this section would result in unfair prejudice. However, it is not sufficient for a criminal defendant to prove that the defendant will face some prejudice as a result of a joint trial or that the defendant stands a better chance of acquittal in separate trials; rather, the defendant must prove that prejudice is so great as to prevent a fair trial. Applying the three basic kinds of prejudice outlined in St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), the Supreme Court found no unfair prejudice and affirmed, deferring to the trial court's discretion in balancing the possibility of prejudice against the judicial economy resulting from a joint trial. St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3, 56 St. Rep. 395 (1999), following St. v. Martin, 279 M 185, 926 P2d 1380, 53 St. Rep. 1109 (1996), and followed in St. v. Riggs, 2005 MT 124, 327 M 196, 113 P3d 281 (2005), and St. v. Harlson, 2006 MT 312, 335 M 25, 150 P3d 349 (2006).

Denial of Motion to Sever Economic Counts From Deliberate Homicide Count — No Error: Defendant was charged with 1 count of deliberate homicide, 51 counts of felony theft, 7 counts of felony forgery, and one count of felony deceptive practices. The Supreme Court held that the burden of showing prejudice by the joinder rests on the defendant and that the defendant must show that the prejudice was so great as to prevent a fair trial. The District Court did not err in denying defendant's motion to sever the economic counts from the deliberate homicide count. St. v. Richards, 274 M 180, 906 P2d 222, 52 St. Rep. 1176 (1995), followed in St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3, 56 St. Rep. 395 (1999), and St. v. Holt, 2006 MT 151, 332 M 426, 139 P3d 819 (2006).

Severance Denied — Same Charge, Same Offense, Same Incident, Same Witnesses, Same Defenses — Balance Between Prejudice and Judicial Economy: Turner and Gollehon, state prison inmates, were both charged with the beating death of another inmate. Turner moved for severance of trials, asserting that denial of the motion was prejudicial and denied him a fair trial. In striking a balance between prejudice to a criminal defendant and judicial economy, considerations of judicial economy exert strong pressure in favor of joint trials, with the burden of showing prejudice resting on the defendant. In this case: (1) both defendants were charged with the same offenses, which arose out of a single incident; (2) the state relied on the same eyewitness testimony, which would have been required at both trials if defendants had been tried separately; and (3) both defendants raised defenses of alibi or mistaken identity and used the same witnesses to support the defenses. The jury was properly instructed that it must find each defendant guilty and that it was not enough to convict one defendant on the basis of the codefendant's guilt. Given the sensitive nature of trials involving prison inmates as defendants and witnesses and the fact that the crime took place at a state institution, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to sever the trials. St. v. Turner, 262 M 39, 864 P2d 235, 50 St. Rep. 1267 (1993), followed in St. v. Enright, 2000 MT 372, 303 M 457, 16 P3d 366, 57 St. Rep. 1590 (2000).

Failure to Move for Severance — Disposition of Severance Motion Determined by Evidence Presented at Time of Motion: After trial, appellant contended that based on newly discovered evidence of battered women's syndrome, she was prejudiced by having her case tried with that of her batterer. However, the issue of propriety of a joint trial was not preserved for appeal because she failed to move for severance. Further, the disposition of a severance motion is determined by the evidence presented at the time of the motion and not upon subsequent developments. St. v. Redcrow, 242 M 254, 790 P2d 449, 47 St. Rep. 672 (1990).

Cumulative Effect of Multiple Charges Not Justifying Severance: The defendant argued that he should have been allowed separate trials on the charges because the multiple counts allowed the jury to regard him as a "bad man". The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's refusal to sever on the basis that it was not sufficient that the defendant show some prejudice or a better chance of acquittal if separate trials were held. Rather, the defendant must show that the prejudice was so great it prevented a fair trial. St. v. Baker, 237 M 140, 773 P2d 1194, 46 St. Rep. 686 (1989).

Joinder Proper Where Offenses Linked by Motive and Overlapping Evidence: The defendant had burglarized a home, stealing firearms that he later used in robbing a shoe store. The Supreme Court ruled that the joinder of the charges was proper because there was evidence that the stealing of the guns was done in furtherance of a plan to commit robbery, thereby showing logically connected motives and overlapping proof among the separate charges. St. v. Baker, 237 M 140, 773 P2d 1194, 46 St. Rep. 686 (1989).

Claims of Cumulative Evidence, Unrelated Crimes, and Desire of Optional Testimony Insufficient to Demonstrate Prejudice — Severance Denied: Defendant tried on three counts of issuing a bad check, one count of forgery, eight counts of deceptive practices, two counts of felony theft, one count of misdemeanor theft, and one additional count of deceptive practices or, in the alternative, felony theft alleged three reasons why the charges should have been severed for separate trial. First, that the amount of evidence had a cumulative effect, convincing the jury that defendant was a bad person; second, that many of the charges were unrelated and that much of the evidence would have been inadmissible if the charges had been severed; and third, that defendant desired to testify to some, but not all, of the charges. The Supreme Court found that severance was properly denied because the reasons stated by defendant were insufficient to show prejudice by failure to sever. St. v. Slice, 231 M 448, 753 P2d 1309, 45 St. Rep. 752 (1988), followed in Missoula v. Prinkki, 239 M 331, 779 P2d 921, 46 St. Rep. 1724 (1989), and St. v. Martin, 279 M 185, 926 P2d 1380, 53 St. Rep. 1109 (1996). See also St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3, 56 St. Rep. 395 (1999).

Second Charge Precipitated by Previous Charge — Joinder Proper: Joinder is proper in cases where a second charge is precipitated by a previous charge. Therefore, in a case where a defendant charged with assault offered a witness a party, a trip out of town, $1,000, and a motorcycle if the witness would forego testifying to the assault, resulting in a charge of tampering with a witness, the assault charge provided a motive for and precipitated the witness tampering charge, and the two charges were properly joined. St. v. Bingman, 229 M 101, 745 P2d 342, 44 St. Rep. 1813 (1987), followed in St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3, 56 St. Rep. 395 (1999).

Speculation of Prejudice Insufficient for Reversal: Appellant failed to specify which evidence offered as to one count prejudiced his trial on a second count. He admitted there was sufficient evidence for the second count to go to the jury. His very speculative allegation of prejudice was insufficient to warrant reversal. St. v. Howie, 228 M 497, 744 P2d 156, 44 St. Rep. 1711 (1987).

Severance of Two Counts of Deviate Sexual Conduct Denied — No Prejudice: In ruling on defendant's argument that the two counts of deviate sexual conduct should have been tried separately, the court found no prejudice to defendant that outweighed considerations of judicial economy. Additionally, the State argued persuasively that the effect of two separate trials on the young victims of these crimes should be considered. Each would potentially be a witness in both trials and be compelled to appear and testify twice. St. v. Phelps, 215 M 217, 696 P2d 447, 42 St. Rep. 305 (1985), followed in St. v. Kestner, 220 M 41, 713 P2d 537, 43 St. Rep. 155 (1986).

Separate Trials — Showing That Codefendant's Testimony Would Be Exculpatory: In order to demonstrate prejudice by the failure to separate trials of two criminal defendants, a defendant must show that the codefendant's testimony is exculpatory. St. v. Dess, 207 M 468, 674 P2d 502, 41 St. Rep. 81 (1984), followed in St. v. Enright, 2000 MT 372, 303 M 457, 16 P3d 366, 57 St. Rep. 1590 (2000).

Two Counts of Theft Found: The defendant was charged with theft of a big-screen television and the theft of a few appliances. While all these items were loaded on a moving van at the same time, thereby completing the execution of unauthorized control over them, they were acquired through different schemes and thereby constituted different crimes. The District Court properly found defendant guilty and sentenced him for two counts of theft. St. v. Holmes, 207 M 176, 674 P2d 1071, 40 St. Rep. 1973 (1983).

Failure of State to Elect Alternative Proofs of Robbery Not Violation of Due Process — Intent Required for Each Alternative: When the defendant was charged with robbery in the alternative under 45-5-401(1)(b) within separate counts in the same information, the District Court did not err in refusing to require the State to elect to prove one of the alternative methods of committing robbery under subsection (1)(b). The defendant was not deprived of notice and due process of law because the information was sufficient to notify the defendant of the charges against him and because the Supreme Court previously approved the charging practice followed in this case in McKenzie v. District Court, 165 M 54, 525 P2d 1211 (1974). Any failure of 45-5-401 to require that the crime of robbery be committed purposely or knowingly under each alternative in subsection (1)(b) was cured by the giving of a jury instruction making it clear that intent was required to be proved. St. v. Ritchson, 193 M 112, 630 P2d 234, 38 St. Rep. 1015 (1981).

Justice's Court as Having Jurisdiction Despite Associated Felony Violation: A District Court does not have jurisdiction to try a misdemeanor offense of endangering the welfare of children, proscribed in 45-5-622, even though it was committed together with a felony. This section's provision that an information may charge two or more different offenses connected together in their commission is not a grant of jurisdiction but is simply a permissive joinder statute for offenses within the jurisdiction of a given court. Under 3-5-302, providing that the District Court has original jurisdiction in all felony criminal cases and "cases of misdemeanor not otherwise provided for", and 3-10-303, providing for Justice's Court jurisdiction of misdemeanors with a $500 fine, 6 months' imprisonment, or both, the Justice's Court has jurisdiction over the misdemeanor offense of endangering the welfare of children because that offense carries a maximum sentence of $500, 6 months, or both. St. v. Campbell, 191 M 75, 622 P2d 200, 38 St. Rep. 19 (1981).

Multiple Counts of Charge Arising Out of Single Incident: Petitioner objected to being charged with multiple counts of robbery arising out of the same incident. The State is permitted to do so by the express provisions of this section. Although the propriety of filing such multiple charges has been criticized in some cases, it is within the discretion of the prosecution to do so under Montana law, and accordingly there was no error. Parker v. Crist, 190 M 376, 621 P2d 484, 37 St. Rep. 2048 (1980).

Joining of Trials of Codefendants Not Prejudicial: Under this section, it is within the trial court's discretion whether or not to grant a severance of trials. In considering whether there should be a joint trial, trial courts must consider several factors: joint trials speed the administration of justice, conserve judicial time, lessen the burden of prospective jurors, and obviate the necessity of recalling witnesses. These benefits must be weighed by the trial court against the potential prejudice to a defendant that may arise as a result of his being tried with another defendant. There was no real threat of prejudice that would interfere with a fair trial where codefendants would have been associated with each other had they had separate trials and where the jury was instructed to consider each defendant's guilt or innocence. St. v. Strain, 190 M 44, 618 P2d 331, 37 St. Rep. 1763 (1980), followed in St. v. Graves, 241 M 533, 788 P2d 311, 47 St. Rep. 483 (1990), and St. v. Enright, 2000 MT 372, 303 M 457, 16 P3d 366, 57 St. Rep. 1590 (2000).

Permissive Joinder — Not Grant of Jurisdiction: Relator was charged with misdemeanor assault and burglary (a felony). Relator contends that the District Court had no jurisdiction to try him for a misdemeanor. Section 46-11-404 allows an information to charge two or more offenses connected in their commission. This section is a permissive joinder statute for offenses within the jurisdiction of a given court, not a grant of jurisdiction. Jurisdiction for the misdemeanor assault lies with the Justice's Court. State ex rel. Rasmussen v. District Court, 189 M 183, 615 P2d 231 (1980).

Severance of Habitual Traffic Offender Charge Properly Denied: The District Court did not err in refusing to sever an habitual traffic offender charge from a D.W.I. charge and a negligent homicide charge. None of the three basic kinds of prejudice outlined in St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), was found to outweigh the judicial economy resulting from a joint trial. This balancing process was left to the sound discretion of the trial judge, which was not abused. St. v. Campbell, 189 M 107, 615 P2d 190 (1980), followed in St. v. Martin, 279 M 185, 926 P2d 1380, 53 St. Rep. 1109 (1996), and St. v. Enright, 2000 MT 372, 303 M 457, 16 P3d 366, 57 St. Rep. 1590 (2000); standard for analyzing prejudicial joinder applied in St. v. Bingman, 229 M 101, 745 P2d 342, 44 St. Rep. 1813 (1987), and St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3, 56 St. Rep. 395 (1999).

Separate Offense for Each Drug: When a defendant is in possession of more than one kind of prohibited drug at any one time, he may be prosecuted and convicted of a separate offense for each kind of prohibited drug he possesses. St. v. Meadors, 177 M 100, 580 P2d 903 (1978).

Motion to Force Election of Charge: The first trial judge, in ruling on the defendants' motion to force an election between the charges at the time of the arraignment, denied the motion with a reservation of the right to review it prior to trial. Thus, in the subsequent denial of the renewed motion by another judge, who assumed jurisdiction, there was no abrogation of the doctrine of "law of the case". St. v. Davis, 176 M 196, 577 P2d 375 (1978).

Constitutional Rights Denied by Denial of Severance: The joinder of the defendants' trials, after the timely and specific filing of motions for severance, allowed the jury to consider hearsay evidence that was inadmissible against certain defendants yet admissible against others and denied individual defendants their fundamental constitutional right to confrontation. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 174 M 174, 569 P2d 383 (1977).

Charging in the Alternative: Charging two offenses in the alternative, the charges being different legal theories covering the same transaction, is proper under this section. St. v. Cline, 170 M 520, 555 P2d 724 (1976).

Multiple Counts of Aggravated Assault: When the defendant was charged on two counts of aggravated assault, both arising out of the same incident, and was acquitted on one count but convicted on the other, there was no showing of prejudice from the trial court's refusal to grant separate trials and therefore such refusal was not erroneous. St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976).

Multiple Offenses Arising From Same Transaction: Upon allegations of assault and battery, rape, kidnapping, and homicide, all arising from the same transaction, the prosecution is bound to prosecute them all at one time, insofar as possible. State ex rel. McKenzie v. District Court, 165 M 54, 525 P2d 1211 (1974).

"Same Class of Crimes": Grand larceny and receipt of stolen property are in the "same class of crimes". The State could charge the two offenses alternatively in the same information and was not required to elect between them. St. v. Tritz, 164 M 344, 522 P2d 603 (1974), certiorari denied, Tritz v. St., 420 US 909, 42 L Ed 2d 838, 95 S Ct 828 (1975).

Severance of Issues of Guilt and Sanity: The denial of the defendant's motion for severance for trial of the issues of the defendant's guilt or innocence and his sanity was proper. St. v. Olson, 156 M 339, 480 P2d 822 (1971), explained in State ex rel. Krutzfeldt v. District Court, 163 M 164, 515 P2d 1315 (1973).

Charge of Several Counts of Same Offense:

An information in five counts, three of which alleged larceny of more than one cow, did not violate the "former jeopardy" provision of the 1889 Montana Constitution in that each count stated a separate offense. St. v. Johnson, 149 M 173, 424 P2d 728 (1967).

When the defendant was charged with 22 counts of statutory rape and convicted on nine of the counts, it was proper that each charge be set forth in a separate count in the information, and there was no violation of the state or federal constitutional guaranty against double jeopardy. St. v. Boe, 143 M 141, 388 P2d 372 (1963), followed in St. v. Little, 861 M 154, 260 P2d 460, 50 St. Rep. 1124 (1993), and St. v. Hamilton, 2007 MT 223, 339 M 92, 167 P3d 906 (2007).

Improper Joinder of Counts — Remedy: The objection that several offenses are improperly united under separate counts in an information cannot be raised by a motion to require the prosecution to elect upon which one count it would rely for conviction, but must be taken by demurrer. St. v. Marchindo, 65 M 431, 211 P 1093 (1922).

How to Object to Information on Grounds of Duplicity: An objection to an information on the grounds of duplicity is addressed to the jurisdiction of the District Court rather than to the form of the information and may be raised by an objection to the introduction of evidence and a motion to compel an election. St. v. Mjelde, 29 M 490, 75 P 87 (1903).

Waiver by Failure to Object: Any objection to the inclusion in one count of the statement of different forms of the same offense must be made in the District Court before plea; otherwise it is waived. St. v. Mahoney, 24 M 281, 61 P 647 (1900).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute preserves 1987 MCA 46-11-502. While this code provision establishes some of the protections against double jeopardy, the Commission felt it was better placed in a statute related to the charge. The statute recognizes that there may be several charges arising from a single criminal transaction. The statute also states those instances in which convictions for those several offenses are not permitted because of the double jeopardy protection. Adoption of this statute should not result in a change in either practice or procedure.

Case Notes

Aggravated Assault as Lesser Included Offense of Felony Homicide — Merger of Offenses — Conviction for Both Offenses Error: Russell was convicted of felony homicide and aggravated assault. Aggravated assault was charged as the predicate offense for charging felony homicide. Russell asserted that because the felony homicide conviction was predicated on the same assault, the conviction for aggravated assault should be dismissed. The District Court declined to dismiss the assault conviction, but on appeal the Supreme Court reversed. A defendant cannot be found guilty of felony homicide without having committed a predicate felony offense. When the offenses are charged in that fashion, the offenses merge and the predicate offense becomes a lesser included offense of felony homicide. Therefore, the District Court erred by not granting Russell's motion to dismiss the lesser included offense of aggravated assault after being convicted of felony murder. St. v. Russell, 2008 MT 417, 347 M 301, 198 P3d 271 (2008).

Criminal Possession of Dangerous Drugs, but Not Possession of Precursors to Dangerous Drugs, Considered Lesser Included Offense of Criminal Production or Manufacture of Dangerous Drugs by Accountability: Becker was convicted of criminal possession of dangerous drugs, accountability for criminal production or manufacture of dangerous drugs, and criminal possession of precursors to dangerous drugs. However, because the production or manufacture of dangerous drugs cannot be a criminal act until the drug has been created, the state had to first prove that Becker or one of his codefendants possessed drugs in order to convict Becker on the charge of producing or manufacturing those same drugs. Read together, 46-1-202(9)(a) and subsection (2)(a) of this section barred Becker's conviction for both criminal possession of dangerous drugs and accountability for criminal production or manufacture of dangerous drugs because criminal possession is a lesser included offense of criminal production or manufacture of dangerous drugs. However, criminal possession of precursors to dangerous drugs is not a lesser included offense of accountability for criminal production or manufacture of dangerous drugs. Thus, the Supreme Court reversed the criminal possession conviction and ordered resentencing on only the criminal possession of precursors and accountability for criminal production or manufacture. St. v. Becker, 2005 MT 75, 326 M 364, 110 P3d 1 (2005). See also St. v. Peterson, 227 M 511, 744 P2d 870 (1987).

Failure of Counsel to Argue Included Offenses Under State Law Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Becker was convicted of criminal possession of dangerous drugs, accountability for criminal production or manufacture of dangerous drugs, and criminal possession of precursors to dangerous drugs. On appeal, Becker argued that he should have been convicted only of criminal production or manufacture by accountability because the other two charges were part of the manufacturing process and that failure to include the other charges violated his due process rights. The Supreme Court declined to address the double jeopardy issue under the plain error doctrine because Becker raised it for the first time on appeal. However, the court found it appropriate to address the issue under Becker's ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Becker's counsel's failure to include all the relevant charges in a dismissal motion and to rely on the proper statutory grounds for dismissal constituted deficient performance under the first prong of the Strickland test. The second Strickland prong was also met because Becker was prejudiced by counsel's deficient performance, inasmuch as there was a reasonable probability that the result of the proceeding would have been different but for counsel's errors. The Supreme Court thus vacated the convictions and remanded for resentencing. St. v. Becker, 2005 MT 75, 326 M 364, 110 P3d 1 (2005). See also St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001).

Violation of Motion In Limine in First Trial Not Grounds for Double Jeopardy Dismissal in Second Trial: Mallak contended that the state goaded him into moving for a mistrial by purposely violating a motion in limine prohibiting testimony of Mallak's prior violent conduct and that under Oreg. v. Kennedy, 456 US 667 (1982), and St. v. Laster, 223 M 152, 724 P2d 721

(1986), a second trial was a violation of double jeopardy. The Supreme Court disagreed. The part of the testimony that Mallak objected to was a product of the prosecutor's inadvertence, not intention, and did not inevitably lead to a violation of the motion in limine, unlike the inherently violative questioning in Laster. Thus, double jeopardy did not apply, and the trial court did not err in denying Mallak's motion to dismiss the charges. St. v. Mallak, 2005 MT 49, 326 M 165, 109 P3d 209 (2005), followed in Billings v. Mouat, 2008 MT 66, 342 M 79, 180 P3d 1121 (2008), regarding the principle that when a mistrial is declared on a defendant's motion, double jeopardy does not bar a subsequent trial unless the governmental conduct in question was intended to goad defendant into moving for a mistrial, and followed in Helena v. Whittinghill, 2009 MT 343, 353 M 131, 219 P3d 1244 (2009), to the extent that it is insufficient to bar a retrial absent intent on the part of the prosecutor to subvert the protections afforded by the double jeopardy clause, even when the prosecutor's conduct prompting the mistrial motion constitutes harassment or overreaching.

Assault With Weapon Not Lesser Included Offense of Assault of Peace Officer — No Double Jeopardy in Convicting of Both Offenses: Matt was charged with assault with a weapon and with assault on a peace officer. Matt pleaded guilty to assault on a peace officer and moved to dismiss the assault with a weapon charge, contending that it was a lesser included offense of assault on a peace officer and that prosecution for assault with a weapon therefore violated Matt's double jeopardy rights. The Supreme Court noted that each offense requires proof of an element not included in the other offense, so assault with a weapon is not a lesser included offense of assault on a peace officer. Thus, prosecution of both offenses did not violate Matt's constitutional or statutory double jeopardy protections, and both convictions were affirmed. St. v. Matt, 2005 MT 9, 325 M 340, 106 P3d 530 (2005), following St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371 (1999).

Statute Regarding Conviction for Crime of Preparation Not Prohibitive of Charging Multiple Offenses Arising From Same Transaction: Dixon built a pipe bomb and used it to blow up a traffic sign. Dixon pleaded guilty to criminal endangerment, possession of a destructive device, and criminal mischief. An amended information was filed, lowering the criminal endangerment charge to negligent endangerment and changing the possession of a destructive device to possession of explosives. Dixon pleaded not guilty and moved to dismiss, contending that the amended information violated subsection (2)(b) of this section because the charge of possession of explosives is a crime of preparation. The Supreme Court noted that although subsection (2) of this section prohibits the state from convicting a defendant of more than one offense if one offense consists only of a form of preparation to commit the other, subsection (1) of this section expressly allows a person to be charged with and prosecuted for multiple offenses arising out of the same transaction. Dixon was not convicted of multiple offenses, so this section was not violated. St. v. Dixon, 2000 MT 82, 299 M 165, 998 P2d 544, 57 St. Rep. 354 (2000).

Incest Not Included Offense of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: McQuiston contended that his conviction for both incest and sexual intercourse without consent violated double jeopardy protections because under this section, a defendant may not be convicted of more than one offense if one offense is an included offense in another, as defined in 46-1-202. The Supreme Court held that incest is not an included offense of sexual intercourse without consent but rather is a distinct and wholly separate offense, each crime requiring proof of distinct elements that the other does not have. McQuiston's conviction for both crimes was not a double jeopardy violation. St. v. McQuiston, 277 M 397, 922 P2d 519, 53 St. Rep. 729 (1996), following St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367 (1991).

Possession of Explosives and Criminal Mischief — Neither an Inchoate Crime: Wolfe argued that he had been subjected to double jeopardy in being convicted of both possession of explosives and criminal mischief. The Supreme Court held that the statute prohibiting double jeopardy applied only to inchoate crimes and that neither of the two crimes Wolfe was convicted of was inchoate. The Supreme Court also held that under the test used in Blockburger v. U.S., 284 US 299, 76 L Ed 306, 52 S Ct 180 (1932), Wolfe had not been subjected to double jeopardy. St. v. Wolfe, 250 M 400, 821 P2d 339, 48 St. Rep. 1001 (1991).

Conviction of Sexual Assault and Incest — No Violation of Double Jeopardy Protections: Because the victim was 15 years old, the state had to prove lack of consent for a sexual assault charge. The incest statute does not require proof of lack of consent if the victim is under 18 years of age. The jury could have found defendant guilty of incest and not guilty of sexual assault. Based on the facts of this case, the convictions and sentencing of defendant for sexual assault and incest did not violate double jeopardy protections. St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367, 48 St. Rep. 142 (1991), followed in St. v. McQuiston, 277 M 397, 922 P2d 519, 53 St. Rep. 729 (1996).

Conviction for Stealing Purse and Using Bank Card Not Multiple Conviction for Same Offense: The defendant argued that convicting him of felony theft for stealing a purse and taking money from a teller machine using a card from the purse constituted multiple convictions for the same offense. The Supreme Court held that the defendant had been charged and convicted of only one crime, rather than having been subjected to multiple convictions. St. v. Steele, 247 M 480, 807 P2d 1348, 48 St. Rep. 268 (1991).

Conviction of Criminal Trespass to Vehicles and Attempted Theft — Not Conviction Under Same Transaction: Defendant contended that he was improperly convicted of criminal trespass to vehicles and attempted theft in violation of this section. The Supreme Court applied the test set out in Blockburger v. U.S., 284 US 299, 76 L Ed 306, 52 S Ct 180 (1932), in deciding whether there were two offenses or only one. Each provision required proof of a fact that the other did not. Because each crime involved separate and distinct elements, defendant's conviction did not violate this section. St. v. Johnstone, 244 M 450, 798 P2d 978, 47 St. Rep. 1715 (1990).

Theft Not Required to Prove Robbery: The defendant argued that the lower court erred in not instructing the jury that theft is a lesser included offense of robbery. He contended that because there was conflicting evidence of whether or not he had induced fear in the bank teller, the instruction was required. The Supreme Court held that theft is not a lesser included offense because the elements of robbery can be proved even if there is no taking of property. St. v. Albrecht, 242 M 403, 791 P2d 760, 47 St. Rep. 800 (1990), followed in St. v. Greywater, 282 M 28, 939 P2d 975, 54 St. Rep. 16 (1997).

Sexual Intercourse Without Consent Not Lesser Included Offense of Aggravated Kidnapping: Under the rationale of this section and the standard set out in St. v. Thornton, 218 M 317, 708 P2d 273 (1985), sexual intercourse without consent is not a lesser included offense of aggravated kidnapping. St. v. Clawson, 239 M 413, 781 P2d 267, 46 St. Rep. 1792 (1989).

Possession of Dangerous Drugs as Lesser Included Offense of Possession With Intent to Sell — Instruction on Lesser Offense Required: It was reversible error for the District Court to deny defendant's instruction on the offense of possession of dangerous drugs as a lesser included offense of possession of dangerous drugs with intent to sell. St. v. Peterson, 227 M 503, 741 P2d 392, 44 St. Rep. 1268 (1987).

Misdemeanor Assault — Not Lesser Included Offense of Sexual Assault: Relying on its decision in St. v. Madera, 206 M 140, 670 P2d 552, 40 St. Rep. 1558 (1983), relating to the question of lesser included offense, the Supreme Court affirmed the lower court decision that misdemeanor assault is not a lesser included offense of sexual assault. St. v. Long, 223 M 502, 726 P2d 1364, 43 St. Rep. 1948 (1986).

Conviction for Aggravated Assault, Escape, and Obstructing a Peace Officer — No Double Jeopardy: There was no double jeopardy when defendant was convicted of aggravated assault, escape, and obstructing a peace officer, all of which arose out of the same event, as each offense contains an element not common to the other offenses. St. v. Thornton, 218 M 317, 708 P2d 273, 42 St. Rep. 1614 (1985).

Two Counts of Theft Found: The defendant was charged with theft of a big-screen television and the theft of a few appliances. While all these items were loaded on a moving van at the same time, thereby completing the execution of unauthorized control over them, they were acquired through different schemes and thereby constituted different crimes. The District Court properly found defendant guilty and sentenced him for two counts of theft. St. v. Holmes, 207 M 176, 674 P2d 1071, 40 St. Rep. 1973 (1983).

Theft and Criminal Mischief — Conviction From Same Act — No Error: Conviction of a defendant of both the crime of felony theft and the crime of felony criminal mischief as a result of the defendant's involvement in one criminal incident is permissible under 46-11-502 (renumbered 46-11-410) and is not a violation of the U.S. constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy. St. v. Palmer, 207 M 152, 673 P2d 1234, 40 St. Rep. 1957 (1983).

Felony Theft — Not Lesser Included Offense of Robbery: LaMere was convicted of felony theft and robbery of the Dumas Hotel in Butte. On appeal, he contended that the District Court erred in not treating theft as a lesser included offense of the charge of robbery. Applying the "Blockburger test" as explained in Iannelli v. U.S., 420 US 770, 43 L Ed 2d 616, 95 S Ct 1284 (1975), the Supreme Court looked to determine if each offense required proof of a fact the other did not. The proof of robbery was complete if, as an element of the offense, the State proved the threat of injury in the commission of misdemeanor or felony theft. In order to prove felony theft, the State must prove that the value of the property taken exceeds $150 (raised to $300 by 1983 amendment). There is an additional element required to prove felony theft not required for conviction of the charge of robbery. The theft in this case was not a lesser included offense within the charge of robbery. St. v. Madera, 206 M 140, 670 P2d 552, 40 St. Rep. 1558 (1983). Madera was followed in St. v. Greywater, 282 M 28, 939 P2d 975, 54 St. Rep. 16 (1997).

Double Jeopardy — Legislative Intent of Multiple Punishment: Defendant contended that his guarantees against double jeopardy were violated when he was convicted of both aggravated burglary and aggravated assault. In determining whether multiple punishments should be allowed for offenses arising out of the same transaction, the dispositive question is whether the Legislature intended to provide for multiple punishments. The court found several bases for concluding that the Legislature intended to permit punishment for both offenses, including the fact that one could commit either offense without committing the other. St. v. Wells, 202 M 337, 658 P2d 381, 40 St. Rep. 127 (1983), followed in St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991).

Aggravated Kidnapping and Aggravated Assault — Conviction From Same Act: Defendant held off police by holding a victim at gunpoint and threatening to kill him. Defendant's convictions of both aggravated kidnapping and aggravated assault stemming from this action were upheld, following Blockburger v. U.S., 284 US 299, 76 L Ed 306, 52 S Ct 180 (1932). Each crime requires proof of a fact which the other does not; aggravated kidnapping does not entail the victim's apprehension of serious bodily injury or the use of a weapon by the accused, whereas aggravated assault does not entail a showing of restraint or the intent to hold another as a hostage or shield. Furthermore, aggravated assault is not a general type of conduct, a specific instance of which aggravated kidnapping prohibits. As charged, one prohibits apprehension of serious injury by use of a weapon; the other prohibits the restraining of another by use or threat of force of any kind. St. v. Buckman, 193 M 145, 630 P2d 743, 38 St. Rep. 1007 (1981).

Aggravated Assault Not a Lesser Included Offense of Robbery: When, in the course of a robbery, the defendant fired a shotgun in the direction of a bartender, the District Court did not err in imposing sentences for both offenses following the defendant's conviction of robbery and aggravated assault. Under Blockburger v. U.S., 284 US 299, 76 L Ed 306, 52 S Ct 180 (1932), as applied by St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940 (1981), and other Montana cases, the "facts" referred to in provision in 46-11-501(2) (now repealed), that an offense is an included offense if it is established by proof of the same or less than all the facts required to establish the offense charged, are the statutory elements of the crime rather than the individual facts of each case. Here, because the aggravated assault statute requires proof of at least one element that is not needed to establish the offense of robbery, aggravated assault is not a lesser included offense in the crime of robbery. St. v. Ritchson, 193 M 112, 630 P2d 234, 38 St. Rep. 1015 (1981).

Reckless Driving and Criminal Mischief From Same Transaction: The state of Montana is barred from prosecuting a criminal mischief charge under 46-11-504 where the defendant was previously convicted of reckless driving. The acts that are concerned with reckless driving are also those necessary to establish the felony crime of criminal mischief; the "same transaction" test of this section is met. St. v. Houser, 192 M 164, 626 P2d 256, 38 St. Rep. 538 (1981).

Conviction for Both Solicitation and Criminal Mischief Barred by Statute — Failure to Object When Error Occurred After Judgment: In a prosecution of the defendant for soliciting another to set fire to a mobile home and for felony criminal mischief, the District Court erred in convicting the defendant of both offenses when the solicitation constituted acts in preparation of the criminal mischief. Because the conviction and the error did not arise until after the District Court rendered a final judgment of conviction on both counts of the information, the failure of the defendant to object to the submission of both counts to the jury does not preclude the defendant from raising the issue on appeal. St. v. Mitchell, 192 M 16, 625 P2d 1155, 38 St. Rep. 487 (1981).

Multiple Counts of Charge Arising Out of Single Incident: Petitioner objected to being charged with multiple counts of robbery arising out of the same incident. The State is permitted to do so by the express provisions of this section. Although the propriety of filing such multiple charges has been criticized in some cases, it is within the discretion of the prosecution to do so under Montana law, and accordingly there was no error. Parker v. Crist, 190 M 376, 621 P2d 484, 37 St. Rep. 2048 (1980).

Deliberate Homicide and Aggravated Kidnapping Distinct: The offenses of deliberate homicide and aggravated kidnapping are separate and distinct offenses in our codes, and each requires proof of elements the other does not. Therefore, a defendant may be convicted and sentenced for both deliberate homicide and aggravated kidnapping without violating the double jeopardy prohibition even though the counts arose from the same conduct or episode. Because each offense requires proof of elements that the other does not, aggravated kidnapping is not a lesser included offense and defendant's double jeopardy claim must fail on this point as well. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000 (1979), affirmed in St. v. Coleman, 249 M 128, 814 P2d 48, 48 St. Rep. 610 (1991).

Rejection of So-Called "Same Transaction" Test: In State ex rel. McKenzie v. District Court the traditional "same facts" rule was not abandoned in favor of the so-called "same transaction" test. The failure of the State to elect between charges alleging practicing medicine without a license and practicing chiropractic without a license did not subject the defendant to double jeopardy under this section because he was convicted of both offenses. St. v. Blinzler, 183 M 300, 599 P2d 349 (1979).

Same Transaction Bar — Proper Time for Objection: The prosecution of the defendant was not barred by the double jeopardy provision of the United States Constitution or by the Montana "same transaction" statutes even though the defendant had been tried in another county on a similar charge. The information filed in the other county named different defendants and was filed after the information in the present case. If a valid objection did exist in this area, it would have been proper to make the objection upon the filing of the second information in the other county. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Conviction of Lesser Included Offense as Bar to Subsequent Prosecution: A subsequent prosecution is barred by a prior conviction if the subsequent prosecution: (1) is based upon the same acts as was the prior conviction; (2) is for an offense of which the offense in the prior conviction is a lesser included offense; and (3) is in a court which is part of the same sovereign as the court involved in the prior conviction. Because the offense of disturbing the peace essentially requires no proof beyond that required for conviction of first-degree assault, it is a lesser included offense of the greater offense of assault. Yother v. St., 182 M 351, 597 P2d 79 (1979).

Included Offense: The charge of possession of a weapon by a prisoner does not constitute an offense included in the charge of aggravated assault. Therefore, a conviction on both charges does not violate prohibitions against double jeopardy. St. v. Perry, 180 M 364, 590 P2d 1129 (1979).

Separate Offense for Each Drug: When a defendant is in possession of more than one kind of prohibited drug at any one time, he may be prosecuted and convicted of a separate offense for each kind of prohibited drug he possesses. St. v. Meadors, 177 M 100, 580 P2d 903 (1978).

DWI — Involuntary Manslaughter: The defendant's conviction of driving while intoxicated and operating a motor vehicle with improper brakes did not bar a subsequent prosecution for involuntary manslaughter. St. v. McDonald, 158 M 307, 491 P2d 711 (1971).

Charge of Several Counts of Same Offense:

An information in five counts, three of which alleged larceny of more than one cow, did not violate the "former jeopardy" provision of the 1889 Montana Constitution in that each count stated a separate offense. St. v. Johnson, 149 M 173, 424 P2d 728 (1967).

When the defendant was charged with 22 counts of statutory rape and convicted on nine of the counts, it was proper that each charge be set forth in a separate count in the information, and there was no violation of the state or federal constitutional guaranty against double jeopardy. St. v. Boe, 143 M 141, 388 P2d 372 (1963), followed in St. v. Hamilton, 2007 MT 223, 339 M 92, 167 P3d 906 (2007).

Test for Determination of Former Jeopardy: The test to be applied in determining whether the plea of former jeopardy should be sustained is whether the matter set out in the second information was admissible as evidence and would have sustained a conviction under the first information. The court held that a second information filed charging the defendant with embezzlement of city funds was dismissed and that it was error to refuse to entertain defendant's plea. St. v. Parmenter, 112 M 312, 116 P2d 879 (1941), followed in St. v. Hall, 224 M 187, 728 P2d 1339, 43 St. Rep. 2120 (1986).

Same Transaction — Larceny of Several Articles: The rule that there is but one larceny if several articles are stolen at different times and from different places under a single design, impulse, or purpose is applicable only if the different subjects involved are so related in point of time and location as to make it physically possible for actual control to be exercised over both at the same time. The court held that the taking of a bunch of horses a mile east of a ranch and another bunch three-quarters of a mile south, corralled at the same place but belonging to different persons, were independent offenses. St. v. Akers, 106 M 105, 76 P2d 638 (1938).

New Trial Not Double Jeopardy: In a prosecution for the larceny of one of four colts, all stolen at the same time and place, the defendant was convicted and served about a month in the state prison when a new trial was granted him for want of proper proof of ownership of the colt. Thereupon a new information was filed charging the theft of one of the other three colts, and the defendant interposed a plea of once in jeopardy, which was properly denied, not because of a different offense, theft of four colts at the same time constituting but one offense, but because in the granting of a new trial he is in the same jeopardy. St. v. Aus, 105 M 82, 69 P2d 584 (1937).

Part 5
Effect of Former Prosecutions

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: This part retains the essential 1987 code provisions concerning a defendant's statutory protection from double jeopardy. The Commission recommended moving some of the code provisions to the definition statute, 46-1-202. Those provisions that were confusing or unnecessary have been eliminated.

Neither the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure nor the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure contains express provisions governing the double jeopardy situation. The principal model for the statutes was the 1987 code.

Part Case Notes

Suspending Less of Sentence After Retrial Than After First Trial — Court's Belief Time Needed to Complete Ordered Programs: If a judge imposes a more severe sentence upon a defendant after a new trial than that imposed in the former trial, the reasons for doing so must appear in the record and be based on objective information concerning identifiable conduct of defendant occurring after the time of the original sentencing. Otherwise, there is a presumption that the greater sentence was for a vindictive purpose, and the presumption must be rebutted. It was constitutionally legitimate for the court to reduce, after a second trial resulting in the same incarceration term, the amount of time that the sentence was suspended after the first trial. The court believed that defendant needed the time to complete rehabilitative programs that the court ordered him to complete in each sentence and suspended less time to ensure that there was sufficient time to complete the programs. St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001).

Same Transaction Bar — Proper Time for Objection: The prosecution of the defendant was not barred by the double jeopardy provision of the United States Constitution or by the Montana "same transaction" statutes even though the defendant had been tried in another county on a similar charge. The information filed in the other county named different defendants and was filed after the information in the present case. If a valid objection did exist in this area, it would have been proper to make the objection upon the filing of the second information in the other county. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Contempt Proceedings: Under former law, while a contempt proceeding was criminal in its nature, it was not a criminal prosecution and, when such a proceeding was dismissed before a hearing without prejudice and a new one was thereafter instituted by an attorney as relator, the dismissal of the first citation did not constitute a bar to any further prosecution. State ex rel. Hall v. Niewoehner, 116 M 437, 155 P2d 205 (1944).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an adaptation of 1987 MCA 46-11-503. The first two provisions of this statute state the primary situations in which a former prosecution will bar all other prosecutions. Subsection (1)(a) provides such protection when a former prosecution resulted in an acquittal. Subsection (1)(b) provides such protection for cases in which a conviction is the final result. Both subsections preserve the 1987 code but eliminate confusing and unnecessary provisions. Compare subsections (1)(a) and (1)(b) and 1987 MCA 46-11-503(1) and (3).

When a former prosecution has been terminated for other reasons by a final order or judgment that has not been set aside, reversed, or vacated, continued prosecution for offenses arising out of the same transaction is also barred. This statute, codified at 1987 MCA 46-11-503(2) and preserved in subsection (1)(c), maintains the 1987 code provisions but eliminates those that were confusing and unnecessary.

Subsection (1)(d) preserves the general rule that a former prosecution will bar a subsequent prosecution based on the same transaction when the original prosecution ends for reasons other than an acquittal. This provision was changed to comport with the United States Supreme Court's decision in Crist v. Bretz, 437 US 28 (1978).

Subsection (2) retains the 1987 code provision describing those terminations that do not bar a subsequent prosecution.

Compiler's Comments

1999 Amendment: Chapter 110 in (1)(d)(i) substituted "when the jury is impaneled and sworn" for "after the first witness is sworn but before a verdict is returned"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 110, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, in Keating v. Sherlock, 278 Mont. 218, 924 P.2d 1297, 53 St. Rep. 855 (1996), the Montana Supreme Court held that section 46-11-503(1)(d)(i), MCA, has been unconstitutional since the decision in Crist v. Bretz, 437 U.S. 28 (1978)."

1991 Amendment: In (1), after "known to the", substituted "prosecutor, are supported by probable cause" for "attorney prosecuting upon sufficient evidence to justify the filing of an information or the issuance of a warrant of arrest and were", near end, after "prosecution" deleted "based upon the same transaction as a former prosecution", and after "barred" deleted "by such former prosecution under the following circumstances"; in (1)(b), after "prosecution", substituted "resulted in a conviction" for "was terminated, after a complaint had been filed on a misdemeanor charge or after an information had been filed or an indictment found on a felony charge, by a final order of judgment for the defendant which", and at end, after "vacated", deleted "and which necessarily required a determination inconsistent with a fact or a legal proposition that must be established for conviction of the offense"; deleted former (3) that read: "(3) The former prosecution resulted in a conviction. There has been a conviction whenever the prosecution resulted in:

(a) a judgment of conviction which has not been reversed or vacated;

(b) a verdict of guilty which has not been set aside and which is capable of supporting a judgment, so long as failure to enter judgment was for a reason other than a motion of the defendant; or

(c) a plea of guilty accepted by the court, so long as failure to enter judgment was for a reason other than a motion of the defendant"; inserted (1)(c) concerning termination by final order or judgment for defendant; at beginning of (1)(d) substituted "the former prosecution was terminated" for former introductory language of (4) that read: "(4) The former prosecution was improperly terminated. Except as provided in this subsection (4), there is an improper termination of a prosecution whenever the termination is"; at beginning of (1)(d)(i) inserted "in a jury trial" and at end inserted "is returned"; inserted (1)(d)(ii) concerning termination in a nonjury trial; in (2)(b), after "court", deleted "in the exercise of its discretion"; in (2)(b)(iii), after "conduct", deleted "in or outside the courtroom"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Defendant's Acquiescence in Termination of Trial — Waiver of Right to Object to Trial Termination — Retrial Not Barred: A mistrial was declared during Cates' trial for sexual intercourse without consent, and the state amended the information, refiled the charges, and sought a second trial. Cates moved to dismiss on double jeopardy grounds, but the motion was denied pursuant to St. v. Carney, 219 M 412, 714 P2d 532 (1986), which holds that a second criminal trial is barred unless there is a manifest necessity to terminate the trial or the defendant acquiesces in the termination. Cates appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. If the totality of the circumstances and the affirmative conduct of the defendant show that the right to object to trial termination has been waived, then a retrial is not barred on double jeopardy grounds. Here, Cates twice expressed willingness to terminate the proceedings by offering two mistrial motions, and Cates never wavered or expressed any misgivings, even when given the opportunity to do so. Thus, Cates waived the right to object to termination of the proceedings, and under 46-11-503(2)(a), retrial under the amended information was not barred and Cates' motion to dismiss was properly denied. St. v. Cates, 2009 MT 94, 350 M 38, 204 P3d 1224 (2009). See also U.S. v. Dinitz, 424 US 600 (1976), Peretz v. U.S., 501 US 923 (1991), and Keating v. Sherlock, 278 M 218, 924 P2d 1297 (1996).

Statements Made in Another State Without Effect on Montana Homicide Proceedings — Right to Counsel "Offense Specific": Schneider was stopped in Arizona while trying to gain entry into Mexico, and while detained, Schneider confessed to two murders in Montana. At the time of arrest, Schneider was on probation for felony theft in Montana and was prohibited from leaving the state without permission. Arizona charged Schneider with being a fugitive from justice and appointed a public defender. A Montana court moved to revoke Schneider's probation, and Montana officers went to Arizona to interrogate Schneider regarding the murders. Schneider waived his Miranda rights and did not request counsel during questioning, during which he made incriminating statements regarding involvement in the murders. Montana subsequently charged Schneider with two counts of accountability for deliberate homicide. Schneider moved to suppress the statements made in Arizona on grounds that his right to counsel was violated, but the motion was denied based on the holding in Texas v. Cobb, 532 US 162 (2001), and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Under Cobb, the right to counsel is "offense specific", meaning that it only applies with respect to the charged or related offense and cannot be invoked once for all future prosecutions. Because the right to counsel in the Montana Constitution is consistent with Art. VI of the U.S. Constitution, the court declined Schneider's request to extend any further protection under Montana law beyond that expressed in Cobb. The constitution does not negate society's interest in the ability of police to talk to witnesses and suspects, even those charged with other offenses. In addition, regarding Schneider's argument that the Arizona statement should be suppressed under the "same transaction" rule, the Arizona case was not before the Montana court and had no effect on the disposition of the issues. Thus, Schneider's statements made in connection with the Arizona fugitive charge were admissible in the Montana homicide proceedings, and Schneider's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Schneider, 2008 MT 408, 347 M 215, 197 P3d 1020 (2008), following St. v. Reavley, 2003 MT 298, 318 M 150, 79 P3d 270 (2003).

Defendant's Double Jeopardy Argument Fails: The City Court's granting of the state's motion to dismiss charges to which the defendant wished to plead guilty had no effect on his pending District Court charges as the defendant had no constitutional right to use a double jeopardy argument to defend against District Court charges. St. v. Milligan, 2008 MT 375, 346 M 491, 197 P3d 956 (2008).

No Triple Jeopardy in Prosecution of Misdemeanor Absent Prosecutorial Intent to Provoke Mistrial: At Mouat's misdemeanor DUI trial, the city prosecutor presented a videotape of Mouat's arrest, which showed the arresting officer asking Mouat about previous DUI arrests. Mouat moved for and was granted a mistrial. The trial court found that admission of the offending statement was an inadvertent oversight by both parties and ordered the city to redact the statement from the tape. Nevertheless, despite the city's efforts, at the next trial, the statement was still slightly audible, and Mouat again moved for and was granted a mistrial. Mouat then asserted that, based on double jeopardy and fundamental fairness grounds, the prosecution should not be granted a third trial in a misdemeanor case when the cause was negligence on the part of the government. The Supreme Court disagreed, citing St. v. Mallak, 2005 MT 49, 326 M 165, 109 P3d 209 (2005), for the proposition that when a mistrial is declared on a defendant's motion, double jeopardy does not bar a subsequent trial unless the governmental conduct in question was intended to goad defendant into moving for a mistrial. Billings v. Mouat, 2008 MT 66, 342 M 79, 180 P3d 1121 (2008).

Violation of Motion In Limine in First Trial Not Grounds for Double Jeopardy Dismissal in Second Trial: Mallak contended that the state goaded him into moving for a mistrial by purposely violating a motion in limine prohibiting testimony of Mallak's prior violent conduct and that under Oreg. v. Kennedy, 456 US 667 (1982), and St. v. Laster, 223 M 152, 724 P2d 721 (1986), a second trial was a violation of double jeopardy. The Supreme Court disagreed. The part of the testimony that Mallak objected to was a product of the prosecutor's inadvertence, not intention, and did not inevitably lead to a violation of the motion in limine, unlike the inherently violative questioning in Laster. Thus, double jeopardy did not apply, and the trial court did not err in denying Mallak's motion to dismiss the charges. St. v. Mallak, 2005 MT 49, 326 M 165, 109 P3d 209 (2005), followed in Billings v. Mouat, 2008 MT 66, 342 M 79, 180 P3d 1121 (2008), regarding the principle that when a mistrial is declared on a defendant's motion, double jeopardy does not bar a subsequent trial unless the governmental conduct in question was intended to goad defendant into moving for a mistrial, and followed in Helena v. Whittinghill, 2009 MT 343, 353 M 131, 219 P3d 1244 (2009), to the extent that it is insufficient to bar a retrial absent intent on the part of the prosecutor to subvert the protections afforded by the double jeopardy clause, even when the prosecutor's conduct prompting the mistrial motion constitutes harassment or overreaching.

Reprosecution of Homicide Charges Precluded by Double Jeopardy After Initial Finding of Innocence: Demontiney was charged with deliberate homicide, mitigated deliberate homicide, and negligent homicide. The jury returned a verdict of not guilty on deliberate homicide and guilty on mitigated deliberate homicide. The Supreme Court vacated the conviction because a mitigated deliberate homicide conviction without a deliberate homicide conviction is logically impossible. The state sought a retrial, but the Supreme Court disallowed a retrial on any of the three charges on double jeopardy grounds. Demontiney was found not guilty of deliberate homicide and could not be retried on that charge. The mitigated deliberate homicide conviction was vacated, so that charge could not be retried. Further, under this section, the state may not prosecute a defendant on the same transaction when two or more offenses are known to the prosecutor, supported by probable cause, and consummated prior to the original charge when the former prosecution resulted in an acquittal. The negligent homicide charge was known, supported, and consummated, and the original prosecution ultimately resulted in an acquittal, so retrial on negligent homicide was also prohibited. Demontiney v. District Court, 2002 MT 161, 310 M 406, 51 P3d 476 (2002).

Criminal Counts Part of Same Transaction Not Subject to Further Prosecution: In arguing that defendant's conduct attributable to Munchausen Syndrome by Proxy (MSBP) was part of the same transaction that led to joinder of offenses of similar character under 46-11-404, the state could not adopt a contrary position and argue that the counts were not part of the same transaction for purposes of further prosecution under this section. Although 46-11-404 does allow joinder of offenses of the same or similar character as well as those arising out of the same transaction, the distinction was irrelevant in this case because the state's theory was always that defendant's conduct attributable to MSBP was part of the same transaction. The Supreme Court held that MSBP is a criminal objective—namely, seeking of attention through harming one's children—so defendant's actions toward two children came within the same transaction; thus, further prosecution for one child's death was barred by a former prosecution that resulted in a conviction for criminal endangerment of another child. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000). See also St. v. Waldrup, 264 M 456, 872 P2d 772 (1994).

DUI and Negligent Homicide Arising From Same Accident Not Part of Same Transaction — No Double Jeopardy: Booth pleaded guilty in Justice's Court to a DUI charge and claimed double jeopardy when he was subsequently charged in District Court with two counts of negligent homicide arising out of the accident that led to the DUI charge and conviction. Neither 46-11-504 nor this section barred the District Court charges. Under each section, double jeopardy requires that the offenses arise out of the same transaction. Because Booth's conduct in allegedly causing the two deaths was not motivated by a purpose to accomplish the criminal objective of DUI, the DUI and negligent homicide offenses did not arise out of the same transaction within the meaning of the statutory definition of "same transaction" as conduct consisting of a series of acts that are motivated by a purpose to accomplish a criminal objective and that are necessary or incidental to the accomplishment of that objective. State ex rel. Booth v. District Court, 1998 MT 344, 292 M 371, 972 P2d 325, 55 St. Rep. 1395 (1998), followed in St. v. Condo, 2008 MT 114, 342 M 468, 182 P3d 57 (2008).

Negligent Homicide Charges After DUI Guilty Plea — Supervisory Control to Avoid Double Jeopardy Trial: If the District Court's conclusion that the Justice's Court plea of guilty to DUI did not bar subsequent prosecution of two negligent homicide charges arising out of the same auto accident as the DUI charge is proved, on appeal, to be incorrect, the defendant will have been subjected to prosecution even though double jeopardy entitled him to avoid prosecution altogether. Thus, it is clear that an appeal would not be an adequate remedy, and the defendant's application to the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control presented legal issues appropriate for the Supreme Court's consideration and would be accepted and decided. State ex rel. Booth v. District Court, 1998 MT 344, 292 M 371, 972 P2d 325, 55 St. Rep. 1395 (1998).

"Offenses Lie in a Single Court" — Does Not Mean They Occur in Same Court: The reference in this section to two or more offenses in regard to which "jurisdiction and venue of the offenses lie in a single court" requires that jurisdiction and venue lie in a single court; the phrase does not require that, when double jeopardy is claimed, the former and subsequent prosecutions occur in the same court. State ex rel. Booth v. District Court, 1998 MT 344, 292 M 371, 972 P2d 325, 55 St. Rep. 1395 (1998), followed in St. v. Condo, 2008 MT 114, 342 M 468, 182 P3d 57 (2008).

No Double Jeopardy — Initial Single Count Misdemeanor Charge Converted to Felony Bad Check Common Scheme: Vargas was charged with a single count of misdemeanor issuing a bad check despite the fact that the complaint alleged that he had written 10 bad checks over a 3-week period. He pleaded guilty and was given a 6-month suspended jail sentence. Several months later, the County Attorney was notified that Vargas had written an additional 18 bad checks during the same 3-week period. In light of the new information, Vargas was charged with a felony for issuing all 28 bad checks, common scheme. Vargas moved to dismiss this information, claiming that under double jeopardy protections, his prior misdemeanor conviction prevented additional punishment for the same conduct for which he had been convicted. The District Court denied the motion to dismiss. Vargas changed his plea to guilty but reserved the right to appeal on double jeopardy grounds and, in doing so, maintained that the state violated his right to be free from a second prosecution for the same offense when it charged him with felony common scheme based in part on a check that had formed the basis for a prior misdemeanor conviction. Pursuant to Brown v. Ohio, 432 US 161, 53 L Ed 2d 187, 97 S Ct 2221 (1977), the general rule is that the double jeopardy clause prohibits the state or federal government from trying a defendant for a greater offense after it has convicted that defendant of a lesser included offense. Although Vargas's argument was consistent with Brown, it did not take into account the significant exceptions to the general rule that were set out in Jeffers v. U.S., 432 US 137, 53 L Ed 2d 168, 97 S Ct 2207 (1977). Under Jeffers, a subsequent prosecution for a greater crime is allowed if: (1) all the elements necessary to the greater crime had not taken place at the time prosecution for the lesser crime had begun; or (2) the facts necessary to show the greater crime had not been discovered by the state before the first trial, despite the exercise of due diligence. Pursuant to U.S. v. Stricklin, 591 F2d 1112 (5th Cir. 1979), once the defendant makes a prima facie case of double jeopardy, it is the state's responsibility to demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence that it exercised due diligence in discovering all relevant facts before the first trial or, as in this case, before the guilty plea. The case was remanded for further proceedings on the question of whether the state exercised due diligence. St. v. Vargas, 279 M 357, 928 P2d 165, 53 St. Rep. 1184 (1996).

Indecent Exposure to Different Victims on Different Dates Not Considered Same Transaction — Prosecution Not Barred: After charging Waldrup with three counts of indecent exposure, to which he pleaded guilty on two counts, police continued to investigate previous reports of a man exposing himself. Waldrup was a suspect. After Waldrup was identified from a photographic lineup, he was charged with four additional counts of indecent exposure in incidents involving four different victims. Under 45-5-504, a third or subsequent conviction of indecent exposure allows for enhancement of punishment to a felony. Waldrup moved to dismiss the charges on the grounds that prosecution was barred for reasons of fundamental fairness and violation of constitutional provisions. The District Court granted the dismissal motion on the basis of double jeopardy. About 1 week after dismissal, the Supreme Court decided St. v. Berger, 259 M 364, 856 P2d 552 (1993), holding that the 1991 amendments to this section did not eliminate the "same transaction" requirement or expand statutory protection to unrelated offenses. Because the charges against Waldrup were based on incidents that were not part of the same transaction, within the meaning of 46-1-202, the incidents could not be considered part of a plan resulting in the repeated commission of the same offense against the same person. Thus, prosecution of the four later counts was not precluded. St. v. Waldrup, 264 M 456, 872 P2d 772, 51 St. Rep. 344 (1994).

Double Jeopardy — Vacating Trial When Defendant Requested Attorney After First Witness Was Sworn: After the first witness was sworn and testified in a prosecution for two misdemeanors, the judge asked defendant about a letter in the court file indicating that defendant had a public defender. Defendant said that he had not been in touch with the public defender and that he wanted a lawyer. The court vacated the trial to allow defendant a chance to obtain counsel. At a trial held 11 months later, a motion to dismiss because jeopardy attached after the first witness was sworn in the first trial was properly denied. Defendant's request for counsel prompted the vacation of the first trial, and the vacation worked to his advantage because he secured the public defender's representation. Found to be without merit was defendant's claim that the legal defect at the first trial, which the court feared might arise from lack of counsel, would not have occurred because the consequence of failure to appoint counsel would only prohibit the judge, under 46-8-101, from including jail time in the sentence. St. v. Stringer, 263 M 295, 868 P2d 588, 51 St. Rep. 63 (1994).

No Double Jeopardy From Drug Transactions: Defendant, who pleaded guilty to possession of dangerous drugs, was also charged with criminal sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs)—an offense that was not a part of the "same transaction". Defendant appealed the criminal sale conviction, arguing that recent amendments to the double jeopardy law eliminated the "same transaction" requirement and expanded the protection of the law to unrelated offenses. Affirming the District Court decision, the Supreme Court ruled that this section does not bar unrelated prosecutions that result from separate transactions. St. v. Berger, 259 M 364, 856 P2d 552, 50 St. Rep. 836 (1993).

Trying Defendant Twice in Five-Year Period for Second Offense DUI Not Double Jeopardy: The defendant was convicted of DUI at 17 years of age. Several months later when he was 18, the defendant was arrested for a second incident and tried and convicted for DUI, second offense. Two years later, the defendant was arrested for a third time, initially with a third offense DUI. The prosecution amended the charge to a second offense DUI upon learning that the defendant had been a juvenile when convicted the first time. The defendant argued that charging him twice within a 5-year period under Montana's DUI scheme for second offense DUI constituted double jeopardy. The Supreme Court held that it was not double jeopardy because the defendant was not being tried twice for the same occurrence. Each charge arose from a separate set of facts. The court further stated that although the first conviction for second offense DUI might not have been correct since the first DUI conviction had occurred when the defendant was a minor, the second charge for a second offense DUI was proper. St. v. Chasse, 240 M 341, 783 P2d 1370, 46 St. Rep. 2178 (1989).

Sexual Intercourse Without Consent Not Lesser Included Offense of Aggravated Kidnapping: Under the rationale of 46-11-502 (renumbered 46-11-410) and the standard set out in St. v. Thornton, 218 M 317, 708 P2d 273 (1985), sexual intercourse without consent is not a lesser included offense of aggravated kidnapping. St. v. Clawson, 239 M 413, 781 P2d 267, 46 St. Rep. 1792 (1989).

Failure of Hung Jury to Decide Issue — No Bar to Subsequent Prosecution: Defendant was prosecuted for felony escape, which required a finding of assault, but the jury hung on the issue and explicitly failed to come to any conclusion regarding whether an assault occurred. The jury convicted him of misdemeanor escape, which did not involve a finding of assault, and because there was no determination of whether an assault occurred, the issue was a proper subject for a second trial and not blocked by res judicata. St. v. Hawkins, 239 M 404, 781 P2d 259, 46 St. Rep. 1786 (1989).

Offenses Revealed in Treatment as Part of Plea Bargain — Further Prosecution Barred: As a prerequisite to a plea bargain, defendant was required to participate in a treatment program. In order to be accepted for treatment, he had to undergo an evaluation of his amenability to treatment. An indication of his amenability was his willingness to admit his past behavior. Unless the evaluator believed defendant had admitted all offenses, defendant would not be accepted into the program. If not accepted, plea negotiations would cease and defendant would face a prison sentence or fine. Hence, in order to ensure the continuance of negotiations, defendant waived his right to silence and underwent evaluation. When defendant admitted further crimes during evaluation, the state sought a sentence in excess of that agreed upon in the plea bargain. The Supreme Court held that fundamental fairness forbade the state from prosecuting the defendant for offenses for which he had essentially already been punished. St. v. Thiel, 236 M 63, 768 P2d 343, 46 St. Rep. 182 (1989).

Midtrial Dismissal of Jury Upon Appeal by State of Adverse Evidentiary Ruling — Second Trial as Double Jeopardy: After a DUI negligent homicide trial began, the state decided to appeal the trial court's order sustaining objection to the admissibility of blood analyses based on improper chain of custody of the blood samples. The trial court dismissed the jury upon the state's decision to initiate the interlocutory appeal. The Supreme Court held that these circumstances do not show a manifest necessity to terminate the trial, in accordance with Wade v. Hunter, 336 US 684 (1949), and therefore a second trial would constitute double jeopardy. The court further stated that, as a general rule, a ruling on the admission of evidence which is adverse to the state does not constitute an urgent circumstance or a plain and obvious case constituting manifest necessity to discontinue the trial and allow an interlocutory appeal. St. v. Carney, 219 M 412, 714 P2d 532, 43 St. Rep. 54 (1986), distinguished in St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543, 49 St. Rep. 132 (1992).

Pretrial Dismissal of Case Following Conviction in Similar Case — Use of Evidence Seized Upon Arrest on Dismissed Charge: After tribal court ordered defendant to stay away from a certain residence, he broke into it and was convicted in tribal court of criminal contempt of the court. He was then charged in the Justice's Court with criminal mischief and criminal trespass, arrested, searched, and charged in the District Court with illegal possession of dangerous drugs found during the search. The Justice's Court action was then dismissed. Defendant argued the arrest and search were illegal as the arrest was for a crime growing out of an action that was the subject of a prior conviction and that double jeopardy attached and the evidence obtained during the search was illegal. A second jeopardy did not attach because the Justice's Court action was dismissed before either a jury was empaneled and sworn or the court began to hear evidence. Thus, there was no double jeopardy requiring suppression of the evidence. St. v. Caye, 203 M 6, 659 P2d 841, 40 St. Rep. 258 (1983).

Conviction of Nonexistent Crime: Hembd was convicted of a nonexistent crime, attempted negligent arson. The jury was given instruction on several crimes, some of which existed. In this case, the jury's verdict is an implicit acquittal of the other charges. It would be a violation of the guarantee against being twice put in jeopardy for the same offense if Hembd were tried. The conviction was therefore reversed with instructions to dismiss the action. St. v. Hembd, 197 M 438, 643 P2d 567, 39 St. Rep. 653 (1982).

Lost Trial Notes — New Trial Granted — No Double Jeopardy: Defendant did not oppose an order granting him a new trial because the court reporter lost his trial notes but alleged double jeopardy when he failed to get acquitted at the second trial. No valid double jeopardy claim existed because the defendant was not forced to accept retrial. He had available to him procedures under 46-20-304, albeit not totally sufficient, to appeal without benefit of an actual verbatim transcript. Allegations of violation of the right to a speedy trial were unfounded since the initial trial was timely. St. v. Hodgson, 184 M 394, 603 P2d 246 (1979).

Jeopardy — When Attaches in Jury Trial — United States Constitution:

This section's provision that jeopardy does not attach until the first witness is sworn cannot constitutionally be applied in a jury trial. The federal rule that jeopardy attaches in a jury trial when the jury is empaneled and sworn is an integral part of the United States Constitution's guaranty against double jeopardy (similar to Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const.) and is binding on the states. Crist v. Bretz, 437 US 28, 57 L Ed 2d 24, 98 S Ct 2156 (1978), followed in St. v. Carney, 219 M 412, 714 P2d 532, 43 St. Rep. 54 (1986), and Keating v. Sherlock, 278 M 218, 924 P2d 1297, 53 St. Rep. 855 (1996).

The federal procedural rule that the trial commences on the swearing of the jury is not mandatory on states. The Montana rule that the trial commences on the swearing of the first witness is not a violation of the double jeopardy prohibition as the real protection against prosecutorial manipulation is the discretion of the trial judge in granting or denying dismissal. Cunningham v. District Court, 406 F. Supp. 430 (D.C. Mont. 1975); overruled by Crist v. Bretz, 437 US 28, 57 L Ed 2d 24, 98 S Ct 2156 (1978).

This section is not in conflict with the federal double jeopardy provision because the federal rule as to when jeopardy attached is not constitutionally mandatory and is not in conflict with Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const., because that provision left the Legislature free to make the determination of when jeopardy attaches. St. v. Cunningham, 166 M 530, 535 P2d 186 (1975); overruled by Crist v. Bretz, 437 US 28, 57 L Ed 2d 24, 98 S Ct 2156 (1978).

Acquittal — Double Jeopardy: An acquittal is not appealable by the State without putting the defendant twice in jeopardy. St. v. Cool, 174 M 99, 568 P2d 567 (1977).

Same Transaction — Later Charge Not Particularized: An information that did not particularize the charge against the defendant was not fatally defective since prosecution for the same transaction that resulted in the earlier conviction is expressly barred. St. v. Dunn, 155 M 319, 472 P2d 288 (1970).

Double Jeopardy — Two Informations Pending: The mere pendency of a prior information does not sustain the plea of former jeopardy. When there are two informations pending charging the same offense, until there has been a trial or the defendant has been placed in jeopardy under one information, the plea of former jeopardy is not available as against the other. St. v. Aus, 105 M 82, 69 P2d 584 (1937).

New Trial Not Double Jeopardy: In a prosecution for the larceny of one of four colts, all stolen at the same time and place, the defendant was convicted and served about a month in the state prison when a new trial was granted him for want of proper proof of ownership of the colt. Thereupon a new information was filed charging the theft of one of the other three colts, and the defendant interposed a plea of once in jeopardy, which was properly denied, not because of a different offense, theft of four colts at the same time constituting but one offense, but because in the granting of a new trial he is in the same jeopardy. St. v. Aus, 105 M 82, 69 P2d 584 (1937).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute preserves 1987 MCA 46-11-504 and qualifies what may otherwise appear as a blanket protection against further prosecution by adding the phrase "under the same circumstances barring further prosecution in this state". Subsection (1) adopts 1987 MCA 46-11-504(1) but eliminates a reference to another code section.

Subsection (2) has been changed to eliminate unnecessary language.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 162 in introductory clause substituted present language concerning prosecution in another jurisdiction for former language that read: "When conduct constitutes an offense within the concurrent jurisdiction of this state and of the United States or another state or of two courts of separate, overlapping, or concurrent jurisdiction in this state, a prosecution in any other jurisdiction is a bar to a subsequent prosecution in this state under the same circumstances barring further prosecution in this state if". Amendment effective March 26, 1997.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 162, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, the Montana Supreme Court has suggested in State v. Pierce, 199 Mont. 57 (1982), State v. Sword, 229 Mont. 370 (1987), and State v. Tadewaldt, 53 St. Rep. 635 (1996), that the concurrent jurisdiction provisions of section 46-11-504, MCA, be clarified."

Applicability: Section 2, Ch. 162, L. 1997, provided: "[Section 1] [46-11-504] applies to offenses occurring on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective March 26, 1997.

1991 Amendment: At end of introductory clause inserted "barring further prosecution in this state if"; in (1), after "conviction", deleted "as defined in 46-11-503"; near beginning of (2) substituted "charge" for "complaint" and after "filed" deleted "on a misdemeanor charge or after the information had been filed or the indictment found on a felony charge"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Conviction of Sexual Exploitation of Children and Child Pornography in Federal Court Barring State Prosecution of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: Neufeld began having sexual intercourse with a 13-year-old child in 2002 or 2003, which continued until Neufeld joined the army in 2005. Neufeld was charged with sexual intercourse without consent in Montana in 2006, and the same day he was charged in federal court with sexual exploitation of children and receipt and possession of child pornography. Neufeld was ultimately convicted in federal court and sentenced to 262 months in federal prison. Neufeld moved to dismiss the state charges, and the motion was granted. The state appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Neufeld's sexual contacts with the minor constituted a crime under both state and federal law, and the federal sentence incorporated the same prohibited conduct. Therefore, the Montana prosecution was barred under 46-11-504. St. v. Neufeld, 2009 MT 235, 351 M 389, 212 P3d 1063 (2009).

Bond Forfeiture Not Generally Synonymous With Conviction — No Double Jeopardy for Assault Proceedings: Toth forfeited bond for disorderly conduct that occurred on the same day that he was charged with assault with a weapon. Toth claimed that if the bond forfeiture arose from the same events that led to the assault charge, double jeopardy would bar further conviction for assault. The Supreme Court disagreed. Absent specific legislation to that effect, bond forfeiture is not generally synonymous with a conviction for double jeopardy purposes. Bond forfeiture is essentially a civil action and is not admissible as evidence in any other civil action, but bond forfeiture is included within the definition of conviction for particular statutorily delineated purposes only, not including assault. Thus, even if Toth's felony assault charge bond forfeiture arose out of the same transaction as the disorderly conduct, jeopardy did not attach by the bond forfeiture, so Toth's claim failed. St. v. Toth, 2008 MT 404, 347 M 184, 197 P3d 1013 (2008). See also Scott v. S. Carolina, 513 SE 2d 100 (S.C. 1999).

Revocation of Federal Probation Not Considered Prosecution Under State Law — No Double Jeopardy Violation: In 1991, Maki was convicted in federal court of five offenses. While on supervised probation for the federal offenses in 2006, Maki violated the terms of supervised release by manufacturing and distributing drugs in Montana and his federal probation was revoked. Maki was subsequently charged with felony drug violations in Montana. Maki moved to dismiss the state charges on double jeopardy grounds, asserting that he would face double punishment for the same conduct that formed the basis for the federal revocation if the state prosecution was continued. The District Court reasoned that Maki had not faced new charges in federal court, so double jeopardy did not apply with respect to the federal court's use of the state violation as a basis for revocation. Therefore, the District Court denied the motion, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Under 46-11-504, when conduct constitutes an offense within the jurisdiction of a state or federal court, a prosecution in any jurisdiction is a bar to subsequent prosecution in Montana if the prosecution resulted in an acquittal or conviction and a subsequent prosecution is based on an offense arising out of the same transaction. However, the federal revocation proceeding was not a prosecution as contemplated in 46-11-504, so the state was not barred from prosecuting Maki for felony drug charges. Additionally, the basis of a revocation proceeding is a violation of a sentencing condition and is not a second punishment for the underlying offense, so Maki's double jeopardy argument failed. St. v. Maki, 2008 MT 379, 347 M 24, 196 P3d 1281 (2008).

Defendant's Double Jeopardy Argument Fails: The City Court's granting of the state's motion to dismiss charges to which the defendant wished to plead guilty had no effect on his pending District Court charges as the defendant had no constitutional right to use a double jeopardy argument to defend against District Court charges. St. v. Milligan, 2008 MT 375, 346 M 491, 197 P3d 956 (2008).

Conviction of Possessing Stolen Vehicle in Washington Barring Prosecution for Theft of Same Vehicle in Montana: Cech stole a car in Montana and drove it to Washington where he was arrested and convicted of possession of stolen property. Cech was subsequently charged in Montana for theft of the same vehicle. At the Montana trial, Cech asserted double jeopardy. The trial court determined prosecution was not prohibited because the offenses were not the same and because Cech did not meet the first part of the three-part test in St. v. Tadewaldt, 277 M 261, 922 P2d 463 (1996), which provides that subsequent prosecution is barred if a defendant's conduct constitutes an offense within the jurisdiction of the court in which the first prosecution occurred and within the jurisdiction of the court in which the subsequent prosecution is pursued. On appeal, the Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. The underlying conduct that served as a basis for both prosecutions sought to accomplish the same criminal objective of controlling the stolen vehicle that led to the filing of analogous charges directed at that conduct in both states. Cech could not have been charged with possession of the stolen car in Washington if he had not first stolen the car in Montana and taken it to Washington. Thus, the charges arose out of the same transaction, and the double jeopardy provisions of this section barred the subsequent prosecution for theft in Montana. St. v. Cech, 2007 MT 184, 338 M 330, 167 P3d 389 (2007). See also St. v. Sword, 229 M 370, 747 P2d 206 (1987).

State Deliberate Homicide Prosecution Not Barred by Federal Conviction for Firearm Possession: Gazda, a felon, was charged in federal court with unlawful possession of a firearm and ammunition. Prior to the federal trial, Gazda was charged in Montana with deliberate homicide. Following the federal conviction, Gazda moved to dismiss the state charge, arguing that he was placed twice in jeopardy because the prosecution had presented evidence in the federal case that he had committed the homicide. To determine if the subsequent prosecution was barred under this section, the Supreme Court applied the three-part test in St. v. Tadewaldt, 277 M 261, 922 P2d 463 (1996), which sets out that subsequent prosecution is barred if: (1) a defendant's conduct constitutes an offense within the jurisdiction of the court in which the first prosecution occurred and within the jurisdiction of the court in which the subsequent prosecution is pursued; (2) the first prosecution results in acquittal or conviction; and (3) the subsequent prosecution is based on an offense arising out of the same transaction. The District Court found that the first and third factors were not met, and the Supreme Court agreed. The concurrent jurisdiction factor failed because the state and federal courts lacked authority to prosecute equivalent offenses based on the same underlying conduct. The same transaction factor failed because the conduct to support the criminal objective of the state deliberate homicide charge was distinct from the federal weapons charge. Thus, double jeopardy did not bar the subsequent state prosecution. St. v. Gazda, 2003 MT 350, 318 M 516, 82 P3d 20 (2003).

DUI and Negligent Homicide Arising From Same Accident Not Part of Same Transaction — No Double Jeopardy: Booth pleaded guilty in Justice's Court to a DUI charge and claimed double jeopardy when he was subsequently charged in District Court with two counts of negligent homicide arising out of the accident that led to the DUI charge and conviction. Neither 46-11-503 nor this section barred the District Court charges. Under each section, double jeopardy requires that the offenses arise out of the same transaction. Because Booth's conduct in allegedly causing the two deaths was not motivated by a purpose to accomplish the criminal objective of DUI, the DUI and negligent homicide offenses did not arise out of the same transaction within the meaning of the statutory definition of "same transaction" as conduct consisting of a series of acts that are motivated by a purpose to accomplish a criminal objective and that are necessary or incidental to the accomplishment of that objective. State ex rel. Booth v. District Court, 1998 MT 344, 292 M 371, 972 P2d 325, 55 St. Rep. 1395 (1998), followed in St. v. Condo, 2008 MT 114, 342 M 468, 182 P3d 57 (2008).

Misdemeanor Traffic Offenses in Tribal Court and Felony DUI in State District Court Not Arising From Same Transaction — No Double Jeopardy: Couture was cited for two misdemeanor traffic offenses in tribal court. A few days later he was moved to state District Court and charged with felony DUI, sixth offense. He pleaded guilty to the tribal court misdemeanors and then sought dismissal of the District Court felony on grounds of double jeopardy. He contended that because the offenses all arose from the same transaction and he had been convicted in tribal court, prosecution in District Court was barred under this section. The District Court properly held that the misdemeanors—driving without a license and without proof of insurance—were unrelated to the criminal objective of DUI. Because by definition the offenses did not arise out of the same transaction, the District Court felony prosecution did not constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Couture, 1998 MT 137, 289 M 215, 959 P2d 948, 55 St. Rep. 548 (1998), following St. v. Sword, 229 M 370, 747 P2d 206 (1987).

Prosecution for Possession Not Barred by Prior Conviction for DUI as Arising From Same Transaction: Tadewaldt argued that he could not be tried for felony possession of dangerous drugs because that charge arose out of the same transaction that resulted in his DUI conviction. The Supreme Court upheld the second conviction on the grounds that the DUI resulted from his being arrested for drugs that he had ingested. The DUI was not the same transaction as the charge for drugs in his possession that were found on his person subsequent to his being stopped for DUI. St. v. Tadewaldt, 277 M 261, 922 P2d 463, 53 St. Rep. 635 (1996), following the rationale of St. v. Sword, 229 M 370, 747 P2d 206 (1987).

Failure to Raise Double Jeopardy Argument at Trial — Insufficient Record: The Supreme Court refused to consider a double jeopardy argument that was not raised in a timely fashion at trial, given that the record presented for review was insufficient to establish a double jeopardy defense. St. v. Dahms, 252 M 1, 825 P2d 1214, 49 St. Rep. 106 (1992).

Bear Killed Unlawfully — State Prosecution Barred: Defendant was charged in state District Court for subscribing to a materially false statement on an application for a grizzly bear trophy license and was charged and convicted in federal District Court for violating the Endangered Species Act for taking the same trophy. The federal court and the state court have concurrent jurisdiction, and the state prosecution is barred as it is based on an offense arising out of the same transaction as the federal charge. (See 1997 amendment). St. v. Sword, 229 M 370, 747 P2d 206, 44 St. Rep. 2053 (1987).

Trial for Federal Offense Following State Conviction: This section did not preclude a federal prosecution for being a felon in possession of a firearm, following a state felony conviction for criminal mischief. Even if this section did preclude the federal prosecution, the section would be void to the extent of any conflict with federal law. U.S. v. Engesser, 788 F2d 1401 (9th Cir. 1986).

Pretrial Dismissal of Case Following Conviction in Similar Case — Use of Evidence Seized Upon Arrest on Dismissed Charge: After tribal court ordered defendant to stay away from a certain residence, he broke into it and was convicted in tribal court of criminal contempt of the court. He was then charged in the Justice's Court with criminal mischief and criminal trespass, arrested, searched, and charged in the District Court with illegal possession of dangerous drugs found during the search. The Justice's Court action was then dismissed. Defendant argued the arrest and search were illegal as the arrest was for a crime growing out of an action that was the subject of a prior conviction and that double jeopardy attached and the evidence obtained during the search was illegal. A second jeopardy did not attach because the Justice's Court action was dismissed before either a jury was empaneled and sworn or the court began to hear evidence. Thus, there was no double jeopardy requiring suppression of the evidence. St. v. Caye, 203 M 6, 659 P2d 841, 40 St. Rep. 258 (1983).

Double Jeopardy — Assault Conviction in District Court — Driving Under the Influence Conviction in Justice's Court: The defendant's involvement in a vehicular accident resulted in his conviction in Justice's Court of driving under the influence of alcohol and his conviction in District Court of aggravated assault. The defendant's constitutional right against being placed in double jeopardy was not violated as each offense requires proof of a fact the other does not. Driving under the influence requires proof of intoxication, while assault does not. Assault requires proof of bodily injury, while driving under the influence does not. (See 1997 amendment.) St. v. Pierce, 199 M 57, 647 P2d 847, 39 St. Rep. 1205 (1982).

Reckless Driving and Criminal Mischief From Same Transaction: The state of Montana is barred from prosecuting a criminal mischief charge under 46-11-504 where the defendant was previously convicted of reckless driving. The acts that are concerned with reckless driving are also those necessary to establish the felony crime of criminal mischief; the "same transaction" test of 46-11-501 (now repealed) is met. St. v. Houser, 192 M 164, 626 P2d 256, 38 St. Rep. 538 (1981).

State Prosecution Barred: The defendant's conduct constituted an offense within the concurrent jurisdiction of the United States and Montana raising the bar against subsequent state prosecution under this section. The fact that federal authorities chose to prosecute and convict the defendant for making false statements to secure funds (18 U.S.C. §1001) rather than for appropriating funds to his own use (embezzlement under section 94-1501, R.C.M. 1947, which is now found in 45-6-301, 45-7-208, and 45-7-401, MCA) did not destroy the required concurrent jurisdiction. However, this rule was applied prospectively to further proceedings in the case and not retrospectively. St. v. Zimmerman, 175 M 179, 573 P2d 174 (1977), distinguished in St. v. Gruendemann, 282 M 128, 935 P2d 1110, 54 St. Rep. 275 (1997). See also St. v. Sword, 229 M 370, 747 P2d 206, 44 St. Rep. 2053 (1987).

Same Offense: Conviction on federal indictment charging the making of false statements regarding misuse of grant money awarded defendant to do research does not bar a subsequent state prosecution for embezzlement, as a single act may be an offense against two statutes. If each statute requires proof of an additional fact which the other does not a conviction under either statute does not exempt the defendant from prosecution and punishment under the other. To establish the federal crime of making a false statement only evidence that a false statement was made is required; while embezzlement requires evidence of an unlawful appropriation of state funds for defendant's own use. State ex rel. Zimmerman v. District Court, 168 M 289, 541 P2d 1215 (1975).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute retains the provisions established in 1987 MCA 46-11-505. In adopting this statute, 1987 MCA 46-11-505(2) was not retained because it provided for such an unlikely situation that inclusion was considered unnecessary.

No changes in established procedure are intended with the adoption of this statute.

1991 Amendment: At end of introductory clause deleted "within the meaning of 46-11-503 and 46-11-504 under any one or more of the following circumstances"; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) The former prosecution was procured by the defendant without the knowledge of the proper prosecuting officer or with the purpose of avoiding the sentence which might otherwise be imposed"; and made minor changes in style.

Retrial — Collateral Estoppel: Collateral estoppel applies only when an issue of ultimate fact has been previously determined by a valid and final judgment and only if the applicability inquiry is set in a practical frame and viewed with an eye to all the circumstances of the proceedings. The court examined the record of the prior proceedings, took into account the pleadings, evidence, charge, and other relevant matters, and concluded that the first jury could have grounded its verdict of guilty of robbery on issues other than those required for deliberate homicide. The retrial was ordered because the jury had been erroneously instructed that the defendant could be acquitted of deliberate homicide even though he was guilty of the underlying felony robbery. Collateral estoppel did not apply. St. v. Bad Horse, 185 M 507, 605 P2d 1113 (1980).

Retrial — Double Jeopardy: A defendant is not subjected to double jeopardy by virtue of his retrial after reversal of his judgment of conviction. The original conviction of robbery could have been sustained except for errors. The court did not believe that because the defendant was not guilty of deliberate homicide that he was likewise guiltless of the underlying charge of robbery. The remand was founded on the right of receiving a trial with a properly instructed jury. Double jeopardy did not apply. St. v. Bad Horse, 185 M 507, 605 P2d 1113 (1980).

Mistrial — Claim of Double Jeopardy: After a motion for a mistrial was granted, the defendant's petition to the Supreme Court for dismissal of the subsequent trial on the ground of double jeopardy was dismissed, since the defendant had not yet been adjudged guilty of any offense. State ex rel. LaFlesch v. District Court, 165 M 302, 529 P2d 1403 (1974), overruled in Keating v. Sherlock, 278 M 218, 924 P2d 1297, 53 St. Rep. 855 (1996).

New Trial Not Double Jeopardy: When one convicted of crime is granted a new trial, he is not placed in new jeopardy by the second trial but is in the same jeopardy he was in when the first trial was had. St. v. Aus, 105 M 82, 69 P2d 584 (1937).

The section is controlled by [1889] Montana Constitution, Article III, section 17 [slightly modified in Art. II, sec. 23, 1972 Mont. Const.]. The language was expanded to cover any type of procedure used to hold the defendant although it is in the preliminary examination section. The only change from the constitutional language allows the court to retain witnesses for the defendant as well as for the state. The section is a partial duplication of [Title 46, ch. 15, part 2], however, because it is a special application of the procedure, it was included here.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute adopts the American Bar Association (ABA) Standard for Criminal Justice 8-3.2 (1978) as the appropriate test for the closure of pretrial proceedings. The Montana Supreme Court has stated that this standard will be applied when reviewing pretrial closure issues. See State ex rel. Smith v. District Court, 201 Mont. 376 (1982). In Smith, the court indicated that it was abandoning a previously applied standard of "strict and irreparable necessity". Id. at 384, citing Great Falls Tribune v. District Court, 186 Mont. 433 (1980). The court noted that the ABA standard "is a revised and more exacting standard than the one proposed by the defendant". Smith at 385 (emphasis added).

However, the Montana Supreme Court has appeared to revitalize the irreparable necessity standard. See St. v. Nichols, 225 Mont. 438 (1987). The ABA standard is more appropriate and better defined than any other applied by the court. Therefore, the ABA Standard for Criminal Justice 8-3.2 (1978) has been adopted to control the closure of pretrial proceedings.

Chapter 262 in (3), before "motion to suppress", inserted "hearing on a"; and deleted (6) that read: "(6) An affidavit filed in support of a motion for leave to file a charge or warrant must be sealed unless the judge determines that disclosure of the information in the affidavit is required to protect the health, safety, or welfare of the public."

Case Notes

Lack of Evidentiary Hearing to Determine Whether Dissemination of Trial Information Would Jeopardize Trial Fairness — Media Involvement — "Pretrial Proceeding" Construed: The District Court did not conduct an evidentiary hearing or consider reasonable alternatives before issuing an order barring anyone involved in a criminal case from disseminating evidentiary information to the press or public and sealing evidentiary documents. The Missoulian newspaper sought to reverse the gag order. The Supreme Court, exercising supervisory control, applied the phrase "pretrial proceeding" in this section to include all documents filed in conjunction with the pretrial process, regardless of whether the documents constitute records of a specific court hearing. Even though the gag order was entered with the consent of both counsel, that consent did not override the clear intent of this section to balance the public's right to know with the defendant's right to a fair trial, a balancing that can only be accomplished by including the media in the decisionmaking process. Evidentiary materials filed with the court also fall within the public's constitutional right to know. Based on the District Court's failure to comply with this section, the Supreme Court reversed the order sealing court documents and remanded. State ex rel. The Missoulian v. District Court, 281 M 285, 933 P2d 829, 54 St. Rep. 175 (1997).

Participant Gag Order — Indirect Restraint of Media — Conditions for Issuance of Gag Order: A participant gag order is not as intrusive as a prior restraint upon publication or as intrusive as an order restricting news sources through closure of court proceedings or sealing of court documents, but instead constitutes an indirect restraint. A participant gag order does nevertheless impinge on the media's right to access news and the public's right to know. Prior restraints on publication consist of court-imposed restrictions that are directed at the media and interfere with the media's right to publish material already in its possession. Indirect restraints of the media include, without limitation, restraints that are aimed at the media's ability to gather information or to access official proceedings but that do not intrude on the media's prerogative to publish or edit information already in its possession and include restraints that are not directed at the media but at the sources of information. When the rights of the accused to a fair trial are asserted, a gag order may issue only when the following conditions have been met: (1) the press and general public are given an opportunity to be heard on the question before issuance of the order; (2) the court describes what alternatives have been considered and explains why those alternatives cannot adequately protect the defendant's fair trial rights; (3) the order is narrowly tailored to protect the defendant's fair trial rights; and (4) the court has made specific findings that there is a substantial probability that fair trial rights will be prejudiced by publicity that the gag order would otherwise prevent. A participant gag order is subject to a heightened scrutiny analysis. State ex rel. The Missoulian v. District Court, 281 M 285, 933 P2d 829, 54 St. Rep. 175 (1997), following N.Y. Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 US 254, 11 L Ed 2d 686, 84 S Ct 710 (1964), and distinguishing Great Falls Tribune v. District Court, 186 M 433, 608 P2d 116 (1980), and State ex rel. Smith v. District Court, 201 M 376, 654 P2d 982 (1982).

Affidavit Supporting Motion to File Criminal Charge or Warrant Subject to Public's Right to Know: The portion of this section sealing affidavits filed to support motions for leave to file criminal charges or warrants was unconstitutional because the public's right to know outweighed the privacy concerns of the persons charged. (See 1993 amendments.) Assoc. Press v. St., 250 M 299, 820 P2d 421, 48 St. Rep. 958 (1991).

CHAPTER 12
ARRAIGNMENT OF DEFENDANT

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

1991 Chapter Comments: This chapter establishes provisions relating to the entry of a plea or a plea agreement. Some of the provisions are new and are based primarily on Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Other changes recognize or facilitate established procedure.

The chapter includes more detail relative to the plea colloquy between the court and the defendant and expands the 1987 statute to include subsequent case law requirements.

Chapter Case Notes

No Error in Refusing to Dismiss Charges for Failure to Hold Timely Probable Cause Hearing: Brown was arrested on February 13, but no probable cause hearing was held until February 18. Brown moved for dismissal on due process grounds of failure to hold a probable cause hearing within 48 hours of arrest, citing County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 US 44, 114 L Ed 2d 49, 111 S Ct 1161 (1991), but the dismissal motion was denied. Brown appealed. The Supreme Court pointed out that the question to be decided was not whether Brown was accorded a timely probable cause determination, but rather whether the District Court erred in refusing to dismiss the charges as a remedy for failure to hold a probable cause hearing. Dismissal of charges is not the correct remedy for failure to timely charge a person who was arrested without a warrant. Under St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985), the proper remedy is the exclusion of evidence acquired as a result of the delay. The trial court did not err in refusing the motion to dismiss. St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 339, 297 M 427, 993 P2d 672, 56 St. Rep. 1346 (1999). See also St. v. Dieziger, 200 M 267, 650 P2d 800, 39 St. Rep. 1734 (1982).

Delay in Initial Appearance — Exclusion of Confession: The defendant was arrested on a misdemeanor charge in Louisiana and incarcerated for several days before he was taken before a magistrate there for arraignment. Before he was arraigned he was questioned by Louisiana police concerning a murder which had occurred in Montana several years earlier. After being advised of his Miranda rights several times, the defendant confessed to the murder. At trial he moved to suppress evidence of his confession on the basis it was obtained after he was denied his right to be taken before a magistrate or judge to be arraigned on the misdemeanor charge and advised of his rights. The rule in this regard is the "McNabb-Mallory" rule, which has been adopted by the Montana Supreme Court and which requires the exclusion of any confession obtained as a result of unnecessary delay in the initial appearance. The test for determining whether the delay was unnecessary is set forth in St. v. Benbo, 174 M 252, 570 P2d 894, 34 St. Rep. 1140 (1977). Under Benbo, the defendant has the initial burden of showing the delay was unnecessary. If established, the burden shifts to the prosecution to show that evidence obtained during the delay was not unreasonably related to the delay. In the present case the defendant has not established an unnecessary delay in arraignment, and even if it were assumed that there was such a delay, the prosecution has established the voluntariness of the defendant's statements by a preponderance of the evidence. The defendant's burden with regard to establishing an unnecessary delay is not met merely by establishing that the authorities could have presented him earlier. St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985), followed in St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 339, 297 M 427, 993 P2d 672, 56 St. Rep. 1346 (1999).

Jury Instructions — Presumption of Innocence: In a criminal prosecution based on theft of an automobile in which the defendant timely requested and was twice denied an instruction on presumption of innocence, it was per se reversible error to deny the instruction. The purpose of the instruction is to caution the jury against conclusions based only on the arrest and prosecution of the defendant, and an instruction on the State's burden of proof can therefore not supplant the instruction requested. St. v. Williams, 184 M 111, 601 P2d 1194 (1979).

General Provisions

46-12-102. Place of arraignment.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute amends the 1987 code provision to require that the defendant be arraigned only before the court having trial jurisdiction. The statute should not result in a significant change in established procedure and is an effort to avoid repetitive arraignments.

1991 Amendment: After "court" substituted "that has trial jurisdiction of the charge" for "in which the indictment, information, or complaint is filed unless before arraignment the cause has been removed to another court, in which case he shall be arraigned in that court".

Case Notes

Arraignment — Waiver by Defending: Appellant, convicted of aggravated assault, contended on appeal that he was improperly arraigned. It appeared that at the time of his arraignment defendant was only informed of a deliberate homicide charge and the possible punishment for it. The court held that the purposes of arraignment, to call the defendant into court to answer the charges against him and to inform him of certain rights, were waived by the defendant when he proceeded to trial and defended against the aggravated assault charge. The court also held that arraignment may be waived without violating due process so long as the accused has sufficient notice of the accusation and an adequate opportunity to defend himself. St. v. Longneck, 201 M 367, 654 P2d 977, 39 St. Rep. 2170 (1982).

Procedure on Arraignment

Part Case Notes

Erroneous Language in Verification of Arraignment Form Constituting Sufficient Irregularity to Void Waiver of Right to Counsel — Remand for Resentencing: The state attempted to enhance Mann's DUI to a felony based on his pleading guilty to two prior DUIs. Mann challenged the enhancement based on Mann's alleged waiver of the right to counsel contained in a verification of arraignment form. The District Court held that Mann had waived the right to counsel. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The language of the verification of arraignment form was so erroneous, intimidating, and virtually indecipherable that Mann could not be considered to have entered into a knowing, intelligent, or voluntary waiver of the right to counsel. The language in the form was prima facie evidence of irregularity. Because the state had already exercised its opportunity to establish that the prior convictions were not obtained in violation of Mann's constitutional right, the Supreme Court vacated the prior convictions and remanded for resentencing in accordance with misdemeanor DUI charges. St. v. Mann, 2006 MT 33, 331 M 137, 130 P3d 164 (2006).

Breach of Plea Agreement by State — Defendant's Right to Choose Remedy: The state conceded that it breached a plea agreement that had been offered to Munoz, so the order of the District Court denying Munoz's motion to withdraw his guilty plea was erroneous. The question then became whether the sentencing court or Munoz should have the right to choose the remedy. Generally, when the state breaches a plea agreement, one of two equitable remedies is available to safeguard the defendant's due process rights. The notion of an equitable remedy for a breach is guided by the general principles of contract law. The first remedy is specific performance by the government, requiring the state to uphold its end of the bargain and, before a new sentencing judge, comply with the terms of the plea agreement by recommending a specific sentence, moving for dismissal of other charges, or simply not opposing the defendant's requested sentence. When specific performance is imposed, a defendant enjoys no contractual right or entitlement to a specific sentence. The second equitable remedy is rescission, requiring that a defendant be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea and then face trial on the original charge as if the plea agreement had never been entered. In cases of rescission, a defendant's constitutional rights that were waived by the guilty plea are reinstated. However, the seminal federal case that established these remedies, Santobello v. N.Y., 404 US 257 (1971), never reached the question of choice of remedies, leaving to the discretion of the state court the decision as to which remedy would be appropriate under the circumstances. Federal circuit courts and various state courts have also split on the question of choice of remedies. Until now, the Montana Supreme Court has also applied two lines of reasoning—in some cases leaving the choice of remedies to the discretion of the sentencing court and in other cases providing instructions that a defendant be allowed to choose the remedy. In light of the underlying principles of contract law, a nonbreaching defendant must be afforded the initial right to choose from available remedies when the state breaches a plea agreement. As the breaching party, the state bears the substantial burden of demonstrating through clear and convincing evidence that a defendant's choice of remedy would result in a miscarriage of justice, and only upon such a showing may a District Court disallow a defendant's choice. St. v. Munoz, 2001 MT 85, 305 M 139, 23 P3d 922 (2001), following St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), and St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015 (1999), and overruling St. v. Persak, 256 M 404, 847 P2d 280 (1993), and St. v. Rardon, 1999 MT 220, 296 M 19, 986 P2d 424 (1999).

Breach of Plea Agreement by Prosecutor — Prejudice to Defendant Cured by Resentencing by Another Judge: Persak was charged with four counts of felony sexual assault. He agreed to plead guilty to two counts if two were dismissed and if the prosecutor would not seek a prison term. Two counts were dismissed, but the prosecutor breached the agreement and recommended a prison term. To remedy the prosecutor's breach, the judge disqualified himself and ordered Persak to be immediately resentenced by another District Judge. The Supreme Court held that the District Court did not err by refusing to dismiss the charges against Persak. The remedy for breach of a plea agreement is within the sound discretion of the court, and the court did not abuse that discretion by requiring specific performance of the agreement. Defendant was entitled to be sentenced by an impartial court without recommendation for a prison term by the prosecutor and received that impartiality and lack of recommendations, notwithstanding the fact that the new judge sentenced him to a prison term. St. v. Persak, 256 M 404, 847 P2d 280, 50 St. Rep. 123 (1993), followed in St. v. Rardon, 1999 MT 220, 296 M 19, 986 P2d 424, 56 St. Rep. 861 (1999). Persak and Rardon were overruled, to the extent that the choice of remedy following the state's breach of a plea agreement is with the defendant, in St. v. Munoz, 2001 MT 85, 305 M 139, 23 P3d 922 (2001).

Case Notes

No Error in Denial of Motion to Withdraw Nolo Contendere Pleas Made Knowingly: White asserted that the District Court erred in denying a motion to withdraw nolo contendere pleas, arguing that he could not have made a knowing waiver of his rights because he was not in possession of all evidence that might have influenced his decision, including inconsistent statements by a witness. The Supreme Court held that even if White did not know of the statement, the lack of knowledge was irrelevant to the criteria in 46-12-210 regarding whether the pleas were made knowingly. White was clearly informed of the nature of the charges, the mandatory minimum penalty, the maximum penalty, and the possibility of the imposition of restitution. Under the good cause factors in St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812 (1999), White's nolo contendere pleas were made knowingly, and the District Court did not err in disallowing withdrawal of the pleas. St. v. White, 2004 MT 103, 321 M 45, 88 P3d 1258 (2004). See also St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997).

Arraignment After Jury Empaneled and Sworn — No Double Jeopardy: The trial court arraigned Beavers on an amended charge after the jury was empaneled and sworn, which Beavers claimed was a violation of his constitutional protection against double jeopardy. However, this situation does not constitute a successive prosecution. Beavers was prosecuted only once for the offense, so double jeopardy protections did not apply. St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371, 56 St. Rep. 1035 (1999), distinguishing Crist v. Bretz, 437 US 28, 57 L Ed 2d 24, 98 S Ct 2156 (1978).

Change of Plea Agreement Properly Denied — Application of Contract Law Standards — Agreement Not to Prosecute Father — Benefit Derived by Defendant: Keys agreed to accept a motorcycle as collateral for a loan, but the motorcycle, which Keys subsequently sold, turned out to belong to the father of the individual to whom Keys made the loan. Both Keys and his father were charged with theft, but through his attorney, Keys negotiated an Alford plea with the prosecutor whereby the charges against Keys' father would be dropped and the prosecutor would recommend to the court that Keys' sentence be deferred for 4 years. At the hearing on the plea agreement, Keys, who could not read, had difficulty understanding that the District Court was not bound by and did not have to accept the agreement. However, after a lengthy colloquy with the District Court Judge, Keys eventually did state that he understood the agreement. The District Court then ordered that Keys' sentence be deferred for 6 years, and Keys requested that his plea be withdrawn, based upon his lack of understanding and a lack of consideration for his guilty plea. The District Court refused to allow the withdrawal, and the Supreme Court affirmed that refusal. The Supreme Court held that Keys did benefit from the agreement, that the benefits included the dismissal of charges against his father, and that in dismissing those charges, the state suffered the deprivation of a right (to pursue the conviction of Keys' father) that the law did not require. The Supreme Court also held that even though there was some confusion in Keys' mind over the role of the District Court in the agreement, the record showed by Keys' responses to questions by the District Court that Keys understood, at least at one point in time, that the court was not bound by the agreement. St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812, 56 St. Rep. 44 (1999), followed in St. v. D'Amico, 2000 MT 63, 299 M 57, 997 P2d 773, 57 St. Rep. 297 (2000), St. v. White, 2004 MT 103, 321 M 45, 88 P3d 1258 (2004), and Lout v. St., 2005 MT 93, 326 M 485, 111 P3d 199 (2005).

Guilty Plea Not to Be in Writing: Both this section, regarding the arraignment of an accused, and 46-17-201, regarding the procedure applicable to a plea in Justice's Court, require that a defendant appear in open court, that there be actual communication between the judge and defendant, that the judge first make the requisite inquiries of and provide mandated information to the defendant, and that a plea be accepted as part of that communicative process. There is no provision in either statute that allows a judge to accept a guilty plea from a defendant in either a felony or misdemeanor case through the expedient of the defendant or defendant's counsel simply filing a written plea with the court. The Supreme Court expressed its disapproval of the practice and admonished state courts to comply with the statutory mandates. However, in this case, defendant was at all times represented by counsel, who was personally involved in the written plea. Because defendant's substantive rights were not affected, acceptance of the written guilty plea by the trial court was allowed to stand. St. v. Schneiderhan, 261 M 161, 862 P2d 37, 50 St. Rep. 1242 (1993).

Failure to Arraign on Amended Information — No Error When Amendment Not Affecting Original Charges: Defendant contended the District Court erred when it accepted an information amended to add a reference to the requisite mental states but did not arraign him on the amended information. The amendment was in form only and did not make substantial changes in the charges set out in the original information. Failure to arraign defendant on charges set forth in the amended information did not constitute reversible error. St. v. Cameron, 253 M 95, 830 P2d 1284, 49 St. Rep. 150 (1992).

Five-Day Delay During Hospitalization: Appellant had the burden of showing that the 5-day delay between arrest and arraignment constituted unnecessary delay. He showed that a Justice of the Peace was available. However, appellant was in a hospital for that period, which suggested that the delay was neither unreasonable nor prejudicial. There was nothing to suggest that the delay influenced the voluntariness of appellant's statements made to police during the period of delay. The statements were properly admitted, and motion to suppress them due to the delay was properly denied. St. v. Plouffe, 198 M 379, 646 P2d 533, 39 St. Rep. 1064 (1982).

1991 Comment: Subsection (1) incorporates the principle of 1987 MCA 46-12-204(1), using the more concise language of Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The possible inclusion of the nolo contendere plea recognized in the federal rule was considered at length but was rejected as unnecessary, particularly in view of the defendant's plea option under N.C. v. Alford, 400 US 25 (1970). However, the conditional plea provisions of Rule 11(a)(2) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure are included as a method of expediting criminal cases and conserving prosecutorial and judicial resources.

Subsection (2) is a restatement of Rule 11(d) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The reference to the nolo contendere plea has been deleted as well as references to personally addressing the defendant in open court, which was redundant.

Right to Reserve Pretrial Rulings for Appeal Dependent Upon Plea of Guilty or Nolo Contendere and Adverse Ruling: Although this section allows a defendant to enter a plea and reserve the right to appeal certain pretrial rulings, it also requires that the plea be either guilty or nolo contendere and that there be an adverse ruling on the motion prior to the plea. In this case, defendant did not enter a guilty plea but rather entered a plea of not guilty by reason of mental disease or defect, and the plea was entered without first obtaining an adverse ruling on defendant's motion to dismiss on speedy trial grounds. Therefore, defendant's attempt to enter a plea and preserve the speedy trial issue fell outside the letter and spirit of the rules of criminal and appellate procedure. St. v. Violette, 2009 MT 19, 349 M 81, 201 P3d 804 (2009), following Hagan v. St., 265 M 31, 873 P2d 1385, 51 St. Rep. 230 (1994).

Statutory Right to Plead Guilty to DUI and Related Misdemeanor Citations Not Violated by City Court's Refusal to Accept Pleas: There was no prejudice and any error was harmless when the state dismissed DUI charges prior to the District Court trial on one felony count and two misdemeanor charges of negligent vehicular assault. St. v. Milligan, 2008 MT 375, 346 M 491, 197 P3d 956 (2008).

Failure of Trial Court to Address Issues Raised in Defendant's Pro Se Petition — Reversible Error: After being charged with failure to register as a sexual offender, Samples was granted the opportunity to file a pretrial pro se petition addressing the ex post facto application of Title 46, ch. 23, part 5, as well as a variety of other constitutional challenges to the sexual offender registration law. The District Court substantively discussed and rejected Samples' ex post facto argument, refused to discuss the other constitutional concerns, and denied the petition. Following denial of the petition, Samples pleaded guilty, but reserved the right to appeal the ruling on the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that, even though the District Court could have refused to allow the pro se motion, once the District Court expressly authorized Samples to file a pro se motion challenging the constitutionality of the sexual offender registration law, the court was obligated to address the constitutional issues raised in the petition. Failure of the District Court to consider all of the constitutional issues raised in the petition was reversible error, and the case was remanded for consideration of all issues raised by Samples in the petition. St. v. Samples, 2005 MT 210, 328 M 242, 119 P3d 1191 (2005).

Defense Attorney's Remarks Constituting Entry of Plea Without Defendant's Consent and Undermining Plea Agreement — Prejudice Warranting New Trial: Jefferson indicated in a pretrial letter to the District Court that he wished to withdraw from a plea agreement to plead guilty to felony assault in order to have the opportunity to either be acquitted or be convicted of a lesser offense than felony assault. However, in both opening statements and in closing arguments, Jefferson's defense counsel admitted Jefferson's guilt to felony assault, undermining the very purpose for which Jefferson withdrew from the plea agreement and directly contravening the reason Jefferson accepted the risk involved in facing the more serious charge of attempted deliberate homicide in a jury trial. Counsel's statements had the effect of entering a plea for Jefferson without Jefferson's consent and by which the jury was not bound. The admission could not be considered a trial strategy or tactical decision under the circumstances, and counsel's conduct fell below the reasonable range of professional conduct required. The question under the Strickland test then became whether Jefferson was prejudiced by counsel's conduct. Counsel precluded Jefferson from making a case for a lesser offense by admitting Jefferson's guilt of felony assault, denying Jefferson of both the right to deny guilt and to have the benefit of the previous agreement to admit guilt. There would have been no reason for Jefferson to withdraw from the plea agreement or to go to trial if he had been aware that his counsel would initiate the trial with an admission of guilt to felony assault. This prejudicial conduct by counsel rendered the criminal proceeding fundamentally unfair, and the Supreme Court reversed for a new trial. St. v. Jefferson, 2003 MT 90, 315 M 146, 69 P3d 641 (2003).

Right of Defendant to Plead Guilty Over State's Objection — Erroneous Refusal to Accept Guilty Plea: Peplow was charged with and convicted of DUI, driving with a suspended or revoked license, driving without insurance, failing to report an accident, and tampering with evidence. Prior to trial, Peplow tried to enter guilty pleas to the driving with a suspended or revoked license and driving without insurance counts, but the trial court ruled that it was not required to accept the pleas because Peplow's actions giving rise to the counts were part of the res gestae and probative of the issue of impairment; the trial court proceeded to trial on all counts. Peplow appealed on grounds that the trial court erred in refusing the guilty pleas. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court considered a defendant's right to plead guilty over the state's objection. The court noted the numerous statutory procedural safeguards in place to ensure that: (1) a guilty plea is made knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently; (2) there is a factual basis for the plea; (3) the court is not bound by any plea agreements; and (4) a defendant may not withdraw a guilty plea if the plea agreement is not accepted. The Supreme Court cited Lamb v. Missoula Imports, 230 M 183, 748 P2d 965 (1988), for the proposition that when the word "may" is used to confer power upon an officer, court, or tribunal and the public or a third person has an interest in the exercise of power, then the exercise of power becomes imperative. Under 46-16-105, a plea of guilty "may" be accepted before or during trial. The Supreme Court construed this language to mandate the acceptance of a guilty plea as long as the statutory requirements are met. Further, under this section, a defendant may plead guilty or not guilty without limitation on the right to plead. St. v. Peplow, 2001 MT 253, 307 M 172, 36 P3d 922 (2001).

Indian Defendant — Failure to Challenge Transfer to District Court and Failure to Reserve Right to Appeal Issues — District Court Jurisdiction Upheld: After the state filed an amended petition in Youth Court to have Spotted Blanket declared a delinquent youth and a serious juvenile offender, the state and Spotted Blanket stipulated to transferring the case to District Court. Later, Spotted Blanket objected to the jurisdiction of the District Court, arguing that the Youth Court abused its discretion in making the transfer because there was insufficient evidence that the juvenile facilities were inadequate, as required by 41-5-206(1)(d)(ii) (see 1997 amendment), and because the District Court failed to make a finding of probable cause concerning some of the counts against him, as required by the same statute. The Supreme Court declined to address those issues, noting that: (1) Spotted Blanket's notice of appeal was limited to the District Court order denying his motion to dismiss and did not include the order transferring the case to District Court; (2) Spotted Blanket never challenged the propriety of the transfer to District Court and, citing the requirements of St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477 (1995), St. v. Swoboda, 276 M 479, 918 P2d 296 (1996), and this section, holding that claims of error not properly preserved in the trial court are barred from appellate review; (3) Spotted Blanket stipulated to the transfer and that a probable cause hearing would not be necessary; and (4) Spotted Blanket pleaded guilty to the felony counts and noting that the plea acts as a waiver of nonjurisdictional defects under the Supreme Court's prior opinions in St. v. Butler, 272 M 286, 900 P2d 908 (1995), and Stilson v. St., 278 M 20, 924 P2d 238 (1996). St. v. Spotted Blanket, 1998 MT 59, 288 M 126, 955 P2d 1347, 55 St. Rep. 253 (1998).

Defendant Need Not Be Apprised of Parole Eligibility Limits: Section 46-16-105 requires the District Court to advise a defendant of the consequences of a guilty plea and of the maximum sentence that may be imposed, and 46-12-202 (renumbered 46-12-210) and this section outline other specific items of which a defendant must be advised by the court. However, these statutes do not require the court to advise a defendant of any possibility of limitations on his parole eligibility. St. v. Buckman, 236 M 37, 768 P2d 1361, 46 St. Rep. 163 (1989), followed in St. v. Wilson, 1999 MT 52, 293 M 429, 976 P2d 962, 56 St. Rep. 220 (1999).

Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea Denied — Plea Bargain Statute Constitutional: Defendant alleged that because the trial judge would not allow him to withdraw his guilty plea after rejecting the sentence recommended as part of a plea bargain, defendant was deprived of his constitutional rights, and therefore this section was unconstitutional. In affirming the constitutionality of this section, the Supreme Court noted that when a defendant makes a voluntary and intelligent plea, he knowingly waives certain constitutional rights, regardless of whether or not the judge accepts the recommended sentence. If there has been a proper colloquy regarding the defendant's rights and the liabilities of a guilty plea, he has been informed of his constitutional rights, he is aware that he is giving up those rights, and the plea bargain agreement is clear as to its limitations, then the judge does not have to accept a guilty plea withdrawal attempt. St. v. Martz, 233 M 136, 760 P2d 65, 45 St. Rep. 1370 (1988), followed in St. v. Yother, 253 M 128, 831 P2d 1347, 49 St. Rep. 387 (1992).

Sufficient Knowledge to Plead Guilty — Burden on Defendant — Federal Habeas Corpus: Prior to pleading guilty defendant had been advised, as shown by the record, of his privilege against self-incrimination, his right to a jury trial, and his right to confront accusers. He applied for federal postconviction relief based on the grounds that the effect of the words used and events that occurred precluded his informed consent to a guilty plea. After the record discloses that the defendant was accorded his basic constitutional rights, the U.S. District Court will presume that the state court did not commit errors. The burden then is on the defendant to come forward with at least some evidence to disclose he was not informed of some element of the crime that had some relevant relationship to the plea or that he was subjected to some external coercion. When defendant had a state habeas corpus hearing yet produced no evidence on his behalf and cross-examined no state witnesses, the record disclosed no evidence to overcome the presumption in favor of the state court. Brown v. Crist, 492 F. Supp. 965 (D.C. Mont. 1980).

Alleged Punishment for Failure to Plead Guilty: The defendants did not demonstrate a similarity to the disparity between the sentences the prosecutor was willing to recommend and the sentences actually given and the disparity in sentences between the defendants themselves that was present in St. v. Sather, 172 M 428, 564 P2d 1306 (1977). Thus, the facts of this case did not justify an inference that the defendants were punished for not pleading guilty. St. v. Gallaher, 177 M 150, 580 P2d 930 (1978).

PLEA OTHER THAN "GUILTY" OR "NOT GUILTY"

Defendant's Refusal to Plead:

Defendant's rights were not prejudiced and the law was complied with when the court entered a plea of not guilty upon refusal of defendant to plead. St. v. Barnes, 232 M 405, 758 P2d 264, 45 St. Rep. 1150 (1988).

It was not error for the court, in the absence of counsel, to enter a plea of not guilty for the defendant, when he stood mute. St. v. Stevens, 119 M 169, 172 P2d 299 (1946).

When the record discloses that the defendant refused to plead, the statute is sufficiently complied with by the action of the court in ordering a plea of not guilty. St. v. Clancy, 20 M 498, 52 P 267 (1898).

Conditional Pleas Not Authorized:

A plea of guilty, voluntarily and understandingly made, constitutes a waiver of nonjurisdictional defects and defenses, including claims of violations of constitutional rights made prior to the plea. St. v. Turcotte, 164 M 426, 524 P2d 787 (1974), followed in Stilson v. St., 278 M 20, 924 P2d 238, 53 St. Rep. 572 (1996), and in St. v. Kelsch, 2008 MT 339, 346 M 260, 194 P3d 670, (2008). Stilson was followed in St. v. Spotted Blanket, 1998 MT 59, 288 M 126, 955 P2d 1347, 55 St. Rep. 253 (1998). See also St. v. Hoots, 2005 MT 346, 330 M 144, 127 P3d 369 (2005).

The court has no authority to receive a conditional plea, and its entry is a nullity. St. v. Dow, 71 M 291, 229 P 402 (1924).

Written "Special Plea in Bar" Not Authorized: The Justice of the Peace was acting within his jurisdiction and in accordance with the law in overruling the defendant's written special plea in bar and ordering the defendant to answer to the complaint. State ex rel. Borberg v. District Court, 125 M 481, 240 P2d 854 (1952).

Plea Applied to Information as a Whole: When the defendant was charged with liquor violations in four counts and entered a plea of not guilty "to the offense charged", he was held to have pleaded to the information as a whole. St. v. Grasswick, 77 M 326, 250 P 613 (1926).

ACCEPTANCE OF GUILTY PLEA

Verbatim Use of Statute Not Prejudicial: Defendant, charged with two counts of deliberate homicide, pleaded guilty. In exchange for this plea, the state agreed not to seek the death penalty, and defendant was sentenced to two concurrent life sentences. The defendant appealed, alleging that the District Court's failure to use the words "most severe sentence" in instructing the defendant during the guilty plea hearing prejudiced the defendant's rights by depriving the defendant of essential information to which he was entitled. Affirming the District Court's decision to accept the guilty plea, the Supreme Court ruled that although the court failed to use the exact words "most severe sentence", the defendant was informed of the "maximum possible penalty". The difference was semantic and did not amount to prejudicial error. St. v. Miller, 278 M 231, 924 P2d 690, 53 St. Rep. 861 (1996).

Acceptance of Guilty Plea but Not Recommended Sentence — Misdemeanor Violations While Defendant Free on Recognizance: Defendant pleaded guilty in accordance with a plea bargain agreement and was released on his own recognizance until the sentencing hearing, but he was arrested for various misdemeanor crimes before sentencing. It was not error for the court to accept the guilty plea but reject the recommended sentence after finding that a suspended sentence was not proper under the circumstances. St. v. Martz, 233 M 136, 760 P2d 65, 45 St. Rep. 1370 (1988).

Accepting or Refusing Guilty Plea Where Defendant Denies Guilt:

The trial court properly refused to accept a burglary defendant's guilty plea because the defendant stated several times during extensive questioning that it was not his intent to commit a theft. Although a court may accept a guilty plea under these circumstances, it is not required to so accept. See N.C. v. Alford, 400 US 25, 27 L Ed 2d 162, 91 S Ct 160 (1970). St. v. Welling, 199 M 135, 647 P2d 852, 39 St. Rep. 1215 (1982).

A defendant's claim that it was error to accept his guilty plea because he professed innocence on some charges and could not recall whether he committed another crime charged was rejected. The Supreme Court held that there is no constitutional prohibition against accepting the guilty plea of a defendant who denied his actual guilt. Since there is no set standard to be applied by a court in handling motions to withdraw a guilty plea, the trial court's decision is subject to review only upon a showing of abuse of discretion. When the trial court record included a substantial factual basis for the plea and further showed the defendant's almost obstinate insistence that he be allowed to plead guilty to all five counts, there was no abuse of discretion. The State's affidavit of probable cause to support its motion for leave to file an information and the arraignment transcript established an adequate basis for the defendant's plea. In re Brown, 185 M 200, 605 P2d 185 (1980), followed in St. v. Cameron, 253 M 95, 830 P2d 1284, 49 St. Rep. 150 (1992).

Explanation by Judge or Lawyer Necessary — Federal Habeas Corpus: When a state prisoner makes specific and detailed factual assertions which are improbable, but cannot be called incredible, and the record shows that no preguilty plea explanation of the elements of the charge and of possible defenses which his attorney or the court is aware of was made to the prisoner, a hearing must be held on the question of whether the guilty plea was voluntary in the sense of being intelligently made. If the State contends but cannot prove that an explanation of the plea was made in private, and the prisoner denies it, a hearing must be held. And a hearing must be held in federal courts if the state courts do not hold a hearing. Federal habeas corpus is appropriate in such instances. Sober v. Crist, 644 F2d 807 (9th Cir. 1981).

Determination of Voluntariness — Untimely Request to Withdraw Bargained Plea: Petitioner contended the District Court did not adequately inform and interview him when he pleaded guilty to burglary and felony theft charges. The colloquy between the District Judge and petitioner was inadequate, but that is only one element to consider. In determining if a guilty plea was entered voluntarily, a three-element test was set out in St. v. Haynie, 186 M 374, 607 P2d 1128 (1980): (1) the adequacy of the court's interrogation; (2) the timeliness of the motion to withdraw; and (3) whether a plea bargaining agreement was made and, if made, whether the petitioner's motion will allow the defendant to escape the obligations of his agreement after accepting the benefits thereof. Here the prolonged delay in seeking to withdraw the plea and the fulfillment of a negotiated plea agreement justified the denial of petitioner's request for relief. (See 1985 amendment note.) St. v. Myers, 192 M 205, 627 P2d 860, 38 St. Rep. 712 (1981).

Standard to Judge Validity of Guilty Plea:

The standard under which the validity of a guilty plea is judged is whether the plea represents a voluntary and intelligent choice among the alternate courses of action open to the defendant as affirmatively disclosed by the record. Schantle v. Crist, 188 M 176, 612 P2d 673 (1980), following St. v. Griffin, 167 M 11, 535 P2d 498 (1975).

The standard by which the validity of a guilty plea is judged is whether the plea represents a voluntary and intelligent choice among the alternative courses of action open to the defendant as affirmatively disclosed by the record. While it is clear that courts are not required to articulate specific rights when accepting a guilty plea (see 1985 amendment note), an in-depth examination by the trial court is desirable and mandatory in cases in which the record requires it. Yother v. St., 182 M 351, 597 P2d 79 (1979), followed in St. v. Day, 195 M 151, 635 P2d 568, 38 St. Rep. 1718 (1981).

Pleading Guilty to Get Out of Jail — Accepting Plea — Issue of Voluntariness: The defendant asserted trial court error in the failure to inquire into the voluntariness of the defendant's pleas when he stated his guilty pleas were made to get out of jail and out of the county. The defendant's objection to his confinement in maximum security quarters was stated, but there was no suggestion that conditions in the jail were substandard or in any way abusive. There is nothing in the record to suggest that the jail conditions coerced the defendant into entering his plea. In any case, a prisoner's dislike of the security quarters is not per se a factor in determining the voluntariness of his plea. Under these circumstances, there was no error committed by the District Court in accepting defendant's guilty plea without further inquiry. (See 1985 amendment note.) In re Brown, 185 M 200, 605 P2d 185 (1980).

Understanding Charge and Consequences — Knowledge of Possibility of Mitigating Charge: Defendant was charged with and pleaded guilty to various crimes, including felony theft. The argument that the trial court had a duty to inform him that he might mitigate the charge and reduce his sentence was rejected because the arraignment record showed that defendant had been informed by counsel that the acts he had committed might constitute only a misdemeanor. The Supreme Court held that the trial court's repetition of this explanation to the defendant would not have added to his understanding of the charge and was not required. Defendant's argument that the record fails to establish that he understood the consequences of a guilty plea to deliberate homicide and that the trial court had a duty to inform him that he might mitigate this charge was also rejected. Defendant had been charged with both willful and deliberate murder and felony murder. The affidavit of probable cause stated that the defendant confessed to entering a service station with the intent to rob and had shot the deceased in the course of the robbery. Thus, it was clearly on the record that the State had a case on the charge of felony murder. (See 1985 amendment note.) In re Brown, 185 M 200, 605 P2d 185 (1980).

Retroactive Application of Criminal Procedure Rule: The decision made in St. v. Azure, 175 M 189, 573 P2d 179 (1977), requires that the trial court must advise a defendant of matters relating to lesser included offenses before accepting a guilty plea. This is a new procedural requirement that will not be applied retroactively. To apply it retroactively would seriously hamper the administration of justice by requiring conformity to as yet unannounced requirements. St. v. Campbell, 182 M 521, 597 P2d 1146 (1979).

Voluntariness of Guilty Plea — Knowledge of Lesser Included Offenses: Defendant contends that his guilty plea was not voluntary because he did not understand the difference between aggravated assault and the lesser included offense of misdemeanor assault. The Supreme Court said that this argument only applies where there is a fundamental mistake such as where the defendant pleads guilty to nighttime burglary, a felony, when the burglary was committed in the daytime, a lesser offense. There is no fundamental mistake in this case where the defendant was informed of all the elements of aggravated assault. St. v. Campbell, 182 M 521, 597 P2d 1146 (1979).

Adequacy of Interrogation Related to Guilty Plea: Under the circumstances, the failure to specify the name of the victim, the date, or the place of the alleged offense or the particular crime or to determine if the defendant was satisfied with his appointed counsel caused the District Court's interrogation concerning a guilty plea to be inadequate. St. v. Huttinger, 182 M 50, 595 P2d 363 (1979).

Change of Plea to Guilty: When a court has done all that it can to determine that the proposed plea of guilty is voluntarily made and that the defendant understands what he is doing and is advised of the consequences of his plea, including the nature and extent of his punishment, has been adequately advised by counsel, and has been treated fairly at all stages of the prosecution against him, and in fact the defendant states he is guilty of the charges made, then this court has a duty to support the District Court when it allows a plea of guilty to be entered in place of a plea of not guilty. St. v. Lewis, 177 M 474, 582 P2d 346 (1978).

Improper Acceptance of Guilty Plea: Because the court did not determine whether the defendant understood the different elements and effects of deliberate homicide and mitigated deliberate homicide, acceptance of his guilty plea was improper. The court should have granted the defendant's motion for leave to withdraw the guilty plea. St. v. Azure, 175 M 189, 573 P2d 179 (1977).

Voluntariness of Guilty Plea — Examination of Defendant: Although examination by the court as to the voluntariness of a guilty plea is desirable and in some cases mandatory (see 1985 amendment note), when the record indicated that the defendant's guilty plea was entered voluntarily with full understanding of the charge and with full appreciation of his constitutional rights and the possible penalty, the fact that the trial court did not specifically question the defendant at the time of the plea change did not amount to reversible error. St. v. Griffin, 167 M 11, 535 P2d 498 (1975).

Doubt That Guilty Plea Voluntary: On the hearing of an application of the defendant for permission to change his plea of guilty to not guilty, any doubt that the first plea was not voluntary should be resolved in his favor and in favor of a trial on the merits. The plea should be entirely voluntary by one competent to know the consequences and should not be induced by fear, persuasion, promise, or ignorance. St. v. Casaras, 104 M 404, 66 P2d 774 (1937).

WITHDRAWAL OF GUILTY PLEA

Inability of District Court to Impose Sentence in Plea Agreement — Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Allowed: Deserly negotiated a plea agreement on a felony assault with a weapon charge wherein the state would recommend a 10-year sentence with the Department of Corrections and Deserly would be designated a persistent felony offender. However, after the plea was entered, the District Court and Deserly discovered that under 46-18-201, all but the first 5 years of a department commitment must be suspended, so the sentence in the plea agreement was not one that could be legally imposed. Deserly then moved to withdraw the guilty plea on grounds of good cause, but the District Court denied the motion, and Deserly appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Under St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005), a defendant's plea is not voluntary if the court, the prosecutor, defense counsel, or some other party induced the plea, however slightly, by misrepresentation, including unfulfilled or unfulfillable promises. At the time Deserly entered the plea, it was reasonable for him to expect that the District Court could at least consider, if not actually impose, the recommended sentence, and Deserly was induced, at least in part, by the prospect of being able to receive the sentence that he and the prosecutor had negotiated and agreed to recommend. Because Deserly was induced by an unfulfillable promise of an illegal sentence, albeit unintentionally, his plea was not voluntary, and the case was remanded for further proceedings to allow Deserly to withdraw the guilty plea. St. v. Deserly, 2008 MT 242, 344 M 468, 188 P3d 1057 (2008).

No Error in Refusal to Allow Withdrawal of Voluntary Guilty Plea: McFarlane contended that his guilty plea was entered both involuntarily and unintelligently because trial counsel provided ineffective assistance in explaining a guilty plea and because he did not understand what acts amount to being guilty of burglary. The Supreme Court declined to address the ineffective assistance claims because they were raised for the first time on appeal. Regarding the voluntariness issue, the court applied the Brady standard to determine whether McFarlane was fully aware of the direct consequences of a guilty plea. The court noted that during the plea colloquy, McFarlane expressed understanding of the charges, the maximum penalties, and the waiver of the right to a trial and stated that he had discussed the consequences of a guilty plea with counsel and was satisfied with counsel's services. McFarlane's argument that he misunderstood or was confused about the meaning of a guilty plea was further belied by the fact that McFarlane fled the jurisdiction for more than 2 years to avoid imposition of a sentence and by the fact that McFarlane had a criminal history of 13 counts of burglary in six separate proceedings spanning nearly 40 years and was thus well acquainted with the criminal justice system and burglary charges in particular. Denial of the motion to withdraw the guilty plea was affirmed. St. v. McFarlane, 2008 MT 18, 341 M 166, 176 P3d 1057 (2008).

No Ineffective Assistance in Counsel's Failure to Cite Proper Standard for Plea Withdrawal and to Challenge Plea Colloquy: McFarlane contended that he received ineffective assistance of counsel for his motion to withdraw a guilty plea when counsel cited the test in St. v. Huttinger, 182 M 50, 595 P2d 363 (1979), rather than the more lenient test in Brady v. U.S., 397 US 742 (1970), which replaced the Huttinger test (see St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005)). The Supreme Court held that despite counsel's improper reliance on Huttinger, the outcome would have been the same if counsel had relied on Brady, so McFarlane's challenge failed because he did not show that but for counsel's deficient performance, he would not have entered a guilty plea. McFarlane also contended that he received ineffective assistance because counsel failed to challenge the adequacy of the plea colloquy when the colloquy was flawed by the District Court's failure to enumerate lesser included offenses of which McFarlane might have been convicted had he proceeded to trial. The Supreme Court noted that although the District Court did not enumerate lesser included offenses, McFarlane was clearly informed that by pleading guilty, the opportunity to be convicted of a lesser offense would be lost. Additionally, pursuant to St. v. Thee, 2001 MT 294, 307 M 450, 37 P3d 741 (2001), the court had no duty to inform McFarlane about the possibility of lesser included offenses if none existed, and McFarlane failed to demonstrate any lesser included offenses to burglary that would have been applicable under the circumstances of his charge. Thus, McFarlane's ineffective assistance claim was without merit, and denial of the motion to withdraw the guilty plea was affirmed. St. v. McFarlane, 2008 MT 18, 341 M 166, 176 P3d 1057 (2008).

Custodial Interrogation of Youth Without Consent — Miranda Warning Required — Suppression of Confession and Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Required: A 14-year-old boy's mother called his school, reported that he had not returned home the previous night, and requested that he be picked up. The school resource officer notified police and asked that the boy be brought to school if found. An officer later found the boy on the street smelling of alcohol and took the boy to the police station where it was discovered that several town businesses had been burglarized during the night, including a bowling alley where money and liquor had been stolen. Although there was no record that the youth was advised of his Miranda rights, during interrogation both prior to and after arrival of his parents, the youth confessed to robbing the bowling alley and subsequently pleaded guilty to felony burglary. The Youth Court summarily determined that the confessions were voluntary, denied a motion to suppress, found the youth was delinquent, and ordered 2 years' probation. On appeal, the Supreme Court addressed the voluntariness of the confessions and reversed. Given the absence of a tangible record that the officer read Miranda rights to the youth or that the youth or the parents consented in writing to a waiver of Miranda rights or agreed to the interview, the requirement in 41-5-331 that a youth be advised of the right against self-incrimination and the right to counsel was violated. Thus, the confessions could not be considered voluntary and should have been suppressed by the Youth Court. The Supreme Court also ordered that on remand, the youth be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea In re Z.M., 2007 MT 122, 337 M 278, 160 P3d 490 (2007).

Motion to Correct Sentence Not Considered Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea — Plain Error Review of Nolo Contendere Plea Inappropriate: Attorney Holt pleaded not guilty to five counts of felony theft of clients' funds. Pursuant to a subsequent plea agreement, Holt pleaded nolo contendere to the contested counts, but reserved the right to withdraw the plea if the agreed sentences were not imposed. Following conviction, Holt asked the Supreme Court to exercise plain error review, find that the plea agreement was violated, and allow Holt to withdraw the nolo contendere guilty plea. The court declined. Holt made no motion in trial court to review the guilty plea, so that issue was not properly before the Supreme Court. Holt's speculation that he would not have entered the plea agreement had he considered the possibility of good time did not implicate Holt's fundamental constitutional rights, and failure to apply plain error review did not result in a manifest miscarriage of justice, leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the proceedings, or compromise the integrity of the judicial process. The Supreme Court refused to consider Holt's District Court motion to correct the sentence as a motion to withdraw the guilty plea and thus declined to consider Holt's argument that he be allowed to withdraw the nolo contendere plea based on plain error review. St. v. Holt, 2006 MT 151, 332 M 426, 139 P3d 819 (2006), distinguishing St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001).

Voluntary Nolo Contendere Guilty Plea — No Good Cause to Withdraw Plea: Although maintaining innocence to sexual assault charges, Leitheiser sought to avoid trial and possible sex offender treatment, so Leitheiser entered plea negotiations, and the state agreed to amend the information to consist of charges of felony assault on a minor and to remain silent regarding sex offender treatment in exchange for Leitheiser's guilty plea. At the change of plea hearing, Leitheiser entered a voluntary guilty plea to the amended charges. The trial court did not accept the guilty plea at that time, but ordered Leitheiser to undergo a presentence interview. The probation officer recommended sexual offender treatment, and Leitheiser moved to withdraw the nolo contendere guilty plea. The motion was denied, and Leitheiser appealed, contending that the plea to nonsexual charges combined with the bargain that the prosecution would not recommend sexual offender treatment induced the guilty plea. The Supreme Court disagreed. Leitheiser's guilty plea was voluntary, and the state kept its part of the plea bargain. Leitheiser's grievance was with the probation officer, who was not a party to the plea bargain, rather than with the prosecution. Denial of Leitheiser's motion to withdraw the guilty plea was affirmed. St. v. Leitheiser, 2006 MT 70, 331 M 464, 133 P3d 185 (2006). See also St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997).

Error in Refusal to Allow Withdrawal of Involuntary Guilty Plea — Remand: Chase entered a guilty plea after being told by the trial court that his defense to a DUI charge would probably have failed and after Chase's counsel unilaterally withdrew the defense without notifying Chase. There was a legitimate basis for Chase's belief that his defense had not been adequately pursued, giving rise to uncertainty regarding Chase's guilt, and the colloquy conducted by the trial court appeared to have unintentionally prompted a guilty plea from Chase that was not knowing and intelligent. Chase's fundamental misunderstanding concerning the availability of his defense, coupled with the questionable voluntariness of the plea, was sufficient to allow withdrawal of the plea, and the trial court committed reversible error in denying Chase's motion to withdraw the plea. St. v. Chase, 2006 MT 13, 331 M 1, 127 P3d 1038 (2006), following St. v. Ereth, 1998 MT 197, 290 M 294, 964 P2d 26 (1998).

Effect of Alford Plea on Subsequent Appeals — Request to Withdraw Alford Plea to Be Made in District Court: Hoots entered an Alford plea to DUI charges and later sought to withdraw the plea on appeal, contending that the plea was made only because Hoots was forced to plead guilty after the trial court denied a request for new counsel. However, Hoots did not request to withdraw the plea at any time during the District Court proceedings. Because a motion to withdraw an Alford plea must be made in District Court, the Supreme Court declined to address the issue on appeal. St. v. Hoots, 2005 MT 346, 330 M 144, 127 P3d 369 (2005), following St. v. Butler, 272 M 286, 900 P2d 908 (1995).

Lack of Participation in Sexual Offender Programs Warranting Revocation of Suspended Sentence: Van Haele contended that because he was not adequately advised by the District Court that one consequence of a guilty plea was that failure to complete a sexual offender program would be denial of probation status, he should be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea and that the District Court erroneously denied his motion to withdraw the plea. Reviewing the case to determine whether the District Court's findings were erroneous, the Supreme Court disagreed with the factual predicate of Van Haele's argument. It was not Van Haele's failure to complete the prison sex offender program that resulted in Van Haele's denial of admission to an outpatient treatment program, but rather it was Van Haele's recantation of his admission of guilt and his various behavioral problems that placed insurmountable obstacles in the way of acceptance into an outpatient program, although Van Haele's refusal to participate in the prison program contributed to the problem. The District Court had adequate evidence at Van Haele's revocation hearing to determine that the lack of participation in sexual offender programs was adequate to warrant revocation of Van Haele's suspended sentence. St. v. Van Haele, 2005 MT 153, 327 M 400, 114 P3d 225 (2005).

Failure of Trial Court to Inquire About Satisfaction of Counsel at Hearing on Change of Plea Not Error — No Bearing Between Satisfaction With Counsel and Voluntariness of Plea: A court may permit withdrawal of a guilty plea upon a showing of good cause, including involuntariness of the plea or other criteria. In this case, defendant contended that good cause existed because the trial court failed to inquire regarding defendant's satisfaction with counsel and with counsel's advice when defendant had expressed dissatisfaction with counsel shortly before a change of plea hearing. The Supreme Court held that defendant's dissatisfaction with counsel had no bearing on whether defendant understood the consequences of the plea or whether the plea was induced by threats, misrepresentations, or an improper promise. Finding no other factors to bear upon voluntariness or implicate good cause, the trial court's denial of defendant's motion to withdraw the guilty plea was affirmed. St. v. Warclub, 2005 MT 149, 327 M 352, 114 P3d 254 (2005), distinguishing St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997).

Adoption of Federal Test for Voluntariness of Guilty Pleas — Huttinger Overruled — Standard of Review: Since St. v. Huttinger, 182 M 50, 595 P2d 363 (1979), the Supreme Court has applied a good cause test in determining whether to permit a plea of guilty or nolo contendere to be withdrawn and a plea of not guilty substituted. The good cause test involved a balancing of three conflicting factors: (1) the adequacy of the interrogation by the District Court of the defendant at the entry of the guilty plea as to the defendant's understanding of the consequences of the plea; (2) the promptness with which the defendant attempted to withdraw the prior plea; and (3) the fact that the defendant's plea was apparently the result of a plea bargain in which the guilty plea was given in exchange for dismissal of another charge. None of the factors required a court to consider the voluntariness, knowledge, or intelligence of a defendant's plea, although a defendant has been allowed to withdraw a guilty plea upon a showing that the plea was made unknowingly or involuntarily. Citing Bousley v. U.S., 523 US 614 (1998), the Supreme Court concluded that the ultimate test for withdrawal of a plea is voluntariness, which subsumes the relevant elements of the Huttinger test, so Huttinger was overruled. Therefore, a guilty plea may be withdrawn only upon a showing that the plea was made involuntarily, and the Supreme Court will review questions of voluntariness in pleas and plea agreements de novo. St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005), overruling St. v. Miller, 248 M 194, 810 P2d 308 (1991), and overruling St. v. Martin, 2004 MT 288, 323 M 320, 100 P3d 146 (2004), and other cases that have applied the abuse of discretion standard, and followed in Duffy v. St., 2005 MT 228, 328 M 369, 120 P3d 398 (2005), and St. v. McFarlane, 2008 MT 18, 341 M 166, 176 P3d 1057 (2008). See also St. v. Warclub, 2005 MT 149, 327 M 352, 114 P3d 254 (2005), in which the Supreme Court clarified Lone Elk and held that, with respect to appeals of denials of motions to withdraw guilty pleas, the court will review the findings of fact to determine if they are clearly erroneous and the conclusions of law to determine if they are correct. When voluntariness of the plea is at issue, the court will review that ultimate mixed question of law and fact de novo to determine if the trial court was correct in holding that the plea was voluntary. Warclub was followed in St. v. Muhammad, 2005 MT 234, 328 M 397, 121 P3d 521 (2005), and Maldonado v. St., 2008 MT 253, 345 M 69, 190 P3d 1043 (2008). Warclub and Lone Elk were followed in St. v. Leitheiser, 2006 MT 70, 331 M 464, 133 P3d 185 (2006). In St. v. Deserly, 2008 MT 242, 344 M 468, 188 P3d 1057 (2008), the Supreme Court noted that the standard for reviewing the voluntariness of a guilty plea adopted in St. v. Miller, 248 M 194, 810 P2d 308 (1991) (overruled in St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005)), under which a plea would be considered involuntary when it appeared that defendant was laboring under such a strong inducement, fundamental mistake, or serious mental condition that the possibility existed that defendant may have pleaded guilty to a crime for which he was innocent, had been followed in other cases. To avoid confusion, the court overruled the following cases to the extent that they may be read as supporting the Miller standard: St. v. Pelke, 143 M 262, 389 P2d 154 (1964), St. v. LeMay, 144 M 315, 396 P2d 83 (1964), St. v. Griffin, 167 M 11, 535 P2d 498 (1975), State ex rel. Gladue v. District Court, 175 M 509, 575 P2d 65 (1978), St. v. Huttinger, 182 M 50, 595 P2d 363 (1979), St. v. Campbell, 182 M 521, 597 P2d 1146 (1979), St. v. Hilton, 183 M 13, 597 P2d 1171 (1979), St. v. Nelson, 184 M 491, 603 P2d 1050 (1979), Benjamin v. McCormick, 243 M 252, 792 P2d 7 (1990), St. v. Milinovich, 248 M 373, 812 P2d 338 (1991), St. v. Cameron, 253 M 95, 830 P2d 1284 (1992), St. v. Barker, 257 M 31, 847 P2d 300 (1993), St. v. Skroch, 267 M 349, 883 P2d 1256 (1994), St. v. Schaff, 1998 MT 104, 288 M 421, 958 P2d 682 (1998), St. v. Ereth, 1998 MT 197, 290 M 294, 964 P2d 26 (1998), St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015 (1999), St. v. Kellames, 2002 MT 41, 308 M 347, 43 P3d 293 (2002), St. v. Tweed, 2002 MT 286, 312 M 482, 59 P3d 1105 (2002), St. v. Chase, 2006 MT 13, 331 M 1, 127 P3d 1038 (2006), and St. v. Milligan, 2008 MT 36, 341 M 316, 177 P3d 500 (2008). Lone Elk and Deserly were overruled in St. v. Brinson, 2009 MT 200, 351 M 136, 210 P3d 164 (2009), to the extent that application of the "however slightly" language in the analysis of the voluntariness of a plea is disapproved.

Effects of Fear and Medication Not Affecting Voluntariness of Guilty Plea — Denial of Motion to Withdraw Plea Proper: Lone Elk contended that he should have been allowed to withdraw a guilty plea because: (1) he was unduly influenced by hope and fear and pleaded guilty to a burglary charge because he was afraid that if he went to trial and was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent he would be required to complete sex offender treatment; and (2) the guilty plea was involuntary because he was not stabilized on his antidepressant medication at the time that the plea was entered. The Supreme Court held that the effect of neither fear nor medication affected the voluntariness of Lone Elk's guilty plea, so the trial court did not err in denying the motion to withdraw the plea. St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005), followed in Duffy v. St., 2005 MT 228, 328 M 369, 120 P3d 398 (2005), and St. v. Muhammad, 2005 MT 234, 328 M 397, 121 P3d 521 (2005). See also Brady v. U.S., 397 US 742 (1970), and St. v. Allen, 265 M 293, 876 P2d 639 (1994).

No Error in Denial of Motion to Withdraw Nolo Contendere Pleas Made Knowingly: White asserted that the District Court erred in denying a motion to withdraw nolo contendere pleas, arguing that he could not have made a knowing waiver of his rights because he was not in possession of all evidence that might have influenced his decision, including inconsistent statements by a witness. The Supreme Court held that even if White did not know of the statement, the lack of knowledge was irrelevant to the criteria in 46-12-210 regarding whether the pleas were made knowingly. White was clearly informed of the nature of the charges, the mandatory minimum penalty, the maximum penalty, and the possibility of the imposition of restitution. Under the good cause factors in St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812 (1999), White's nolo contendere pleas were made knowingly, and the District Court did not err in disallowing withdrawal of the pleas. St. v. White, 2004 MT 103, 321 M 45, 88 P3d 1258 (2004). See also St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997).

Question of Adequacy of Advisement Regarding Waiver of Appeal Rights Resolved in Favor of Defendant: The first factor in determining whether good cause existed in allowing the withdrawal of a guilty plea and whether a court abused its discretion in denying a motion to withdraw the guilty plea, as set out in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), is the adequacy of the court's interrogation at the time that the plea was entered regarding the defendant's understanding of the consequences of the plea. The plea must be a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent choice among the alternative courses of action open to the defendant. In the present case, Boucher was charged with DUI, and at his initial appearance, the Justice's Court had Boucher acknowledge in writing that he understood the waivers that he would make if he pleaded guilty. Boucher pleaded not guilty and waived no rights. Five months later, the state amended the complaint, and Boucher changed his plea to guilty, but at the time that the plea was entered, the Justice's Court did not reiterate the information provided at the initial appearance and failed to question Boucher regarding his understanding of the waiver of his constitutional rights. The Supreme Court concluded that the court's colloquy was inadequate and that good cause existed to permit Boucher to withdraw his guilty plea. Any doubt about the voluntariness of Boucher's plea was resolved in his favor, and the Supreme Court remanded to Justice's Court for further proceedings. St. v. Boucher, 2002 MT 114, 309 M 514, 48 P3d 21 (2002).

Defendant's Failure to Show Doubt as to Voluntariness of Plea — Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea Affirmed: Kellames contended that the District Court erred in denying a motion to withdraw a guilty plea. Kellames maintained that the plea was involuntary because of his mother's influence over him, and because he suffered from a bipolar disorder that required medication, which his attorney failed to mention to the sentencing court. However, Kellames conceded that in response to questioning at the sentencing hearing, he denied that he was suffering from a disability, stated that he felt no threat or coercion to plead guilty, and admitted that the decision to plead guilty was his alone. Thus, Kellames failed to state a claim of pressure from his mother that rose to the level of coercion sufficient to render his subsequent responses to questioning in open court involuntary, and raised no doubt about whether his guilty plea was voluntarily or intelligently made. The Supreme Court found no abuse of discretion by the District Court in denying Kellames's motion to withdraw the guilty plea. St. v. Kellames, 2002 MT 41, 308 M 347, 43 P3d 293 (2002). See also St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812 (1999).

No Error in Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea Made Four Years After Plea Entered—Bowley Factors Applied: In determining whether the District Court erred in denying Garner's motion to withdraw guilty pleas, the Supreme Court applied the factors in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997): (1) the adequacy of the court's interrogation when the plea was entered as to defendant's understanding of the plea; (2) the promptness of the motion to withdraw; and (3) the fact that the plea resulted from plea bargaining. Garner was adequately questioned regarding the desire to plead guilty, fully informed of the right to continue with a plea of not guilty, informed of the ramifications of a guilty plea, and admitted the facts of the charged offenses. Although Garner's wait of almost 4 years before attempting to withdraw the guilty pleas was not per se a bar to plea withdrawal, the District Court did not err in determining that the delay, together with Garner's ample opportunity to raise the withdrawal issue while raising other claims during that 4 years when represented by counsel, could only lead to the conclusion that Garner's motion to withdraw the guilty pleas did not satisfy the requirement of promptness. Last, there was no plea bargain, so that factor was not relevant. St. v. Garner, 2001 MT 222, 306 M 462, 36 P3d 346 (2001).

Pro Se Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea Not Considered Critical Stage of Proceedings to Which Right to Counsel Attaches: Garner moved pro se to withdraw his guilty plea nearly 4 years after entering the plea and nearly 3 years after filing a petition for postconviction relief, arguing that a motion to withdraw a guilty plea constitutes a critical stage of the proceedings at which the right to counsel attaches, and that that right must be expressly waived, which was not done. Garner cited numerous non-Montana cases in which the right to counsel was found to attach to a motion to withdraw a guilty plea, but the Supreme Court noted that it had not established any bright line as to when in the sequence of proceedings the right to counsel attaches. The court noted the holding in Ranta v. St., 1998 MT 95, 288 M 391, 958 P2d 670 (1998), that a critical stage is defined as any step of the proceedings in which there is potential for substantial prejudice to the defendant. Here, Garner was represented by three different counsel during the course of the proceedings. Given the length of time since trial and the ample opportunities of representation that Garner enjoyed, the pro se motion did not raise the potential for substantial prejudice to Garner; thus, the motion did not constitute a critical stage of the proceedings, and the right to counsel did not attach. St. v. Garner, 2001 MT 222, 306 M 462, 36 P3d 346 (2001).

No Authority to Appeal Justice's Court Order Denying Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea: The Feights got into a fight with a highway patrol officer at a high school basketball game and were charged with misdemeanor assault. They were informed of their rights in Justice's Court, waived their right to counsel, and pleaded guilty. More than a month later, they moved through counsel to withdraw their guilty pleas, claiming good cause under 46-16-105. The Justice's Court denied the motion, holding that the Feights had been given due process and had voluntarily, knowingly, and willingly entered guilty pleas. The Feights appealed the denial of their motion to withdraw their guilty pleas to District Court. The state moved to dismiss the appeal, contending that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to review denial of the motion to withdraw a plea. The District Court dismissed the appeal but remanded to Justice's Court with a recommendation that the Feights be allowed to withdraw their pleas. Instead, the Justice's Court reinstated judgment, and the Feights appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court affirmed. The statutes that provide for and determine the jurisdiction of a District Court to entertain an appeal from a Justice's Court include 3-5-303, 46-17-203, 46-17-311, and this section. However, none of these statutes provide authority for appeal to the District Court from the denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea. Further, the specific language of these sections prevails over the general language in 46-20-104 defining the scope of appeal by a criminal defendant. The Legislature has not created a statutory right of appeal from a Justice's Court denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea, and the Supreme Court refrained from creating one. St. v. Feight, 2001 MT 205, 306 M 312, 33 P3d 623 (2001), distinguishing St. v. Rogers, 267 M 190, 883 P2d 115 (1994), and followed in St. v. Fox, 2001 MT 209, 306 M 353, 34 P3d 484 (2001).

Breach of Plea Agreement by State — Defendant's Right to Choose Remedy: The state conceded that it breached a plea agreement that had been offered to Munoz, so the order of the District Court denying Munoz's motion to withdraw his guilty plea was erroneous. The question then became whether the sentencing court or Munoz should have the right to choose the remedy. Generally, when the state breaches a plea agreement, one of two equitable remedies is available to safeguard the defendant's due process rights. The notion of an equitable remedy for a breach is guided by the general principles of contract law. The first remedy is specific performance by the government, requiring the state to uphold its end of the bargain and, before a new sentencing judge, comply with the terms of the plea agreement by recommending a specific sentence, moving for dismissal of other charges, or simply not opposing the defendant's requested sentence. When specific performance is imposed, a defendant enjoys no contractual right or entitlement to a specific sentence. The second equitable remedy is rescission, requiring that a defendant be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea and then face trial on the original charge as if the plea agreement had never been entered. In cases of rescission, a defendant's constitutional rights that were waived by the guilty plea are reinstated. However, the seminal federal case that established these remedies, Santobello v. N.Y., 404 US 257 (1971), never reached the question of choice of remedies, leaving to the discretion of the state court the decision as to which remedy would be appropriate under the circumstances. Federal circuit courts and various state courts have also split on the question of choice of remedies. Until now, the Montana Supreme Court has also applied two lines of reasoning—in some cases leaving the choice of remedies to the discretion of the sentencing court and in other cases providing instructions that a defendant be allowed to choose the remedy. In light of the underlying principles of contract law, a nonbreaching defendant must be afforded the initial right to choose from available remedies when the state breaches a plea agreement. As the breaching party, the state bears the substantial burden of demonstrating through clear and convincing evidence that a defendant's choice of remedy would result in a miscarriage of justice, and only upon such a showing may a District Court disallow a defendant's choice. St. v. Munoz, 2001 MT 85, 305 M 139, 23 P3d 922 (2001), following St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), and St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015 (1999), overruling St. v. Persak, 256 M 404, 847 P2d 280 (1993), and St. v. Rardon, 1999 MT 220, 296 M 19, 986 P2d 424 (1999), and followed in St. v. Rardon, 2002 MT 345, 313 M 321, 61 P3d 132 (2002).

Failure to Present Motion to Withdraw Voluntary Guilty Plea, Based on Hope or Fear, Not Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Osterloth contended that he was denied effective assistance of counsel when his attorney failed to premise a motion to withdraw a guilty plea on Osterloth's having entered the plea out of hope of avoiding the mandatory minimum sentence for sexual assault by being admitted to a community-based sex offender treatment program and on Osterloth's fear of incarceration. Osterloth was relying on St. v. Schaff, 1998 MT 104, 288 M 421, 958 P2d 682 (1998), for the proposition that an assertion that a guilty plea was influenced by hope or fear is a proper basis for withdrawing a guilty plea. Under the two-prong Strickland test for evaluating effectiveness of counsel, a defendant must establish that counsel's performance was deficient and that the deficient performance prejudiced the defendant. A guilty plea is not involuntary simply because it was entered to avoid a greater punishment, nor is counsel's performance deficient for failure to raise an issue that lacks merit. Thus, because Osterloth's plea was not involuntary, his counsel's performance was not deficient in failing to raise the issue of Osterloth's hope or fear in the motion to withdraw. Having failed to establish the first prong of the Strickland test, the Supreme Court did not address the second prong in finding that Osterloth was not denied the right to effective assistance of counsel. St. v. Osterloth, 2000 MT 129, 299 M 517, 1 P3d 946, 57 St. Rep. 533 (2000).

Nonspecific Colloquy Regarding Lesser Included Offenses as Insufficient Notice of Defendant's Options — Reversible Error: When interrogating Sanders regarding his understanding of the consequences of a guilty plea, the District Court informed Sanders that there might be lesser included offenses but did not specifically inform him that there were in fact lesser included offenses, so Sanders' subsequent guilty plea was not made intelligently. To make an intelligent choice as to whether to plead guilty, a defendant is entitled to know the precise nature of the alternatives. If a defendant does not know about lesser included offenses, it is not possible to evaluate whether a jury could be convinced that the defendant was guilty of those offenses. The court's interrogation, which comprised a nonspecific colloquy regarding lesser included offenses, was insufficient and, coupled with the prosecutor's breach of a plea agreement, constituted reversible error. The Supreme Court remanded with instructions either to allow Sanders' withdrawal of the guilty plea or to sentence Sanders in accordance with the plea agreement. St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015, 56 St. Rep. 551 (1999), following St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592, 54 St. Rep. 353 (1997). See also Benjamin v. McCormick, 243 M 252, 792 P2d 7, 47 St. Rep. 887 (1990).

Court Misstatement of Maximum Possible Penalty at Change of Plea Hearing — Error in Refusal to Allow Withdrawal of Noncompliant Plea: Roach requested a hearing to change his plea to guilty on burglary and theft charges. Roach was questioned regarding his understanding of his constitutional rights, and a discussion was held concerning possible penalties. The District Court Judge erroneously informed Roach that the maximum penalty for both crimes was 10 years and $50,000. Neither Roach's counsel nor the County Attorney, who were both present, responded or objected in any way to the court's misstatement of the maximum possible penalty. Roach was sentenced 2 months later to consecutive sentences of 20 years suspended for burglary and 10 years with no time suspended for theft, plus restitution. Roach later asserted that he was misled by the District Court, that his change of plea was coerced and based on misinformation, and that he should have been granted postconviction relief allowing him to either withdraw the guilty plea or be sentenced in conformity with the penalty that he was advised of at the change of plea hearing. The Supreme Court agreed. Because Roach was misinformed about the maximum possible sentence, his plea was neither knowing nor in compliance with statutory requirements. The District Court erred in refusing to allow withdrawal of the guilty plea; the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to allow withdrawal. St. v. Roach, 1999 MT 38, 293 M 311, 975 P2d 817, 56 St. Rep. 161 (1999), following St. v. Brown, 262 M 499, 865 P2d 282, 50 St. Rep. 1658 (1993).

Change of Plea Agreement Properly Denied — Application of Contract Law Standards — Agreement Not to Prosecute Father — Benefit Derived by Defendant: Keys agreed to accept a motorcycle as collateral for a loan, but the motorcycle, which Keys subsequently sold, turned out to belong to the father of the individual to whom Keys made the loan. Both Keys and his father were charged with theft, but through his attorney, Keys negotiated an Alford plea with the prosecutor whereby the charges against Keys' father would be dropped and the prosecutor would recommend to the court that Keys' sentence be deferred for 4 years. At the hearing on the plea agreement, Keys, who could not read, had difficulty understanding that the District Court was not bound by and did not have to accept the agreement. However, after a lengthy colloquy with the District Court Judge, Keys eventually did state that he understood the agreement. The District Court then ordered that Keys' sentence be deferred for 6 years, and Keys requested that his plea be withdrawn, based upon his lack of understanding and a lack of consideration for his guilty plea. The District Court refused to allow the withdrawal, and the Supreme Court affirmed that refusal. The Supreme Court held that Keys did benefit from the agreement, that the benefits included the dismissal of charges against his father, and that in dismissing those charges, the state suffered the deprivation of a right (to pursue the conviction of Keys' father) that the law did not require. The Supreme Court also held that even though there was some confusion in Keys' mind over the role of the District Court in the agreement, the record showed by Keys' responses to questions by the District Court that Keys understood, at least at one point in time, that the court was not bound by the agreement. St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812, 56 St. Rep. 44 (1999), followed in St. v. D'Amico, 2000 MT 63, 299 M 57, 997 P2d 773, 57 St. Rep. 297 (2000), St. v. White, 2004 MT 103, 321 M 45, 88 P3d 1258 (2004), and Lout v. St., 2005 MT 93, 326 M 485, 111 P3d 199 (2005).

Role of Repressed Memory Therapy in Voluntariness of Alford Plea — Withdrawal of Plea: Ereth was charged with three counts of sexual intercourse without consent and two counts of sexual assault. Ereth claimed that she could not recall committing the crimes but was willing to undergo psychotherapy to determine whether she was repressing memories of the offenses. The public defender stated that Ereth was not capable of admitting guilt, despite the facts of the case, and that the only defense that could be brought forward was an Alford plea, which was entered. Following unsuccessful memory recall therapy and testimony of another therapist regarding the questionable science of repressed memory therapy, Ereth sought to withdraw her guilty pleas, alleging that she had been coerced into the pleas by the public defender and stating that had she known of the controversy surrounding the validity of the therapy, she would not have entered the pleas. Her motion to withdraw the pleas was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that, given the role that repressed memory therapy played in Ereth's decisionmaking process and the air of uncertainty regarding the validity of the therapy, there was doubt as to whether the Alford pleas had been made voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently and held that the trial court erred in refusing to allow withdrawal of the pleas. The case was reversed and remanded. St. v. Ereth, 1998 MT 197, 290 M 294, 964 P2d 26, 55 St. Rep. 831 (1998).

What Constitutes "Good Cause" Allowing Withdrawal of Guilty Plea — Doubt Resolved in Favor of Defendant: A District Court may permit a defendant to withdraw a guilty plea at any time, before or after judgment, for good cause shown. Although the determination of good cause is discretionary, the guiding principle is that a change of plea will be permitted if it fairly appears that: (1) defendant was ignorant of the defendant's rights and the consequences of the act; (2) defendant was influenced unduly and improperly either by hope or by fear in making the plea; or (3) the plea was entered under some mistake or misapprehension. If there is any doubt that a plea was involuntary, the doubt should be resolved in favor of defendant. St. v. Schaff, 1998 MT 104, 288 M 421, 958 P2d 682, 55 St. Rep. 396 (1998), clarifying St. v. McAllister, 96 M 348, 30 P2d 821 (1934), St. v. Haynie, 186 M 374, 607 P2d 1128 (1980), St. v. Mesler, 210 M 92, 682 P2d 714 (1984), Benjamin v. McCormick, 243 M 252, 792 P2d 7 (1990), St. v. Miller, 248 M 194, 810 P2d 308 (1991), and St. v. Cameron, 253 M 95, 830 P2d 1284 (1992), and followed in St. v. Osterloth, 2000 MT 129, 299 M 517, 1 P3d 946, 57 St. Rep. 533 (2000). See also St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812, 56 St. Rep. 44 (1999). The good cause standard was replaced by the federal voluntariness standard in St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005).

Failure to Adequately Inform Defendant of Rights Prior to Eliciting Factual Basis for Change of Plea and Breach of Plea Agreement by Prosecutor — Reversible Error: The District Court summarily denied Bowley's timely oral motion to withdraw a guilty plea three times. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the trial court erred in failing to inform Bowley of his constitutional rights, in neglecting to inquire as to the competency of counsel, and in not investigating whether Bowley was under the influence of alcohol or drugs before eliciting from Bowley the factual basis of his guilty plea at a change of plea hearing. Further, the record showed that the prosecutor, although following the recommendation of the probation officer, breached the plea agreement by suggesting a sentence different from that contained in the pretrial agreement. The motion to withdraw the guilty plea was timely. Having applied the three factors in St. v. Enoch, 269 M 8, 887 P2d 175 (1994), the Supreme Court found that good cause existed to permit withdrawal of the guilty plea and reversed and remanded with instructions to allow Bowley to withdraw the plea if desired or, alternatively, to sentence Bowley in accordance with the pretrial agreement. St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592, 54 St. Rep. 353 (1997), followed in St. v. Schoonover, 1999 MT 7, 293 M 54, 973 P2d 230, 56 St. Rep. 30 (1999), and St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015, 56 St. Rep. 551 (1999).

Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea — No Error: The defendant was charged with five counts of criminal sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs) and pleaded guilty to all five counts. The defendant was sentenced and then made a motion to withdraw the guilty pleas. The motion was denied. The Supreme Court stated that the standard in reviewing a denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea is whether the District Court abused its discretion. Applying three factors, the Supreme Court found that the District Court had not abused its discretion by denying the motion. St. v. Johnson, 274 M 124, 907 P2d 150, 52 St. Rep. 1186 (1995).

Lower Court Error in Not Allowing Withdrawal of Alford Guilty Plea: Enoch argued that the lower court erred in not allowing him to withdraw his Alford plea of guilty. The Supreme Court held that the lower court should have allowed the plea withdrawal based on the facts that: (1) the court's interrogation at the time that the plea was entered was inadequate; (2) Enoch's request to withdraw the plea within 2 months of entering the plea was timely; and (3) the court did not give enough weight to the fact that the plea was not the result of a plea bargain in which the guilty plea was given in exchange for the dismissal of another charge. St. v. Enoch, 269 M 8, 887 P2d 175, 51 St. Rep. 1306 (1994), following St. v. Radi, 250 M 155, 818 P2d 1203 (1991), as to factors to be weighed in determining whether to allow withdrawal of a guilty plea, followed in St. v. Johnson, 274 M 124, 907 P2d 150, 52 St. Rep. 1186 (1995), St. v. Gruendemann, 282 M 128, 935 P2d 1110, 54 St. Rep. 275 (1997), St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592, 54 St. Rep. 353 (1997), and St. v. Ereth, 1998 MT 197, 290 M 294, 964 P2d 26, 55 St. Rep. 831 (1998). Bowley was followed in St. v. Schoonover, 1999 MT 7, 293 M 54, 973 P2d 230, 56 St. Rep. 30 (1999).

Adequate Interrogation as to Consequences of Plea — No Mistake or Misunderstanding — Proper Guilty Plea as Waiver of Factual Defenses: Defendant contended that denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea was improper because the court's interrogation at an omnibus hearing was insufficient, because he was induced to enter the guilty plea, and because statements made by the victim after the plea was entered amounted to a recantation that required the court to allow withdrawal of the plea. However, denial of the motion was affirmed on appeal when the Supreme Court's examination of the record showed that: (1) the trial court's interrogation was adequate pursuant to St. v. Mahoney, 264 M 89, 870 P2d 65 (1994), despite the occurrence of some harmless error in the court's failure to inform defendant of the maximum and mandatory sentences for the crime; (2) evidence demonstrated that the guilty plea was timely and voluntary and entered without mistake or misunderstanding; and (3) the victim's statements were not exculpatory as to the crime to which defendant pleaded guilty. The Supreme Court cited St. v. Hilton, 183 M 13, 597 P2d 1171 (1979), in holding that by properly pleading guilty, defendant waived all factual defenses that occurred prior to the plea. St. v. Skroch, 267 M 349, 883 P2d 1256, 51 St. Rep. 1092 (1994), distinguishing State ex rel. Gladue v. District Court, 175 M 509, 575 P2d 65 (1978).

Applicability of Statutory Scheme for Withdrawal of Guilty Plea: Defendant pleaded guilty to deliberate homicide approximately 3 ½ months before 46-12-211, the statute that requires that a court inform the defendant of certain alternatives when contemplating withdrawal of a guilty plea, went into effect. The applicable statute in effect at the time was this section, which specifically stated that a judge was not required to allow the defendant to withdraw a guilty plea. Defendant's contention that the court was required to apply a statute that was not yet in effect was without merit. The District Court did not err in denying defendant's motion to withdraw the guilty plea. St. v. Strecker, 267 M 311, 883 P2d 841, 51 St. Rep. 1067 (1994).

Reinstatement of Charge Following Withdrawal of Plea — Not Double Jeopardy: The parties agreed that the state would recommend a 30-year sentence with 25 years suspended if Losson would plead guilty to mitigated deliberate homicide and that they would argue any additional sentence for weapon enhancement at the sentencing hearing, with the state arguing for the maximum 10-year sentence. After Losson pleaded guilty, the state informed her that it would introduce recently discovered evidence to prove that her motive was to gain $106,000 in life insurance and that it would use the evidence in support of its argument for weapon enhancement. Losson then withdrew her plea, and the state recharged her with deliberate homicide. Losson was ultimately convicted of mitigated deliberate homicide, but on appeal, she contended that the state breached the plea agreement and violated her double jeopardy protection by reinstating the deliberate homicide charge. The Supreme Court affirmed, noting that the state did not breach the plea agreement, but rather Losson chose to withdraw her plea. Double jeopardy protection does not relieve a defendant from the consequences of the voluntary choice of plea withdrawal. Further, Losson's double jeopardy argument was moot because she was only convicted on mitigated deliberate homicide and thus could not challenge the deliberate homicide charge. St. v. Losson, 262 M 342, 865 P2d 255, 50 St. Rep. 1588 (1993).

Intelligent, Voluntary Guilty Plea — Record and Memos Fully Supporting Refusal to Set Plea Aside: The record showed that the guilty plea accepted by the District Court explained the charge, the minimum and maximum punishment, defendant's rights, what rights he waived by pleading guilty, the consequences of a guilty plea, that the County Attorney agreed not to seek the death penalty but could recommend any sentence, and the factual basis for the guilty plea. It also stated he was competent, was not under the influence of alcohol or drugs, and had been well-advised. Three days prior to the entry of the guilty plea in open court, he signed two memoranda to file. One memorandum described the events leading up to the murder and the murder itself; discussed the conferences defendant had with his attorneys during which the possibility of a guilty plea was discussed; stated that after pondering this decision in many conferences, he instructed his attorneys to make arrangements for the entry of his plea; and stated that his attorneys repeatedly advised that the decision to plead guilty was entirely in his control and that decision was made independently. The other memorandum discussed the possible sentence for deliberate homicide and that the County Attorney agreed to not recommend the death penalty in exchange for a guilty plea but reserved the right to recommend any sentence, including imprisonment for 100 years, and stated that his attorneys made no recommendation for or against a guilty plea but that after consideration he decided to plead guilty to avoid the trauma of trial for his parents, children, family, and wife. Given the evidence in the record that the defendant gave his guilty plea intelligently and voluntarily, the District Court did not err in refusing to set aside his guilty plea. St. v. Docken, 222 M 58, 720 P2d 679, 43 St. Rep. 1058 (1986), followed in St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530, 47 St. Rep. 1677 (1990).

Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Request Based on Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: The Supreme Court applied the rule for allowing withdrawal of a guilty plea as set forth in St. v. Laverdure, 212 M 31, 685 P2d 375, 41 St. Rep. 1570 (1984), and held that defendant's motion was properly refused by the trial court. The trial judge's interrogation at the time he took defendant's plea was adequate. Defendant's request was not timely. It was made more than a year after entering the plea. Defendant's plea was clearly the result of a plea bargain. Furthermore, defendant's reasons for wanting to withdraw his guilty plea centered around his ineffective assistance of counsel claim, which the Supreme Court rejected. St. v. LaTray, 220 M 358, 715 P2d 52, 43 St. Rep. 429 (1986).

Guilty Plea Not Equivalent to Coercion: Plea bargaining is not equivalent to coercion, and a guilty plea entered to avoid increased punishment as a persistent felony offender was not coerced. Although defendant's attorney's advice regarding use of a prior felony conviction for designation as a persistent felony offender was erroneous, this did not amount to ineffective assistance of counsel. Because defendant was charged with two additional felonies, the District Court did not err in denying the motion to withdraw the plea. St. v. Williamson, 218 M 242, 707 P2d 530, 42 St. Rep. 1551 (1985).

Guilty Plea Withdrawal Requested on Petition to Revoke Suspension of Sentence — Denied: Order denying motion to withdraw guilty plea was affirmed when: (1) there was no evidence the plea was coerced; (2) the plea was apparently the result of a plea bargain; (3) at the time of the plea the judge interrogated defendant about nearly all the issues involved, such as voluntariness and competency; (4) his attorney at the time stated he was satisfied defendant was acting voluntarily; and (5) defendant did not promptly attempt to withdraw the plea, the attempt coming only when, 3 years after the plea was entered, he was in danger of having his suspended sentence revoked. St. v. Flamm, 215 M 466, 697 P2d 1371, 42 St. Rep. 547 (1985).

Factors: There are three important factors to be considered when a defendant attempts to withdraw a bargained plea: (1) adequacy of the court's interrogation when the plea was entered as to defendant's understanding of the plea; (2) that the plea resulted from plea bargaining; and (3) the promptness of the motion to withdraw. A plea change will be permitted only if it fairly appears that defendant was ignorant of his rights and the consequences of his act or was unduly and improperly influenced by hope or fear in making the plea or that the plea was entered under some mistake or misapprehension. (See 1985 amendment note.) St. v. Mesler, 210 M 92, 682 P2d 714, 41 St. Rep. 939 (1984). However, see St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005), in which the factors were replaced by the federal voluntariness standard. See also St. v. Radi, 250 M 155, 818 P2d 1203, 48 St. Rep. 903 (1991), St. v. Johnson, 274 M 124, 907 P2d 150, 52 St. Rep. 1186 (1995), St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592, 54 St. Rep. 353 (1997), St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015, 56 St. Rep. 551 (1999), and St. v. Osterloth, 2000 MT 129, 299 M 517, 1 P3d 946, 57 St. Rep. 533 (2000). Bowley was followed in St. v. Schoonover, 1999 MT 7, 293 M 54, 973 P2d 230, 56 St. Rep. 30 (1999), and St. v. Garner, 2001 MT 222, 306 M 462, 36 P3d 346 (2001).

Prison's Custody Classification as Alleged Violation of Plea Bargaining Agreement — Withdrawal of Plea Denied: Under a plea bargain agreement, defendant was sentenced to 10 years as a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) without parole. Upon entering prison, he was held in close custody for 24 months under prison rules calling for dangerous offenders and those sentenced without parole to serve 24 months in close custody prior to being considered for transfer to lower, more amenable custody levels. The prosecution, defense counsel, defendant, and judge were all unaware of those rules. Defendant was not entitled to withdraw his plea on the ground he was kept in close custody for 24 months in violation of his plea agreement. There was no violation of the agreement, nor was he entitled to the additional good time credits he would have received had he not been held so long in close custody. Prison officials take many factors into account in making custody reclassifications, and there was no guarantee he would have been held in close custody only for the time he claimed he should have been upon entry to the prison. St. v. Mesler, 210 M 92, 682 P2d 714, 41 St. Rep. 939 (1984).

Plea Based on Promised Lenience — Inadmissible: Plaintiff pleaded guilty to sexual intercourse without consent. He later withdrew the plea, which was based on plea bargaining, and went to trial. At the trial, plaintiff's confession upon entering the plea was used to impeach him. The Montana Supreme Court upheld plaintiff's conviction, on the ground that the plea was voluntary, in St. v. Hansen, 194 M 197, 633 P2d 1202, 38 St. Rep. 1541 (1981). Plaintiff brought this action, contending that the admission of his confession violated his rights under the fifth amendment to the United States Constitution (similar to Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const.). The court held that where a plea is brought about by thoughts of promised lenience, it cannot be admitted into evidence when it has been withdrawn. The court ordered a new trial. Hansen v. Risley, 40 St. Rep. 2100 (D.C. Mont. 1983) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement).

Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Properly Refused:

The defendant entered a plea of guilty to the offense of forgery after having been carefully interrogated by the court. The court had determined that the defendant was competent and not under the influence of drugs or alcohol, that the plea was voluntarily entered, and that the defendant understood the charges, the possible punishment, and his right to a jury trial. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the defendant's pro se motion to withdraw his guilty plea, the standards set forth in St. v. Huttinger, 182 M 50, 595 P2d 363 (1979), having been met. St. v. Gates, 199 M 256, 648 P2d 285, 39 St. Rep. 1329 (1982).

It is the sole province of the trial court to determine whether a motion to withdraw a guilty plea should be granted. The abuse of discretion required to reverse the lower court is not present in this case in light of petitioner's continual insistence on a guilty plea, the evidence against him, and the careful and explicit explanation given the petitioner by the court. In re Hardy, 188 M 506, 614 P2d 528 (1980).

The denial of a motion to withdraw a plea of guilty was upheld when the chief contention was that the defendant was misled by the erroneous advice of counsel as to his guilt under the law and when from the record there was evidence that would have justified a finding of guilty, regardless of the correctness of the counsel's interpretation of the law. St. v. Nance, 120 M 152, 184 P2d 554 (1947), distinguished in St. v. Holt, 121 M 459, 194 P2d 651 (1948).

When the defendant pleaded guilty to two charges of murder, was sentenced to life imprisonment on each, and 3 years later filed motions for leave to withdraw his pleas of guilty and substitute pleas of not guilty by reason of insanity caused by alcoholism, alleging in his affidavit that he pleaded on the advice of his attorney and was unaware of the effect of a former section requiring consecutive terms if a person had been convicted of two or more offenses before sentence had been pronounced for either, it was held that the evidence was sufficient to deny the motions, that the court did not abuse its discretion in finding him sane when he pleaded, that he was faithfully represented, and that he was aware that he couldn't escape a jury trial and a possible death sentence if he had done otherwise. St. v. Hukoveh, 115 M 125, 139 P2d 538 (1943).

Voluntariness of Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Against Advice of Counsel: The defendant persisted in pleading guilty in spite of his counsel's advice to plead not guilty. The defendant could not later request a withdrawal of the plea, claiming he had not made a voluntary and intelligent choice. St. v. Wilson, 198 M 305, 645 P2d 958, 39 St. Rep. 1000 (1982)

Withdrawal of Guilty Plea — Competence of Defendant to Plead Not in Issue: The competence of the defendant to plead guilty was not at issue even though the defendant withdrew his notice of intent to rely on mental defect as a defense, requested to confer with the County Attorney without his counsel, and pleaded guilty against the advice of his counsel. Because the defendant outlined the facts of the crimes at the time of entry of his plea and 5 months later gave the same testimony at another trial, he was in full possession of his mental faculties. St. v. Wilson, 198 M 305, 645 P2d 958, 39 St. Rep. 1000 (1982).

Withdrawal of Guilty Plea — Failure of Court to Explain Differences Among Counts: After pleading guilty to multiple counts arising from a homicide, the defendant made a voluntary statement to the court clearly showing he was guilty on two counts of deliberate homicide. Failure of the District Court to explain the differences between deliberate homicide, mitigated homicide, and aggravated assault did not provide grounds for withdrawal of the guilty plea. St. v. Wilson, 198 M 305, 645 P2d 958, 39 St. Rep. 1000 (1982).

Notice Requirements for Guilty Plea: Defendant and three friends had been drinking and taking LSD. Defendant planned to get valuable coins from one friend and not pay for them. The friend found out about defendant's plan. Defendant stabbed him to death and sank the body through a hole in the ice on the Tongue River. Defendant was arrested and arraigned. He pleaded not guilty to deliberate homicide. He underwent psychiatric evaluation and was found competent to stand trial. Defendant then requested that he be allowed to change his plea to guilty. The District Court questioned him at length on the voluntariness of his decision and his understanding of the consequences accompanying the changed plea. On appeal, defendant contended it was error not to later allow him to withdraw the guilty plea. Defendant was advised of the elements of deliberate homicide and mitigated deliberate homicide. He was also advised of the required mental state for the offense charged. The Supreme Court held that the combination of the District Judge's examination and the explanation by defendant's attorney was sufficient to show that defendant had "real notice" of all that was required to make a voluntary and understanding plea of guilty to deliberate homicide. It was not error to later deny the request to withdraw the plea. St. v. White, 194 M 421, 632 P2d 1118, 38 St. Rep. 1417 (1981).

Discretion of Court: A view of the record indicates no new or additional evidence that would entitle petitioner to a new hearing or any reversal by the District Court of its 1979 order. Petitioner shows no reason why the District Court abused its discretion in denying withdrawal of his plea; and petitioner having presented no new facts, the issue is without merit. Additionally, the Supreme Court rejected petitioner's contention that he was denied due process in sentencing because he did not understand the consequences of his plea. Gardipee v. Blodgett, 193 M 314, 631 P2d 1270, 38 St. Rep. 909 (1981).

Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea — 5 ½ Years After Plea: The District Court did not err in refusing to grant defendant's motion to withdraw a plea of guilty to one charge of rape, which was arrived at after extensive plea bargaining, accompanied by a dismissal of 10 remaining counts. Though the court's interrogation of defendant at time he entered the plea of guilty was inadequate, the defendant waited 5 ½ years before he expressed dissatisfaction with his plea, and he may not, after this length of time, escape the obligations of a plea bargain and accept its benefits. (See 1985 amendment note.) St. v. Haynie, 186 M 374, 607 P2d 1128 (1980), followed in St. v. Bigsmoke, 197 M 307, 642 P2d 1068, 39 St. Rep. 581 (1982).

Doubt as to Requisite Mental State and Lack of Notice of Crime's Elements: The defendant was not made aware of the differing elements of assault as set forth in 45-5-201 and 45-5-202, and the District Court had before it evidence indicating that defendant was under the influence of a combination of drugs and alcohol and was possibly suffering from mental distress or instability at the time of the alleged assault. Under these circumstances the judge should not have accepted defendant's guilty plea, and defendant should be allowed to withdraw the plea. St. v. Nelson, 184 M 491, 603 P2d 1050, 36 St. Rep. 2228 (1979).

Factors: An appeal of a court's refusal to permit a defendant to withdraw a guilty plea involved a balancing of three conflicting factors: (1) the adequacy of the interrogation by the District Court of the defendant at the entry of the guilty plea as to the defendant's understanding of the consequences of his plea; (2) the promptness with which the defendant attempted to withdraw the prior plea; and (3) the fact that the defendant's plea was apparently the result of a plea bargain in which the guilty plea was given in exchange for dismissal of another charge. (See 1985 amendment note.) St. v. Huttinger, 182 M 50, 595 P2d 363 (1979), followed in St. v. Bigsmoke, 197 M 307, 642 P2d 1068, 39 St. Rep. 581 (1982), and St. v. Schaff, 1998 MT 104, 288 M 421, 958 P2d 682, 55 St. Rep. 396 (1998), and overruled in St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005), which replaced the Huttinger factors and adopted the federal voluntariness test as the ultimate test for withdrawal of a plea.

Improper Refusal to Permit: Because there was evidence that the petitioner had always maintained his innocence, pleaded guilty only after being induced to do so by his attorney of record, and feared he had no chance of proving his innocence in a jury trial, the District Court abused its discretion in not allowing a withdrawal of the guilty plea and ordering a trial on the merits. State ex rel. Gladue v. District Court, 175 M 509, 575 P2d 65 (1978), followed in St. v. Ereth, 1998 MT 197, 290 M 294, 964 P2d 26, 55 St. Rep. 831 (1998).

Motion Granted: The District Court did not err in reversing an order of the Justice's Court denying a motion for the withdrawal of a guilty plea made inadvisedly without an understanding of the consequences, since doubts should be resolved in favor of a trial on the merits. There was no impropriety sufficient to invoke the supervisory control of the Supreme Court, even though it would have been a proper form of review. St. v. Doty, 173 M 233, 566 P2d 1388 (1977), distinguished in St. v. Fox, 2001 MT 209, 306 M 353, 34 P3d 484 (2001).

Denial of Motion to Withdraw: When, after originally pleading not guilty, the defendant, on advice of counsel, pleaded guilty to a charge of burglary as part of a plea bargaining arrangement, after which time evidence of the burglary was returned to its owner, he could not change his plea back to not guilty upon recapture after his escape from jail. St. v. Sattler, 170 M 35, 549 P2d 1080 (1976).

Renewed Charge After Withdrawal: A defendant who pleaded guilty to a lesser offense after the jury was seated, but prior to the calling of any witnesses, and then 2 months later withdrew his guilty plea was properly recharged with the original greater offense without violation of his protection against double jeopardy. St. v. Cunningham, 166 M 530, 535 P2d 186 (1975).

Erroneous Refusal to Permit:

The court held, on the facts of the particular case, that when the defendant at the time of entering his plea of guilty thought that he had an understanding as to what his sentence would be and no direct commitment was made to him by any of the officers, but the officers had made statements to others who were in contact with the defendant and upon whose advice he relied, the ends of justice would be best served by permitting the defendant to change his plea. St. v. Morgan, 131 M 58, 307 P2d 244 (1957), distinguished in St. v. Mack, 134 M 301, 330 P2d 968 (1958).

When the evidence discloses that there was a grave doubt that the defendant had the mental capacity to appreciate and understand what he was doing and the consequences thereof and when, without benefit of counsel, he pleaded guilty to the charge of murder, the defendant should have been allowed to withdraw his plea of guilty and enter a plea of not guilty. St. v. Dryman, 125 M 500, 241 P2d 821 (1952), distinguished in St. v. Bischert, 131 M 152, 308 P2d 969 (1957).

The defendant, a Mexican without education and unfamiliar with court procedure, stood charged with murder in the first degree. When he asked for a jury trial, his first attorney asked to be relieved of his assignment; the second advised the defendant to plead guilty and take a life sentence because, if he were tried by jury, the sentence would be one of death. The defendant's plea was guilty, and the trial court imposed the death sentence. The court held that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to grant the defendant's motion for permission to change his plea to one of not guilty. St. v. Casaras, 104 M 404, 66 P2d 774 (1937).

Discretion of Court: The granting or refusal of permission to withdraw a plea of guilty and substitute a plea of not guilty rests in the discretion of the trial court and is subject to review only when an abuse of discretion is shown. St. v. Nance, 120 M 152, 184 P2d 554 (1947), distinguished in St. v. Holt, 121 M 459, 194 P2d 651 (1948).

PLEA BARGAIN

Plea Agreement as Contract: The state charged Smietanka with the felony offense of sexual intercourse without consent. Smietanka and the state subsequently entered into a plea agreement pursuant to which the state agreed to amend the information to charge misdemeanor offenses of assault and negligent endangerment and eliminate the sexual intercourse without consent offense. The state further agreed to recommend that the District Court sentence Smietanka to a 6-month suspended sentence on each count, with the sentences to run concurrently, and with credit for 200 days for time served in jail. In return, Smietanka agreed to plead guilty to the two misdemeanor offenses and to pay a fine, public defender fees, and costs as determined by the court. Smietanka appeared in District Court and pleaded guilty to the two misdemeanor offenses. The court accepted the guilty pleas and proceeded directly to sentencing. The state then recommended a 6-month suspended sentence on the assault offense and a concurrent 12-month suspended sentence on the negligent endangerment offense, with 200 days credit for time served. The state also requested the court impose restitution payable to the Montana Department of Justice's crime victims compensation program. A plea agreement is a contract between the state and a defendant. Prosecutors are required to meet strict and meticulous standards in both promise and performance when fulfilling the state's obligations pursuant to a plea agreement. A prosecutor's violation of a plea agreement is unacceptable, even when made inadvertently in a good faith pursuit of a just outcome. The case was reversed and remanded to the District Court for resentencing. St. v. Smietanka, 2008 MT 357, 346 M 353, 195 P3d 797, (2008).

Sentence Based on Recommendation of Sexual Offender Evaluator — State Breach of Plea Agreement by Presenting Conflicting Testimony of Different Evaluator: In a plea agreement, the state agreed to recommend one sentence if Rahn was designated by a sexual offender evaluator as a level 2 or lower offender and a harsher sentence if Rahn was designated as a level 3 offender. An evaluator who personally evaluated Rahn opined that Rahn should be designated as a level 2 offender. At the sentencing hearing, the state presented testimony by a different evaluator, who had not evaluated Rahn, attacking the level 2 designation and arguing that Rahn should be designated as a level 3 offender. Rahn objected on grounds that the state witness's testimony breached the plea agreement, but the sentencing court overruled the objection and subsequently designated Rahn as a level 3 offender and imposed the harsher sentence. Rahn appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Rahn complied with the plea agreement, but the state's conduct in presenting alternate testimony and recommending a level 3 designation was not what was agreed upon in the plea bargain; therefore, the state breached the plea agreement. The state was obligated to make the recommendation as agreed upon in the plea bargain, and the Supreme Court remanded for resentencing with a different judge pursuant to the terms of the plea agreement. St. v. Rahn, 2008 MT 201, 344 M 110, 187 P3d 622 (2008).

Adequate Notice of Amount of Support Owed — Guilty Plea Not Involuntary Based on Defendant's Belief That Different Amount Owed: Milligan contended that he would not have pleaded guilty to felony nonsupport if he had known that he would be liable for $55,404.65 in restitution rather than $45,000 indicated in the affidavit attached to the charging information. However, when the information and affidavit were considered in conjunction with the plea agreement, statements of the District Court at the change of plea hearing, and the presentence investigation report, all of which apprised Milligan that the actual amount due was $55,404.65, Milligan was reasonably notified that he could be required to pay the full amount due, including restitution owing during the 2 years that had elapsed after the information was filed. Milligan was not laboring under a fundamental mistake when he pleaded guilty, and his plea was not involuntary. Restitution of $55,404.65 was affirmed. St. v. Milligan, 2008 MT 36, 341 M 316, 177 P3d 500 (2008).

No Right to Be Informed of Possibility of Lesser Included Offense When No Such Possibility Exists: Defendant was charged with felony attempted sexual assault, but ultimately pleaded nolo contendere to a charge of felony attempted kidnapping. After being sentenced to 10 years in prison, defendant appealed the conviction on grounds that the trial court erred by failing to inform defendant that he could have been convicted on a lesser charge of unlawful restraint and by failing to allow withdrawal of the guilty plea. However, only those lesser included offenses applicable to the charge of felony attempted sexual assault were relevant to defendant's decision to plead nolo contendere. The court and the state could not be faulted for failing to inform defendant of any lesser included offense that was not relevant to defendant's decision, and defendant had no right to be informed of the possibility of submitting a lesser included offense instruction to the jury when no such possibility existed. Absent anything in the record that an omission, misinformation, or mental incapacity hindered defendant's ability to enter knowingly and intelligently into a plea agreement, the trial court did not err in holding that defendant failed to establish good cause to withdraw the plea, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Iafornaro, 2007 MT 77, 336 M 489, 155 P3d 1238 (2007).

State Breach of Plea Agreement — Remand for Resentencing in Conformity With Sentencing Stipulation: Pursuant to a plea bargain, a youth was placed on probation until age 18 with a sentencing stipulation that if the youth did not follow treatment plans or meet other requirements, the matter would be transferred to District Court and adult supervision. The youth subsequently violated probation and was sent to the Pine Hills correctional facility. The youth reoffended at Pine Hills, and the state moved to transfer the case to District Youth Court. Despite the sentencing stipulation, the state moved for a custodial sentence, and the Youth Court concurred with the state's recommendation and sentenced the youth to the Department of Corrections until age 25, with the last 3 years suspended. The youth appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Both parties were bound by the terms of the plea agreement, and although the case was transferred to District Court as per the agreement, the state failed to follow the terms of the agreement when it sought a custodial sentence rather than adult supervision for the youth. Upon resentencing following the subsequent revocation for violation of sentencing conditions, the youth was entitled to receive the sentence that was presented to and approved by the Youth Court, and the Youth Court abused its discretion by failing to hold the state to the terms of the sentencing stipulation and by ordering the custodial sentence. On remand, the Youth Court was ordered to resentence the youth in accordance with the terms of the sentencing stipulation. In re H.C.R., 2007 MT 64, 336 M 369, 155 P3d 1221 (2007), following St. v. Rardon, 1999 MT 220, 296 M 19, 986 P2d 424 (1999), and St. v. Rardon, 2002 MT 345, 313 M 321, 61 P3d 132 (2002).

State Allowed to Present Evidence Regarding Veracity of Information Defendant Raises in Arguing for Sentence Without Breaching Plea Agreement: At a sentencing hearing, Bartosh testified regarding information in the presentence investigation report, asserting that he had complied with his treatment plan and that certain transcripts of telephone conversations attached to the report should be stricken because they undermined the plea agreement. The District Court declined to strike the transcripts and allowed the probation officer who prepared the report to testify in response to Bartosh's testimony. On appeal, Bartosh contended that it was error to allow the probation officer to testify because the testimony undermined the plea agreement. The Supreme Court held that the telephone transcripts were relevant and properly allowed as indicative of Bartosh's acts. The court also affirmed the sentencing court's decision to allow the probation officer's testimony. Once Bartosh testified as to his conduct concerning compliance with the treatment plan, the state was justified in presenting the probation officer who had conflicting information. If a defendant chooses to present information in support of a sentence, the state may counter with testimony to the effect that the information is misleading or untrue without breaching a plea agreement. St. v. Bartosh, 2007 MT 59, 336 M 212, 154 P3d 58 (2007).

No Challenge to Legality of Sentence on Direct Appeal — Postconviction Relief Barred: Hardin claimed in a petition for postconviction relief that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to accept a nolo contendere plea to a sexual offense because such a plea is prohibited under this section. The petition was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Hardin failed to challenge the legality of the sentence on direct appeal, so the claim was procedurally barred by 46-21-105 from postconviction relief. Hardin v. St., 2006 MT 272, 334 M 204, 146 P3d 746 (2006).

No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel When Defendant Benefits From Nolo Contendere Plea for Sexual Offense: In a claim for postconviction relief, Hardin asserted that he was denied effective assistance when his counsel successfully negotiated a nolo contendere plea for a sexual offense because the plea was illegal pursuant to this section. The Supreme Court noted that just because a sentence is illegal does not necessarily mean that there is merit to a claim of ineffective counsel. Rather, the defendant must meet both prongs of the Strickland test, requiring a showing both that counsel was deficient and that the defendant was prejudiced by the deficient performance. Here, Hardin could not demonstrate prejudice. By being allowed to enter a nolo contendere plea, Hardin actually benefited from the plea agreement without an express acknowledgement of guilt. Hardin could not show that counsel's performance was deficient when he received a more lenient, albeit illegal, sentence. Hardin v. St., 2006 MT 272, 334 M 204, 146 P3d 746 (2006).

Sufficient Accurate Information to Support Sentence for Distribution of Methamphetamine: Harper was sentenced to 20 years in prison with 10 years suspended and fined $12,000 after pleading guilty to possession of dangerous drugs with intent to distribute. Harper appealed on grounds that the sentencing court based the sentence on inaccurate and insufficient evidence that Harper was the center of the drug operation. Harper had a right to be sentenced based on correct evidence, but also had the affirmative duty to show, beyond mere unsupported contentions, that the alleged misinformation was materially inaccurate and to present information establishing inaccuracies in the presentence investigation report. In this case, the sentencing court did nothing more than consider relevant information relating to the nature and circumstances of the possession of drugs found during the search of Harper's home, including unrefuted information that Harper was at the center of a methamphetamine distribution business conducted from the home. Information in the presentence investigation report simply underscored Harper's involvement in drug distribution and supported that charge to which Harper pleaded guilty. The information was properly before the sentencing court, and the court did not err in imposing a sentence within the statutory parameters. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Harper, 2006 MT 259, 334 M 138, 144 P3d 826 (2006), followed in St. v. Walker, 2007 MT 205, 338 M 529, 167 P3d 879 (2007), with respect to defendant's affirmative duty to show, beyond mere unsupported contentions, that alleged misinformation in a presentence investigation report was materially inaccurate and to present information establishing inaccuracies in the presentence investigation report.

No Right to Appeal Judgment Absent Adverse Determination of Specific Pretrial Motion: Defendant filed a pretrial motion to dismiss a felony deviate sexual conduct offense on equal protection grounds, but prior to a ruling on the motion, defendant entered a plea agreement, pleaded guilty, and reserved the right to appeal the constitutional issue. The District Court accepted the plea, but did not accept the terms of the plea agreement, and following conviction, defendant appealed the equal protection issue. Although a defendant who knowingly and voluntarily pleads guilty generally waives the right to appeal any nonjurisdictional defects and defenses that occurred prior to the plea, under subsection (3) of this section, a defendant may enter a guilty plea and reserve the right to appeal an adverse determination of any specified pretrial motion. However, the District Court did not rule against the pretrial motion to dismiss, so defendant's reservation of the right to appeal did not meet the statutory condition. Defendant's conditional guilty plea was invalid because the state was not authorized to consent to it and the District Court was not authorized to approve it, so the Supreme Court vacated the guilty plea and sentence and reversed for further proceedings. St. v. Rytky, 2006 MT 134, 332 M 364, 137 P3d 530 (2006).

Plea Bargain Rejected — Imposition of State-Recommended Maximum Sentence Not Violative of Due Process: Killam was charged with felony aggravated assault with a weapon. The state entered into plea negotiations, but Killam rejected the proposed agreement. Killam ultimately pleaded guilty. At sentencing, the state recommended the maximum sentence, which was greater than the sentence offered in the plea agreement, and the sentencing court imposed the maximum statutory sentence. On appeal, Killam contended that the state acted vindictively and violated Killam's due process rights by recommending a more severe sentence than was offered in the plea negotiations, citing N.C. v. Pearce, 395 US 711 (1969), and Blackledge v. Perry, 417 US 21 (1974). The Supreme Court distinguished both federal cases because they dealt with vindictiveness based on harsher sentences imposed following retrial, while Killam argued vindictiveness during initial sentencing. The court noted that a defendant is free to accept or reject a plea offer, but if the offer is rejected, the prosecution may proceed with the case and make any legal sentencing recommendation because there is no agreement to the contrary. When Killam entered a guilty plea, the District Court informed him of the maximum sentence and the state was free to recommend the maximum statutory sentence. Thus, imposition of the maximum sentence did not violate Killam's due process rights. St. v. Killam, 2005 MT 255, 329 M 50, 122 P3d 439 (2005), following Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 US 357 (1978).

Consideration at Sentencing of Alleged Crimes Dismissed by Plea Bargain Not Violative of Due Process: At sentencing, the District Court considered allegations of other crimes for which Mason had been initially charged but that had been dismissed by plea agreement. Mason contended that consideration of statements related to unproved conduct violated the right to due process. The Supreme Court noted that due process protects a defendant from being sentenced based on misinformation and requires that a defendant be given an opportunity to rebut any information that may lead to deprivation of life, liberty, or property, but does not protect against all misinformation unless the sentence is premised on materially false misinformation. The court also noted that St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376 (1996), allows a sentencing court to consider any evidence that has probative force, including other acts that have been dismissed by plea agreement, as in St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222 (1981). Nothing in Mason's plea agreement prevented the state from presenting the facts of the case during the sentencing hearing, and in fact, that inquiry is required as part of the presentence investigation report under 46-18-112. Mason failed to show that the sentencing court relied on misinformation and thus was not entitled to resentencing on due process grounds. Further, the plea agreement required relinquishment of Mason's parental rights, so the sentencing court properly considered evidence of the danger Mason posed to the other children in order to approve that portion of the agreement. St. v. Mason, 2003 MT 371, 319 M 117, 82 P3d 903 (2003), followed in St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005), and St. v. Phillips, 2007 MT 117, 337 M 248, 159 P3d 1078 (2007).

Improper Prosecutorial Solicitation of Testimony Intended to Undermine Plea Agreement — Choice of Remedies on Remand: The prosecutor in Rardon's sexual assault trial gave lip service to the letter of a plea agreement by recommending the sentence suggested in the presentence investigation, but then went on to solicit inflammatory testimony from the victims that would almost undoubtedly cause the court to question the appropriateness of the recommended sentence, which effectively undercut the plea agreement. Although it is appropriate for a prosecutor to questions victims and solicit their testimony at a sentencing hearing and for victims to express their fears and feelings, it is not acceptable for a prosecutor to aggressively solicit testimony that is clearly intended to undermine a plea agreement and to convince the sentencing court that a bargained sentence agreement should not be accepted. A plea agreement is subject to contract law standards, and prosecutors must meet strict and meticulous standards of both promise and performance. A guilty plea resting on an unfulfilled promise in a plea bargain is involuntary, and prosecutorial violations, even if made inadvertently or in good faith to obtain a just and mutually desired end, are unacceptable. When the prosecution breaches a plea agreement, the sentencing judge may determine the appropriate remedy, which may include withdrawal of the guilty plea or specific performance of the plea agreement in a new sentencing hearing with a different prosecutor and judge. St. v. Rardon, 2002 MT 345, 313 M 321, 61 P3d 132 (2002). On remand, the prosecutor's presentation of the state's case did not undermine the plea bargained sentence recommendation or violate the contract law standards of the plea agreement. The sentencing judge was entitled to consider evidence of Rardon's abusive history and violent tendencies, as well as Rardon's daughter's opinion that Rardon should receive a lengthy sentence. None of the prosecutorial improprieties identified in previous hearings were present in the third sentencing hearing, nor did Rardon demonstrate any other kind of prosecutorial impropriety, so Rardon's third sentence was affirmed. St. v. Rardon, 2005 MT 129, 327 M 228, 115 P3d 182 (2005). The 2005 Rardon decision was followed in St. v. Bartosh, 2007 MT 59, 336 M 212, 154 P3d 58 (2007), and St. v. Rahn, 2008 MT 201, 344 M 110, 187 P3d 622 (2008). See also St. v. Lamere, 272 M 355, 900 P2d 926 (1995), St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), and St. v. Munoz, 2001 MT 85, 305 M 139, 23 P3d 922 (2001).

Additional Sentence Condition Added Following Plea Agreement — Error in Not Allowing Withdrawal of Guilty Plea: Afterbuffalo pleaded guilty to criminal endangerment pursuant to a plea agreement. The sentencing court imposed the recommended 3-year suspended sentence, but also added a requirement that Afterbuffalo be placed in either a prerelease or an intensive supervision program. Afterbuffalo claimed that the sentence was outside the scope of the plea agreement and moved to withdraw the guilty plea because the requirement was not a standard condition of probation. The motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that the additional requirement was outside the scope of the plea agreement. In entering the plea agreement, Afterbuffalo bargained for the benefit of an ordinary suspended sentence, but the additional requirement was not a standard condition of probation and materially changed the impact of the suspended sentence. Addition of the probation requirement constituted a rejection of the agreement by the sentencing court. Thus, pursuant to 46-12-211, the sentencing court was required to allow withdrawal of the guilty plea, and abused its discretion in failing to do so. St. v. Afterbuffalo, 2002 MT 14, 308 M 163, 40 P3d 375 (2002).

Guilty Plea Constituting Waiver of Nonjurisdictional Defects and Defenses: Gordon was charged in Montana with the murder, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery of an Idaho man. Gordon sought a ruling on a motion to require enforcement of the second of two plea agreements entered into with Idaho authorities regarding a sentence that might be imposed if Gordon's implicity was proved in the homicide or if he was not truthful in the ongoing investigation. The state argued that Idaho could not bind Montana to a pretrial agreement in which Montana had not participated and contended that Idaho had previously voided the second plea agreement because of Gordon's untruthfulness. The District Court denied the motion. Gordon subsequently entered a plea agreement with Montana. The court obtained Gordon's understanding of the rights that he would give up by pleading guilty, including the right to an appeal. The court accepted Gordon's guilty plea to aggravated kidnapping and dismissed the other charges, ultimately imposing an 80-year sentence as recommended in the state plea agreement. On appeal, Gordon asserted that his constitutional rights were violated when the District Court did not sentence him pursuant to the second Idaho plea agreement. Citing St. v. Wheeler, 285 M 400, 948 P2d 698, 54 St. Rep. 1213 (1997), the Supreme Court held that after a criminal defendant pleads guilty of the offense charged, only the voluntary and intelligent character of the guilty plea may be attacked and that independent claims relating to prior deprivations of constitutional rights may not be raised. A voluntary and intelligent guilty plea constitutes a waiver of nonjurisdictional defects and defenses. St. v. Gordon, 1999 MT 169, 295 M 183, 983 P2d 377, 56 St. Rep. 654 (1999).

Plea to Lesser Included Offense — Introduction at Sentencing of Evidence of Commission of Charged Offense — Language of Plea Agreement: Collier was arrested and charged with solicitation of deliberate homicide, which was reduced to criminal endangerment by a plea bargain. At the District Court level and on appeal, Collier challenged the state's introduction of evidence tending to prove her commission of the originally charged offense. The Supreme Court upheld the introduction of the evidence, noting not only that the rules of evidence do not apply in sentencing, but also that the plea agreement provided that "counsel for the State may make any recommendation and may introduce . . . evidence in support thereof at the time of sentencing". St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376, 53 St. Rep. 534 (1996).

Imposition of Sentence Different From That Recommended by Plea Bargain Agreement — No Error: Larson argued that the trial court's granting of the state's motion to amend a count from attempted sexual intercourse without consent to sexual assault constituted the court's approval of the charging part of a plea agreement and that the court thus erred in failing to follow the sentencing part of the agreement by imposing a greater sentence than recommended. A plea agreement is between the prosecutor and the defendant. A judge may not participate in and is not bound by the plea agreement. The court's grant of the motion to amend the charge did not signify that the court would or did approve of the agreement, nor is there any case law or statute that requires the court to inform a defendant of the sentence that will be imposed before a guilty plea is withdrawn. St. v. Larson, 266 M 28, 878 P2d 886, 51 St. Rep. 638 (1994).

Failure of State to Honor Plea Bargain — Remand: Owens was charged in two informations, alleging theft and forgery, both felonies. A plea bargain stated that the County Attorney would recommend a 15-year sentence for both charges and not seek a persistent offender designation. The state did not contest Owens' understanding of the agreement that Owens would receive a total of 15 years for the two charges, with the sentences running concurrently. At the state's suggestion and over objection, Owens was subsequently sentenced to 15 years with 5 suspended for forgery and 10 years with 5 suspended for theft, a total of 25 years with 10 suspended, with the sentences to run consecutively. Owens' decision to plead guilty based on the promise of concurrent sentencing, coupled with the differences in the restraints of freedom that often accompany suspended sentences, amounted to a prosecutorial violation of the plea bargain agreement warranting remand and resentencing consistent with the plea agreement. St. v. Owens, 254 M 224, 836 P2d 595, 49 St. Rep. 744 (1992). See also Santobello v. New York, 404 US 257, 30 L Ed 2d 427, 92 S Ct 495 (1971), and Correale v. U.S., 479 F2d 944 (1st Cir. 1973).

Court Not Bound by Plea Agreement: The express purpose of the 1985 amendment to this section was to overturn St. v. Cavanaugh, 207 M 237, 673 P2d 482 (1983), and to make it clear that a plea bargain is an agreement between the prosecutor and the accused only. The District Court is not bound by the agreement. If the court chooses not to follow the prosecutor's recommendation pursuant to the plea bargain, it is not required to allow the defendant to withdraw his plea of guilty. St. v. Buckman, 236 M 37, 768 P2d 1361, 46 St. Rep. 163 (1989), followed in St. v. Jacobson, 252 M 94, 826 P2d 555, 49 St. Rep. 178 (1992).

Rejection of Part of Bargain — Right to Withdraw Plea and Plead Not Guilty: Petitioner for postconviction relief had engaged in plea bargaining and pled guilty to aggravated kidnapping and aggravated assault. No one told him that the judge might impose a restriction that petitioner be ineligible for parole or the supervised release program, which the judge did on sentencing. The petitioner was not fully informed of the consequences of his plea, and he should have been permitted to withdraw it upon petitioning for postconviction relief. A judge accepting a plea and rejecting any other part of a plea bargain must afford defendant the opportunity to withdraw his plea and plead not guilty. In this case, the decision was applied prospectively only, beginning with petitioner. Since more than 6 years had elapsed since sentencing and crucial witnesses might not be available, the State would be allowed on remand to elect either to have petitioner withdraw his plea with the State having the right to revive its dismissed charges or to have petitioner sentenced in accordance with the plea bargain. (See 1985 amendment note.) St. v. Cavanaugh, 207 M 237, 673 P2d 482, 40 St. Rep. 2007 (1983), followed in St. v. Hendricks, 213 M 507, 691 P2d 1333, 41 St. Rep. 315 (1984), and impliedly overruled in St. v. Buckman, 236 M 37, 768 P2d 1361, 46 St. Rep. 163 (1989).

Plea Agreement — Not Recorded in Conformance With Court Rules — Defendant to Replead: Defendant pleaded guilty on the assumption that an agreement had been reached that in return for the guilty plea the prosecution would make no recommendation to the court on sentencing. On the plea of guilty, the prosecutor recommended 10 years and the defendant was so sentenced. On the motion to withdraw the guilty plea, it was error for the judge to determine that there was no agreement solely because court rules require that such an agreement must be made on the record by a court reporter and in this case no such record was made. St. v. Dinndorf, 202 M 308, 658 P2d 372, 40 St. Rep. 106 (1983).

Plea Bargain Refused by Judge — Sentence Imposed Larger Than Plea Bargain: A judge participated in a plea bargain involving a proposed agreement for a 5-year sentence but ultimately refused to accept the proposal. After the trial the judge sentenced the defendant to 13 years. When a plea bargain is not completed, the participating judge must state for the record the reasons supporting a sentence greater than that offered by the defendant prior to trial. (See 1985 amendment note.) St. v. Welling, 199 M 135, 647 P2d 852, 39 St. Rep. 1215 (1982).

Plea Bargain Agreement Asserted After Sentence Imposed: A criminal defendant was sentenced to 20 years in prison. Two months later, his defense counsel alleged a plea bargain agreement in which the County Attorney promised to recommend a suspended sentence. The purported agreement was contained in a letter from defense counsel to the County Attorney. The case was appealed and remanded for an evidentiary hearing on the terms of the plea bargaining agreement and to determine whether the prosecutor violated the agreement in St. v. Allen, 197 M 64, 645 P2d 380, 38 St. Rep. 2192 (1981). Because the defendant failed to assert the plea bargain agreement until 2 months after sentencing and because there was evidence of plea bargain negotiations subsequent to the letter, the original sentence was upheld. A plea bargain will be enforced only if it is based upon expectations reasonably formed in reliance upon a promise of the County Attorney. (See 1985 amendment note.) St. v. Allen, 685 P2d 333, 39 St. Rep. 899 (1982) (first decision erroneously reproduced at 199 M 204 (1982)).

Fundamental Fairness and Safeguards Necessary: The plea bargaining process and the adjudicative element inherent in accepting a plea of guilty must be attended by fundamental fairness and safeguards insuring defendant what is reasonably due him under the circumstances, which may vary. However, a constant factor is that when a bargained plea rests to any significant degree on a promise or agreement of the prosecutor which can be said to be part of the inducement or consideration, the promise or agreement must be fulfilled. (See 1985 amendment note.) St. v. Allen, 197 M 64, 645 P2d 380, 38 St. Rep. 2192 (1981), followed in St. v. Lamere, 272 M 355, 900 P2d 926, 52 St. Rep. 828 (1995), and St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015, 56 St. Rep. 551 (1999).

Prosecutor to Fulfill Promises: Prosecutors engaging in plea bargaining must meet strict and meticulous standards of promise and performance, as a plea of guilty resting to any significant degree on an unfulfilled plea bargain is involuntary and subject to vacation, and a prosecutor's violation of a promise, even if inadvertent or in good faith to obtain a just and mutually desired end, is unacceptable. (See 1985 amendment note.) St. v. Allen, 197 M 64, 645 P2d 380, 38 St. Rep. 2192 (1981), followed in St. v. Lamere, 272 M 355, 900 P2d 926, 52 St. Rep. 828 (1995), and St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015, 56 St. Rep. 551 (1999).

Remand for Resolution of Facts Based on Intent: On appeal from denial of motion to set aside sentence or allow withdrawal of plea for prosecutor's alleged violation of plea bargain, where prosecution and defense agreed that a plea bargain existed but there was an unresolved factual dispute concerning the terms of the bargain and whether prosecutor violated the bargain and the unresolved factual issues rested upon the intent of the parties, the Supreme Court remanded for resolution of the issues in an evidentiary hearing with directions to enter findings, conclusions, and an order and certify them to Supreme Court for review. (See 1985 amendment note.) St. v. Allen, 197 M 64, 645 P2d 380, 38 St. Rep. 2192 (1981).

Existence of a Plea Bargain — Statements Made in Anticipation of Bargain: When the existence of a plea bargain was disputed and there was substantial evidence that none was made, there was nothing to enforce. The trial court's denial of a motion to withdraw the defendant's plea or to enforce an alleged plea bargain under these circumstances was upheld. With no contention or proof of bad faith by the State in its discussions with defense counsel about a plea bargain or in its efforts to secure the approval of the Sheriff or the victim's parents, any statements made in anticipation of a plea bargain by defense counsel concerning weaknesses in the State's case or defense positions in connection therewith were gratuitous and premature. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980).

Immunity Agreement Versus Plea Bargain: The Supreme Court held that there was sufficient evidence of record to support the finding of the District Court that there existed no oral immunity agreement between the appellant and the State and that the agreement made was actually a plea bargain, which was fully honored. St. v. Evans, 178 M 96, 582 P2d 1211 (1978).

Misuse of Plea Bargaining Process and Habitual Criminal Statute: Without declaring the plea bargaining process constitutionally infirm or the habitual criminal statute unconstitutional on its face, the Supreme Court held that the defendant was denied due process under federal and state provisions when he realistically was sentenced to 10 years for attempted burglary and 40 years for refusing to plead guilty and insisting upon a jury trial. St. v. Sather, 172 M 428, 564 P2d 1306 (1977).

Enforceability of Plea Bargaining Agreement: A plea bargain was held to be unenforceable under the particular fact situation. (See 1985 amendment note.) St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

Guilty Plea Under Agreement With Prosecutor: While the Supreme Court will not encourage the making of bargains with persons charged with crime, when a defendant has changed his plea of not guilty to a plea of guilty on an agreement with the prosecuting attorney as to the recommendation for sentences, which was carried out, the Supreme Court will not, after the defendant obtained the benefits of the agreement, aid him in escaping its obligations by ordering a withdrawal of the guilty plea. St. v. Nance, 120 M 152, 184 P2d 554 (1947), distinguished in St. v. Holt, 121 M 459, 194 P2d 651 (1948), and followed in St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812, 56 St. Rep. 44 (1999).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is essentially a restatement of Rule 11(c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. When appropriate, some changes have been made to accommodate Montana statutory and case law decisions. The statute presents a more concise and coherent approach to the plea colloquy.

2005 Amendment: (Version effective July 1, 2006) Chapter 449 in (1)(b) after "will be" deleted "appointed" and inserted reference to attorney assigned pursuant to Montana Public Defender Act; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2006.

Saving Clause: Section 78, Ch. 449, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 395 in (1) near beginning inserted "or nolo contendere"; in (1)(d) inserted "or nolo contendere"; in (1)(e) in two places inserted "or nolo contendere"; and in (1)(f) inserted "or nolo contendere". Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 inserted (2) allowing accomplishment of notice requirements by defendant's filing of written acknowledgment; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendments: Chapter 73 inserted (6) requiring that an alien defendant be advised that a guilty plea might result in deportation from or exclusion from admission to the United States or denial of naturalization under federal law; and made minor change in style.

Chapter 800 substituted present language concerning issues court is required to determine that defendant understands for former text that read: "(1) The defendant shall be advised by the court as follows:

(a) of the nature of the crime charged against him;

(b) of the punishment as set forth by statute for the crime charged;

(c) if the defendant intends to enter into a plea bargain agreement:

(i) that under 46-12-204, the court is not bound by such agreements;

(ii) that under 46-12-204, if the court does not impose the sentence recommended by the prosecution pursuant to a plea agreement, the court is not required to allow the defendant to withdraw a plea of guilty;

(iii) that criminal sentencing is governed by Title 46, chapter 18; and

(iv) that the defendant and his counsel should carefully review Title 46, chapter 18, and consider the most severe sentence that can be imposed for a particular crime;

(d) if the defendant appears for arraignment without counsel, of his right to counsel and of his right to assigned counsel if he is unable to employ counsel. If counsel is or has been waived by the defendant, the court shall ascertain if the waiver is or was voluntary before proceeding.

(e) of the time prescribed by statute to enter a plea;

(f) of his right to secure bail to release him from custody.

(2) The court, or the clerk or county attorney under its direction, must:

(a) deliver to the defendant a true copy of the indictment, information, or complaint, including the endorsements thereon and the list of witnesses when required;

(b) read the indictment, information, or complaint to the defendant unless the defendant or his counsel waives such reading; and

(c) ask him whether he pleads guilty or not guilty to the indictment, information, or complaint".

1985 Amendment: Inserted (1)(c) reading: "If the defendant intends to enter into a plea bargain agreement".

Case Notes

Voluntary Guilty Plea — Withdrawal of Plea Properly Denied: Usrey pleaded guilty through a plea agreement to sexual intercourse without consent with a 6-year-old girl but later sought to withdraw the plea on grounds that it was involuntary because Usrey did not understand the plea agreement and because the District Court did not explain the rights Usrey was waiving. The Supreme Court examined the plea bargain language and affirmed. Although the written plea agreement did not state the specific maximum penalty upon conviction of sexual intercourse without consent and the District Court did not state the penalty when Usrey pleaded guilty, the court did ask Usrey if he was mindful of the maximum penalty, which was clearly stated in the information, and Usrey replied affirmatively. Also, the plea bargain called for a sentence far less than the maximum penalty, and the sentence that Usrey bargained for and that was imposed was far less than the maximum. Additionally, Usrey was not misled to his detriment simply because the District Court did not use the exact words of 46-12-210(1)(d) in telling Usrey that he might not be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea if the plea bargain was rejected. The record contained substantial evidence supporting the District Court's conclusions that Usrey understood the proceedings and was mentally competent to enter a voluntary guilty plea, and the District Court did not err in denying the motion to withdraw the plea on grounds of involuntariness. St. v. Usrey, 2009 MT 227, 351 M 341, 212 P3d 279 (2009).

Acknowledgment and Waiver of Right to Stand on Nolo Contendere Plea Required: Under 46-12-211, the state can agree in a plea agreement to: (1) move for dismissal of other charges; (2) agree that a specific sentence is the appropriate disposition of the case; or (3) recommend or agree to not oppose a defendant's request for a particular sentence. The court may reject any of the three types of plea agreement. If the court rejects a plea agreement, the provisions of the agreement determine whether a defendant can withdraw a plea of guilty or nolo contendere. If the plea contains provisions wherein the state recommends or agrees to not oppose a defendant's request for a particular sentence, a defendant is not entitled to withdraw a guilty plea if the agreement is rejected. However, if the state agrees to dismissal of other charges or agrees that a specific sentence is appropriate, a defendant may elect to stand on the previously entered plea or to withdraw it, and the court must be satisfied that the defendant understands the statutory right to stand on the guilty plea as well as the possible consequences of waiving that right. In the present case, the plea agreement contained both a dismissal of other charges and a recommendation for a specific sentence, so when the agreement was rejected, the court was required to afford Bullplume an opportunity to withdraw the plea. Bullplume chose to withdraw a nolo contendere plea, but the court erred in not obtaining an acknowledgment that Bullplume understood his rights and was making an intentional and voluntary waiver of the right to stand on the nolo contendere plea to the charge of mitigated deliberate homicide. The proper remedy for failing to allow Bullplume to effectively withdraw the nolo contendere plea was to remand for sentencing on the mitigated deliberate homicide charge, with the sentencing court not being bound by the rejected plea agreement. St. v. Bullplume, 2009 MT 145, 350 M 350, 208 P3d 378 (2009).

Statutory Right to Plead Guilty to DUI and Related Misdemeanor Citations Not Violated by City Court's Refusal to Accept Pleas: There was no prejudice and any error was harmless when the state dismissed DUI charges prior to the District Court trial on one felony count and two misdemeanor charges of negligent vehicular assault. St. v. Milligan, 2008 MT 375, 346 M 491, 197 P3d 956 (2008).

Voluntariness of Plea — Defendant's Subjective Perceptions of Possible Sentence to Be Supported in Record: Humphrey claimed that the sentencing court conveyed the impression that it had agreed to be bound by the terms of a plea agreement, and that only because Humphrey's subjective perception was incorrect did he plead guilty; therefore, the guilty plea was involuntary. The Supreme Court agreed that a defendant's subjective perceptions shed light on the defendant's state of mind, which in turn bears on the voluntariness of the plea, but allegations of having had certain mental impressions at the time of the plea must be supported by objective proof in the record, and the mental impressions must be reasonably justified under the circumstances. In this case, Humphrey was being sentenced for numerous felonies and misdemeanors associated with four separate cases, and Humphrey's mistaken impression arose when the court corrected an error in the plea agreement concerning only one of the cases, but nothing in the record objectively proved that Humphrey was being assured of a particular sentence or that the court led Humphrey to believe that it would follow the plea agreement. Under the circumstances, Humphrey failed to establish that his pleas were involuntary and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Humphrey, 2008 MT 328, 346 M 150, 194 P3d 643 (2008).

Defendant's Right to Counsel and Right to Trial Not Violated During Four Prior DUI Prosecutions — Enhancement of New DUI Charge to Felony Proper: Walker's 2005 DUI arrest was enhanced to a felony charge when driving records indicated that Walker had six prior DUI convictions. Walker alleged that four of the prior convictions were constitutionally infirm because Walker had not been advised of the right to counsel, the right to compel attendance of witnesses, the right to a trial by a jury, and penalty enhancement provisions. The District Court concluded that the four convictions did not violate Walker's constitutional rights and held that the prior convictions could be used to enhance the 2005 DUI to a felony. Walker appealed, and the Supreme Court considered each assertion in turn to determine whether Walker's waiver of the right to counsel and right to trial during the prior prosecutions was made knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily. The initial appearance/arraignment documents that Walker signed after being charged with the prior DUI offenses adequately informed Walker of the right to counsel, and Walker indicated an understanding of that right and that an attorney was not desired. A waiver of rights form and a waiver of counsel form that Walker signed evidenced that understanding. It was also sufficient that Walker was informed of the right to call witnesses to attend the proceedings, even though the constitution does not confer a right to compel witnesses to testify. Walker was also adequately informed of the right to a trial by jury and to a unanimous verdict, but it was unnecessary for the District Court to explain all the nuances or effects of waiving the right to a trial by jury. Lastly, the documents informed Walker that there might be indirect consequences of a guilty plea, including the possible loss of driving privileges and the use of the conviction in the event Walker was convicted of a crime in the future, but the District Court was not required to specifically inform Walker of the indirect consequence that a fourth or subsequent DUI might result in a felony charge, because whether Walker committed a fourth or subsequent DUI was clearly within Walker's sole control and was an indirect consequence of guilty pleas to the prior DUI offenses. Thus, Walker's prior guilty pleas were entered knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily, and the District Court did not err in allowing the use of the prior convictions to elevate Walker's 2005 DUI to a felony. St. v. Walker, 2008 MT 244, 344 M 477, 188 P3d 1069 (2008).

Court's Sua Sponte Withdrawal of Defendant's Guilty Plea Following Judgment Considered Mistake of Law: Friedt pleaded guilty to a stop sign violation and to a charge of failing to carry proof of insurance in the vehicle and was sentenced in Municipal Court. During sentencing, the County Attorney failed to raise any issues of restitution. After judgment was entered, the court was advised by a victim of a claim of damages associated with Friedt's offenses. The court, sua sponte, withdrew Friedt's guilty pleas, appointed counsel, and set an omnibus hearing. Friedt then petitioned the Supreme Court for supervisory control, asserting that the Municipal Court lacked jurisdiction to vacate or modify the sentence once a valid sentence was pronounced and thus proceeded under a mistake of law in withdrawing the guilty pleas, which would result in a gross injustice and unnecessary expense if Friedt was required to stand trial on charges to which she knowingly and voluntarily pleaded guilty and on which she had been sentenced. The County Attorney argued that the Municipal Court retained jurisdiction under 46-16-702 and that the interests of justice to the victim and the mandatory restitution provision in 46-18-201 required the Municipal Court to remedy the situation sua sponte. The Supreme Court noted that 46-16-702 allows a new trial, following judgment, for a defendant in the interests of justice, but that the statute does not authorize a new proceeding to benefit a victim or a prosecutor who fails to timely raise a sentencing matter. Further, although 46-16-105 allows a court for good cause to allow withdrawal of a guilty plea within 1 year after judgment if evidence supports a fundamental miscarriage of justice, nothing in the statute allows a court to forcibly withdraw a defendant's guilty plea sua sponte under any circumstances. Therefore, the Supreme Court agreed that the Municipal Court's action constituted a mistake of law. Friedt's petition for supervisory control was granted, and the Municipal Court was instructed to vacate the order withdrawing Friedt's guilty pleas. Friedt v. Billings Municipal Court, 2008 MT 174, 343 M 386, 184 P3d 1032 (2008).

Misinformation in Plea Agreement and Incomplete Information Provided by District Court Raising Doubt as to Intelligent Guilty Plea — Denial of Withdrawal of Plea Reversed: Rave was charged with sexual assault with bodily injury. Following advice of counsel, Rave accepted a plea agreement and pleaded guilty. Prior to sentencing, Rave moved to withdraw the guilty plea, but the motion was denied, and Rave was sentenced pursuant to the plea agreement. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the plea agreement erroneously advised Rave that sexual assault may be a lesser included felony offense and that the penalty was the same as for sexual assault with bodily injury when, in fact, the lesser included offense was a misdemeanor. In addition, the District Court did not correct the misinformation in the plea agreement when accepting the guilty plea, so Rave could not have made a knowing, intelligent, and voluntary plea. Thus, the Supreme Court reversed the denial of Rave's motion to withdraw the guilty plea and remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Rave, 2005 MT 78, 326 M 398, 109 P3d 753 (2005).

No Error in Denial of Motion to Withdraw Nolo Contendere Pleas Made Knowingly: White asserted that the District Court erred in denying a motion to withdraw nolo contendere pleas, arguing that he could not have made a knowing waiver of his rights because he was not in possession of all evidence that might have influenced his decision, including inconsistent statements by a witness. The Supreme Court held that even if White did not know of the statement, the lack of knowledge was irrelevant to the criteria in this section regarding whether the pleas were made knowingly. White was clearly informed of the nature of the charges, the mandatory minimum penalty, the maximum penalty, and the possibility of the imposition of restitution. Under the good cause factors in St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812 (1999), White's nolo contendere pleas were made knowingly, and the District Court did not err in disallowing withdrawal of the pleas. St. v. White, 2004 MT 103, 321 M 45, 88 P3d 1258 (2004). See also St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997).

Question of Adequacy of Advisement Regarding Waiver of Appeal Rights Resolved in Favor of Defendant: The first factor in determining whether good cause existed in allowing the withdrawal of a guilty plea and whether a court abused its discretion in denying a motion to withdraw the guilty plea, as set out in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), is the adequacy of the court's interrogation at the time that the plea was entered regarding the defendant's understanding of the consequences of the plea. The plea must be a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent choice among the alternative courses of action open to the defendant. In the present case, Boucher was charged with DUI, and at his initial appearance, the Justice's Court had Boucher acknowledge in writing that he understood the waivers that he would make if he pleaded guilty. Boucher pleaded not guilty and waived no rights. Five months later, the state amended the complaint, and Boucher changed his plea to guilty, but at the time that the plea was entered, the Justice's Court did not reiterate the information provided at the initial appearance and failed to question Boucher regarding his understanding of the waiver of his constitutional rights. The Supreme Court concluded that the court's colloquy was inadequate and that good cause existed to permit Boucher to withdraw his guilty plea. Any doubt about the voluntariness of Boucher's plea was resolved in his favor, and the Supreme Court remanded to Justice's Court for further proceedings. St. v. Boucher, 2002 MT 114, 309 M 514, 48 P3d 21 (2002).

No Requirement That Defendant Be Informed of Federal Firearms Prohibitions Resulting From State Conviction of Partner Assault — Direct Versus Collateral Consequences of Plea — Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea Affirmed: Liefert pleaded guilty in Justice's Court to charges of partner assault and was subsequently charged under federal law 18 U.S.C. 922 with unlawfully possessing a firearm, following a hunting investigation. After federal charges were filed, Liefert moved to withdraw the guilty plea, contending that good cause existed because the Justice's Court did not inform him of the federal prohibition on possessing a firearm as a result of the plea under Montana law. The motion was denied in Justice's Court and in District Court, which cited St. v. Reynolds, 253 M 386, 833 P2d 153 (1992), and held that Liefert did not need to be informed of the federal prohibition because it was a collateral consequence of Liefert's sentence. Liefert appealed to the Supreme Court, which affirmed. Although the Supreme Court has previously held that there is no appeal to District Court from the denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea in Justice's Court, in this case, Liefert's appeal was treated as a motion for postconviction relief, and the Supreme Court proceeded to determine whether Liefert had good cause to withdraw the plea. The court determined whether the District Court erred in disallowing withdrawal of the plea by applying the factors in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997). The only applicable Bowley factor was the adequacy of the plea colloquy. Liefert did not assert that a judge must inform every defendant of the effect of a guilty plea on gun possession, but presented only the issue of whether a defendant must be informed when charged with partner assault and contended that state sentencing statutes require a judge to inform a defendant of the punishment that can result from a violation. Although never explicitly adopted, the Supreme Court has previously applied the prevailing rule in Torrey v. Estelle, 842 F2d 234 (9th Cir. 1988), that because it is impossible for a judge to inform a defendant of every possible consequence of a guilty plea, judges are required to inform defendants of direct consequences, but are not required to inform of collateral consequences. A consequence is considered direct if it has a definite, immediate, and largely automatic effect and is considered collateral if a defendant has control over whether or not the consequence occurs, if it is not under the control of the sentencing judge, or if it is a procedure under the control of a different sovereign or agency. Notwithstanding Liefert's due process, federal preemption, and negative implication arguments, Liefert had discretionary control over whether he would be in violation of federal law upon entry of a guilty plea for partner assault, and the consequence in this case was under the control of the federal government and thus collateral. Further, the guilty plea was not involuntary simply because it may have been entered to avoid the possibility of a greater punishment at trial or because Liefert may have viewed punishment under the guilty plea as lesser than his immediate personal consequences. Therefore, the District Court did not err in denying Liefert's motion to withdraw the plea. St. v. Liefert, 2002 MT 48, 309 M 19, 43 P3d 329 (2002), followed in Duffy v. St., 2005 MT 228, 328 M 369, 120 P3d 398 (2005).

Extraordinary Circumstances Constituting Good Cause to Permit Withdrawal of Guilty Pleas: In 1982, Mallak entered the United States from Iraq as a refugee. In 1989, Mallak entered guilty pleas to two felony counts of sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs); however, the record of the proceedings was destroyed. Mallak served a 5-year suspended sentence, and 5 years later applied for U.S. citizenship. When federal immigration officials discovered the drug conviction, deportation proceedings were instituted against Mallak, who resisted deportation by filing for asylum and by filing a petition for postconviction relief requesting that he be allowed to withdraw his guilty pleas. Without a hearing, the District Court denied Mallak's petition on grounds that it was time-barred, and Mallak appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. There is no bright-line rule on the timeliness of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea, and each case must be considered in light of its unique record. Rather, under 46-16-105, a guilty plea may be withdrawn at any time for good cause. In St. v. Koepplin, 213 M 55, 689 P2d 921 (1984), the Supreme Court set out the factors to be considered when determining whether good cause exists to withdraw a guilty plea: (1) the adequacy of the District Court's interrogation as to the defendant's understanding of the plea; (2) the promptness of the motion to withdraw the prior plea; and (3) whether the defendant's plea was apparently the result of a plea bargain in which the guilty plea was given in exchange for dismissal of another charge. The circumstances in Mallak's case were extraordinary, including his documented mental incapacity, his unfamiliarity with the English language at the time of the change of plea, and the absence of a record of the plea proceedings, all of which raised serious doubts about the voluntariness of Mallak's guilty pleas. Further, it was not until 1991 that the Legislature passed this section requiring that foreign defendants be told during plea proceedings that a guilty plea could result in deportation. Given the unique combination of factors, the Supreme Court concluded that the District Court abused its discretion in denying Mallak's petition for leave to withdraw his guilty pleas, so the case was remanded to allow Mallak to withdraw his prior pleas. Mallak v. St., 2002 MT 35, 308 M 314, 42 P3d 794 (2002).

Right of Defendant to Plead Guilty Over State's Objection — Erroneous Refusal to Accept Guilty Plea: Peplow was charged with and convicted of DUI, driving with a suspended or revoked license, driving without insurance, failing to report an accident, and tampering with evidence. Prior to trial, Peplow tried to enter guilty pleas to the driving with a suspended or revoked license and driving without insurance counts, but the trial court ruled that it was not required to accept the pleas because Peplow's actions giving rise to the counts were part of the res gestae and probative of the issue of impairment; the trial court proceeded to trial on all counts. Peplow appealed on grounds that the trial court erred in refusing the guilty pleas. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court considered a defendant's right to plead guilty over the state's objection. The court noted the numerous statutory procedural safeguards in place to ensure that: (1) a guilty plea is made knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently; (2) there is a factual basis for the plea; (3) the court is not bound by any plea agreements; and (4) a defendant may not withdraw a guilty plea if the plea agreement is not accepted. The Supreme Court cited Lamb v. Missoula Imports, 230 M 183, 748 P2d 965 (1988), for the proposition that when the word "may" is used to confer power upon an officer, court, or tribunal and the public or a third person has an interest in the exercise of power, then the exercise of power becomes imperative. Under 46-16-105, a plea of guilty "may" be accepted before or during trial. The Supreme Court construed this language to mandate the acceptance of a guilty plea as long as the statutory requirements are met. Further, under 46-12-204, a defendant may plead guilty or not guilty without limitation on the right to plead. St. v. Peplow, 2001 MT 253, 307 M 172, 36 P3d 922 (2001).

No Error in Refusal to Allow Withdrawal of Guilty Plea — Parents of Sexual Assault Victim Not Parties to Plea Agreement: Following a guilty plea and conviction of sexual assault, Knox moved to withdraw the guilty plea, arguing that the County Attorney violated the terms of a plea agreement, which had recommended a 30-year suspended sentence and dropping a second sexual assault charge in exchange for the guilty plea, and indicated that the parents of the 5-year-old victim would not recommend incarceration in the victim impact statement of the presentence investigation. During the colloquy required by this section, the District Court informed Knox that, like the court itself, the parents were not bound by the plea agreement and could change their minds at any time as far as recommending future imprisonment, adding that if the parents did change their minds, that fact would not suffice as grounds for withdrawal of a guilty plea. Nevertheless, Knox voluntarily accepted the possible consequences of the plea and pleaded guilty. The parents then recommended imprisonment, and Knox was sentenced to 40 years with 18 suspended. A District Court may permit the withdrawal of a guilty plea upon a showing of good cause, but the determination of good cause is discretionary, and each case is considered on its merits. Here, the District Court subsequently denied the withdrawal motion pursuant to the colloquy, and Knox appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. After applying the factors in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), the Supreme Court found that there was no abuse of discretion in the denial of the motion to withdraw and that Knox's guilty plea thus met the constitutional standard of a voluntary, intelligent, and knowing choice among options. The District Court acted according to statutory requirements when it made clear that the parents could make known their opinion and change their minds regarding Knox's incarceration because they were not parties to the plea agreement, pursuant to the court's duties in 46-18-115. Further, other evidence in a psychological evaluation indicated that Knox had violent tendencies that presented complications to successful treatment, had high-risk factors for violent recidivism, and had resisted treatment for chemical dependency in the past, so the parents' incarceration request was not a determinative basis for the sentence. St. v. Knox, 2001 MT 232, 307 M 1, 36 P3d 383 (2001).

Failure to Adequately Inform Defendant of Maximum Possible Penalty — Reversible Error in Failing to Allow Withdrawal of Guilty Plea: After offering an Alford plea but prior to a change of plea hearing, Melone signed an acknowledgment of waiver of rights, stating that he understood the maximum possible penalty for felony assault and that his sentence could be enhanced for using a deadly weapon and because of his prior criminal record. At the change of plea hearing, the court informed Melone that the weapon enhancement penalty would not apply and that the maximum penalty for felony assault was "ten years in the Montana State Prison or a $50,000 fine". The court then allowed Melone to withdraw his guilty plea and enter the Alford plea. The court later sentenced Melone to 10 years in prison, plus 10 years to be served consecutively as a persistent offender. Melone moved for a hearing on the persistent offender enhancement and requested that he be allowed to withdraw his plea. The court rejected the motion to withdraw the plea, but vacated the sentence and granted a new sentencing hearing to allow Melone to present evidence regarding applicability of the persistent offender enhancement. Following the hearing, the court affirmed its original sentence. Melone appealed, contending that he was never informed that he could receive up to 100 years because of his potential status as a persistent offender and that, as a consequence, his plea was not knowing and voluntary. The Supreme Court agreed. Under 46-16-105 and this section, a defendant must be informed of the maximum penalty, including the effect of any penalty enhancement provision. The fact that the prosecutor informed Melone of a possible persistent offender penalty immediately prior to questioning did not satisfy the statutory requirement that the court inform the defendant of the maximum penalty. Melone's statements in the written acknowledgment were insufficient to satisfy the doubts of the Supreme Court that Melone was aware that his sentence could be enhanced by up to 100 years as a result of his plea. Rather, it appeared that Melone was under the mistaken belief that he risked sentence enhancement only if he proceeded to trial. Resolving their doubt that the plea was voluntary in favor of Melone, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case to District Court to allow Melone to withdraw the plea. St. v. Melone, 2000 MT 118, 299 M 442, 2 P3d 233, 57 St. Rep. 493 (2000).

Guilty Plea Constituting Waiver of Nonjurisdictional Defects and Defenses: Gordon was charged in Montana with the murder, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery of an Idaho man. Gordon sought a ruling on a motion to require enforcement of the second of two plea agreements entered into with Idaho authorities regarding a sentence that might be imposed if Gordon's implicity was proved in the homicide or if he was not truthful in the ongoing investigation. The state argued that Idaho could not bind Montana to a pretrial agreement in which Montana had not participated and contended that Idaho had previously voided the second plea agreement because of Gordon's untruthfulness. The District Court denied the motion. Gordon subsequently entered a plea agreement with Montana. The court obtained Gordon's understanding of the rights that he would give up by pleading guilty, including the right to an appeal. The court accepted Gordon's guilty plea to aggravated kidnapping and dismissed the other charges, ultimately imposing an 80-year sentence as recommended in the state plea agreement. On appeal, Gordon asserted that his constitutional rights were violated when the District Court did not sentence him pursuant to the second Idaho plea agreement. Citing St. v. Wheeler, 285 M 400, 948 P2d 698, 54 St. Rep. 1213 (1997), the Supreme Court held that after a criminal defendant pleads guilty of the offense charged, only the voluntary and intelligent character of the guilty plea may be attacked and that independent claims relating to prior deprivations of constitutional rights may not be raised. A voluntary and intelligent guilty plea constitutes a waiver of nonjurisdictional defects and defenses. St. v. Gordon, 1999 MT 169, 295 M 183, 983 P2d 377, 56 St. Rep. 654 (1999).

Court Misstatement of Maximum Possible Penalty at Change of Plea Hearing — Error in Refusal to Allow Withdrawal of Noncompliant Plea: Roach requested a hearing to change his plea to guilty on burglary and theft charges. Roach was questioned regarding his understanding of his constitutional rights, and a discussion was held concerning possible penalties. The District Court Judge erroneously informed Roach that the maximum penalty for both crimes was 10 years and $50,000. Neither Roach's counsel nor the County Attorney, who were both present, responded or objected in any way to the court's misstatement of the maximum possible penalty. Roach was sentenced 2 months later to consecutive sentences of 20 years suspended for burglary and 10 years with no time suspended for theft, plus restitution. Roach later asserted that he was misled by the District Court, that his change of plea was coerced and based on misinformation, and that he should have been granted postconviction relief allowing him to either withdraw the guilty plea or be sentenced in conformity with the penalty that he was advised of at the change of plea hearing. The Supreme Court agreed. Because Roach was misinformed about the maximum possible sentence, his plea was neither knowing nor in compliance with statutory requirements. The District Court erred in refusing to allow withdrawal of the guilty plea; the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to allow withdrawal. St. v. Roach, 1999 MT 38, 293 M 311, 975 P2d 817, 56 St. Rep. 161 (1999), following St. v. Brown, 262 M 499, 865 P2d 282, 50 St. Rep. 1658 (1993).

Failure to Advise — Discretionary Parole Restrictions Not Specifically Provided for by Statute: The court rejected Thomas's argument that his guilty plea was unknowingly and involuntarily entered because he was not advised of the possibility that the court might impose a discretionary parole restriction making Thomas ineligible for parole for 30 years. This section, requiring that before accepting a guilty plea, the court must determine that the defendant understands, among other things, the effect of any special parole restrictions provided by law, does not refer to discretionary parole restrictions that the court might impose. It is impossible to know what discretionary restrictions the court might impose. Only those restrictions specifically defined by a statute can be known. The statute does not require the defendant to be advised of possible discretionary limitations on parole. St. v. Thomas, 285 M 112, 946 P2d 140, 54 St. Rep. 1068 (1997).

Failure to Adequately Inform Defendant of Rights Prior to Eliciting Factual Basis for Change of Plea and Breach of Plea Agreement by Prosecutor — Reversible Error: The District Court summarily denied Bowley's timely oral motion to withdraw a guilty plea three times. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the trial court erred in failing to inform Bowley of his constitutional rights, in neglecting to inquire as to the competency of counsel, and in not investigating whether Bowley was under the influence of alcohol or drugs before eliciting from Bowley the factual basis of his guilty plea at a change of plea hearing. Further, the record showed that the prosecutor, although following the recommendation of the probation officer, breached the plea agreement by suggesting a sentence different from that contained in the pretrial agreement. The motion to withdraw the guilty plea was timely. Having applied the three factors in St. v. Enoch, 269 M 8, 887 P2d 175 (1994), the Supreme Court found that good cause existed to permit withdrawal of the guilty plea and reversed and remanded with instructions to allow Bowley to withdraw the plea if desired or, alternatively, to sentence Bowley in accordance with the pretrial agreement. St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592, 54 St. Rep. 353 (1997), followed in St. v. Schoonover, 1999 MT 7, 293 M 54, 973 P2d 230, 56 St. Rep. 30 (1999), and St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015, 56 St. Rep. 551 (1999).

Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea — No Abuse of Discretion: After Moddison filed pro se motions with the Supreme Court that amounted to a request to withdraw his guilty plea, the case was remanded to District Court for a hearing on the request. Following the hearing, the request was denied. Moddison appealed, contending that the District Court abused its discretion in denying the motion to withdraw the guilty plea: (1) by conducting an inadequate interrogation of Moddison regarding his understanding of the consequences of pleading guilty; (2) by not dealing promptly with Moddison's efforts to withdraw the plea; (3) because the plea was the result of an Alford plea bargain in which the guilty plea was given in exchange for dismissal of another charge; and (4) because Moddison's guilty plea was based on the mistaken advice of his attorneys. The Supreme Court found that Moddison did not establish good cause for withdrawal of the plea and affirmed, holding that: (1) the fact that Moddison's attorney, rather than the court, conducted the plea interrogation was not reversible error when the interrogation achieved its fundamental purpose and consisted of essentially the same questions that the Supreme Court held to be adequate in St. v. Allen, 265 M 293, 876 P2d 639 (1994); (2) an 8-month delay between entry of the plea and the motion to withdraw was within the allowable timeframe; (3) Moddison's plea was based in large part on the overwhelming evidence against him and was ultimately not part of a "package deal" with the other defendants or conditioned on their pleas; and (4) despite the fact that some advice Moddison received from his attorneys was not accurate and merely explained what they thought potential remedies were for one sentence out of many that Moddison could have received, Moddison nevertheless clearly understood that the sentencing court had unfettered discretion to impose any sentence within the statutory range, could restrict his eligibility for parole, and could order him to undergo sexual offender treatment. St. v. Moddison, 278 M 384, 926 P2d 253, 53 St. Rep. 961 (1996).

Plea to Lesser Included Offense — Introduction at Sentencing of Evidence of Commission of Charged Offense — Language of Plea Agreement: Collier was arrested and charged with solicitation of deliberate homicide, which was reduced to criminal endangerment by a plea bargain. At the District Court level and on appeal, Collier challenged the state's introduction of evidence tending to prove her commission of the originally charged offense. The Supreme Court upheld the introduction of the evidence, noting not only that the rules of evidence do not apply in sentencing, but also that the plea agreement provided that "counsel for the State may make any recommendation and may introduce . . . evidence in support thereof at the time of sentencing". St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376, 53 St. Rep. 534 (1996).

Defendant's Misunderstanding as to Release on Own Recognizance Not Grounds for Setting Aside Guilty Plea — Basis for Withdrawal of Plea to Be Raised at Trial Level: Nelson argued that he should have been allowed to withdraw his guilty plea to assault charges because he believed that part of the plea bargain was release on his own recognizance pending sentencing. He also argued that he had not been adequately advised that he could be designated a dangerous offender, thus restricting his eligibility for parole. The Supreme Court stated that Nelson had not, at the trial level, moved to have his guilty plea set aside on the grounds that he had not been adequately advised that he could be designated a dangerous offender. Therefore, he could not raise the issue for the first time on appeal. The Supreme Court held that Nelson's argument that he believed that his plea agreement included release pending sentencing was not related to the voluntary nature of his guilty plea and therefore was not grounds for withdrawal of the plea. St. v. Nelson, 274 M 11, 906 P2d 663, 52 St. Rep. 1069 (1995).

Adequate Interrogation as to Consequences of Plea — No Mistake or Misunderstanding — Proper Guilty Plea as Waiver of Factual Defenses: Defendant contended that denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea was improper because the court's interrogation at an omnibus hearing was insufficient, because he was induced to enter the guilty plea, and because statements made by the victim after the plea was entered amounted to a recantation that required the court to allow withdrawal of the plea. However, denial of the motion was affirmed on appeal when the Supreme Court's examination of the record showed that: (1) the trial court's interrogation was adequate pursuant to St. v. Mahoney, 264 M 89, 870 P2d 65 (1994), despite the occurrence of some harmless error in the court's failure to inform defendant of the maximum and mandatory sentences for the crime; (2) evidence demonstrated that the guilty plea was timely and voluntary and entered without mistake or misunderstanding; and (3) the victim's statements were not exculpatory as to the crime to which defendant pleaded guilty. The Supreme Court cited St. v. Hilton, 183 M 13, 597 P2d 1171 (1979), in holding that by properly pleading guilty, defendant waived all factual defenses that occurred prior to the plea. St. v. Skroch, 267 M 349, 883 P2d 1256, 51 St. Rep. 1092 (1994), distinguishing State ex rel. Gladue v. District Court, 175 M 509, 575 P2d 65 (1978).

Error by Original Judge on Maximum Sentence — Improper Guilty Plea: Prior to accepting a plea agreement, defendant was incorrectly advised by the original presiding judge that the maximum sentence possible for two counts of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) arising from the same incident was 30 years rather than 40 years. When the original judge recused himself, a second judge sentenced the defendant to 40 years. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the District Court erred in imposing a 40-year sentence and instructed the District Court to modify the sentencing order to provide defendant a sentence no longer than the maximum sentence that had been advised by the original judge. St. v. Brown, 262 M 499, 865 P2d 282, 50 St. Rep. 1658 (1993), followed in St. v. Roach, 1999 MT 38, 293 M 311, 975 P2d 817, 56 St. Rep. 161 (1999), and distinguished in St. v. Wilson, 1999 MT 52, 293 M 429, 976 P2d 962, 56 St. Rep. 220 (1999).

Failure to Arraign on Amended Information — No Error When Amendment Not Affecting Original Charges: Defendant contended the District Court erred when it accepted an information amended to add a reference to the requisite mental states but did not arraign him on the amended information. The amendment was in form only and did not make substantial changes in the charges set out in the original information. Failure to arraign defendant on charges set forth in the amended information did not constitute reversible error. St. v. Cameron, 253 M 95, 830 P2d 1284, 49 St. Rep. 150 (1992).

Defendant Need Not Be Apprised of Parole Eligibility Limits: Section 46-16-105 requires the District Court to advise a defendant of the consequences of a guilty plea and of the maximum sentence that may be imposed, and 46-12-204 and this section outline other specific items of which a defendant must be advised by the court. However, these statutes do not require the court to advise a defendant of any possibility of limitations on his parole eligibility. St. v. Buckman, 236 M 37, 768 P2d 1361, 46 St. Rep. 163 (1989), followed in St. v. Wilson, 1999 MT 52, 293 M 429, 976 P2d 962, 56 St. Rep. 220 (1999).

Arraignment — Waiver by Defending: Appellant, convicted of aggravated assault, contended on appeal that he was improperly arraigned. It appeared that at the time of his arraignment defendant was only informed of a deliberate homicide charge and the possible punishment for it. The court held that the purposes of arraignment, to call the defendant into court to answer the charges against him and to inform him of certain rights, were waived by the defendant when he proceeded to trial and defended against the aggravated assault charge. The court also held that arraignment may be waived without violating due process so long as the accused has sufficient notice of the accusation and an adequate opportunity to defend himself. St. v. Longneck, 201 M 367, 654 P2d 977, 39 St. Rep. 2170 (1982).

Judge Not Required to Advise Defendant of Statutory Defenses: The facts in this case did not make it incumbent upon the trial judge to advise the defendant regarding statutory defenses potentially available to her. The defendant was represented by counsel, and the responsibilities of advising the defendant of potential statutory and constitutional defenses are a defense strategy properly vested in defense counsel, not in the trial judge. St. v. Day, 195 M 151, 635 P2d 568, 38 St. Rep. 1718 (1981).

Sufficient Knowledge to Plead Guilty — Burden on Defendant — Federal Habeas Corpus: Prior to pleading guilty defendant had been advised, as shown by the record, of his privilege against self-incrimination, his right to a jury trial, and his right to confront accusers. He applied for federal postconviction relief based on the grounds that the effect of the words used and events that occurred precluded his informed consent to a guilty plea. After the record discloses that the defendant was accorded his basic constitutional rights, the U.S. District Court will presume that the state court did not commit errors. The burden then is on the defendant to come forward with at least some evidence to disclose he was not informed of some element of the crime that had some relevant relationship to the plea or that he was subjected to some external coercion. When defendant had a state habeas corpus hearing yet produced no evidence on his behalf and cross-examined no state witnesses, the record disclosed no evidence to overcome the presumption in favor of the state court. Brown v. Crist, 492 F. Supp. 965 (D.C. Mont. 1980).

Pro Se Counsel Held to Same Standards: A defendant who elects to represent himself cannot complain on appeal that the quality of his own defense acted to his detriment by not amounting to effective counsel. Here, defendant knowingly and intelligently relinquished his right to counsel and proceeded with his defense in his own behalf. He cannot complain that rules of procedure and laws should be applied less strictly against him. St. v. Poncelet, 187 M 528, 610 P2d 698 (1980).

Standard to Judge Validity of Guilty Plea: The standard by which the validity of a guilty plea is judged is whether the plea represents a voluntary and intelligent choice among the alternative courses of action open to the defendant as affirmatively disclosed by the record. While it is clear that courts are not required to articulate specific rights when accepting a guilty plea (see 1985 amendment note), an in-depth examination by the trial court is desirable and mandatory in cases in which the record requires it. Yother v. St., 182 M 351, 597 P2d 79 (1979).

Mandatory Duties on Arraignment: The provisions of the predecessor section were mandatory, and it was the duty of the District Court to inform the defendant that he had a right to counsel and that, if he was without means to employ counsel, counsel would be provided for him by the State without cost, and to inform him of the extent of the penalty provided by law. The record was required to show that the statutory provisions as to the period of time between plea and sentence were complied with. State ex rel. Biebinger v. Ellsworth, 147 M 512, 415 P2d 728 (1966).

True Copy of Information: When the defendant raised the objection that the copy of the information furnished him was materially different from the information on which he was about to be tried, and the court sustained the objection and required that the defendant be furnished with a true copy, a refusal of the request constituted reversible error. The record showed that no plea was entered at the trial. St. v. De Wolfe, 29 M 415, 74 P 1084 (1904), overruled on other grounds in St. v. Penna, 35 M 535, 90 P 787 (1907).

Duty of Judge to Notify Defendant of Potential Forfeiture of Hunting, Fishing, and Trapping Privileges — Notification of Loss of Privileges Duty of Department: In order to ensure that a knowing plea is entered by a defendant accused of a fish and game violation, a judge must inform the defendant of the potential forfeiture of hunting, fishing, and trapping privileges as a result of a conviction, guilty plea, or forfeiture of bond in the case of offenses for which the loss of privileges is a direct and immediate consequence of the violation. Notification of the loss of hunting, fishing, and trapping privileges is statutorily delegated to the Department of Fish, Wildlife, and Parks. 49 A.G. Op. 20 (2002).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is based on Rule 11(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The 1987 statute governing the plea agreement process was so general that it did not adequately control or explain the process. The reference in 1987 MCA 46-12-204(3)(a) to a plea bargain agreement is inappropriate and redundant. The statute retains prosecutorial discretion in arranging plea agreements but provides a better framework for their development.

Subsection (1) identifies the parties involved in the plea agreement process. The Commission recognized that the 1987 statute precluded judicial participation in the plea negotiations, but the new statute neither prohibits nor authorizes judicial involvement. The Commission believed that circumstances sometimes warrant judicial participation in such discussions.

Subsection (2) specifies the court's responsibilities in considering plea agreements and retains in substance the concept that the defendant has no right to withdraw his plea if the court rejects the sentence recommendation. This is also consistent with Rule 11(e)(2) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

Subsections (3) and (4) are simply restatements of Rules 11(e)(3) and 11(e)(4) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The more specific aspects of these rules are preferred over the 1987 statutory provisions because they allow for a clearer understanding of the process by the parties and the court.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 222 in (5) in first sentence near beginning after "section" deleted "in cases in which the defendant is charged with a misdemeanor offense", near middle after "to be" deleted "observed and", and after "present" inserted "and allowing the party speaking to be seen" and in second sentence at end inserted "and has informed the defendant that the defendant has the right to object to its use"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2005.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 395 in (1) in introductory clause near end inserted "or nolo contendere"; and in (4) near end inserted "or nolo contendere". Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 163 in (2), at beginning, inserted "Subject to the provisions of subsection (5)"; inserted (5) regarding the acceptability of an agreement disclosed through audio-video communications; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 26, 1997.

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 163, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] [46-12-211, 46-16-105, 46-17-203, 46-18-102, and 46-18-115] applies to guilty pleas entered and sentences pronounced after [the effective date of this act]." Effective March 26, 1997.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 near beginning of (4), after "agreement", inserted "of the type specified in subsection (1)(a) or (1)(b)"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Acknowledgment and Waiver of Right to Stand on Nolo Contendere Plea Required: Under 46-12-211, the state can agree in a plea agreement to: (1) move for dismissal of other charges; (2) agree that a specific sentence is the appropriate disposition of the case; or (3) recommend or agree to not oppose a defendant's request for a particular sentence. The court may reject any of the three types of plea agreement. If the court rejects a plea agreement, the provisions of the agreement determine whether a defendant can withdraw a plea of guilty or nolo contendere. If the plea contains provisions wherein the state recommends or agrees to not oppose a defendant's request for a particular sentence, a defendant is not entitled to withdraw a guilty plea if the agreement is rejected. However, if the state agrees to dismissal of other charges or agrees that a specific sentence is appropriate, a defendant may elect to stand on the previously entered plea or to withdraw it, and the court must be satisfied that the defendant understands the statutory right to stand on the guilty plea as well as the possible consequences of waiving that right. In the present case, the plea agreement contained both a dismissal of other charges and a recommendation for a specific sentence, so when the agreement was rejected, the court was required to afford Bullplume an opportunity to withdraw the plea. Bullplume chose to withdraw a nolo contendere plea, but the court erred in not obtaining an acknowledgment that Bullplume understood his rights and was making an intentional and voluntary waiver of the right to stand on the nolo contendere plea to the charge of mitigated deliberate homicide. The proper remedy for failing to allow Bullplume to effectively withdraw the nolo contendere plea was to remand for sentencing on the mitigated deliberate homicide charge, with the sentencing court not being bound by the rejected plea agreement. St. v. Bullplume, 2009 MT 145, 350 M 350, 208 P3d 378 (2009).

Voluntariness of Plea — Defendant's Subjective Perceptions of Possible Sentence to Be Supported in Record: Humphrey claimed that the sentencing court conveyed the impression that it had agreed to be bound by the terms of a plea agreement, and that only because Humphrey's subjective perception was incorrect did he plead guilty; therefore, the guilty plea was involuntary. The Supreme Court agreed that a defendant's subjective perceptions shed light on the defendant's state of mind, which in turn bears on the voluntariness of the plea, but allegations of having had certain mental impressions at the time of the plea must be supported by objective proof in the record, and the mental impressions must be reasonably justified under the circumstances. In this case, Humphrey was being sentenced for numerous felonies and misdemeanors associated with four separate cases, and Humphrey's mistaken impression arose when the court corrected an error in the plea agreement concerning only one of the cases, but nothing in the record objectively proved that Humphrey was being assured of a particular sentence or that the court led Humphrey to believe that it would follow the plea agreement. Under the circumstances, Humphrey failed to establish that his pleas were involuntary and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Humphrey, 2008 MT 328, 346 M 150, 194 P3d 643 (2008).

Existence of Plea Agreement: Following discussions on a possible plea agreement, the day before a scheduled trial on deliberate homicide charges Maldonado filed an acknowledgment of waiver of rights and intent to file an Alford plea. The acknowledgment detailed Maldonado's rights under an Alford plea, the maximum sentence that Maldonado could receive, a statement that Maldonado had discussed the case fully and completely with counsel, the state's recommendations for a sentence, the sentence that Maldonado would ask the court to impose, and a purported agreement by the state not to involve itself in parole matters. Although the state did not actually sign the agreement, the state did subsequently file an offer of proof claiming that the agreement was limited to four main points: (1) the state's recommended sentence for deliberate homicide; (2) the state's recommended sentence for use of a weapon enhancement; (3) that Maldonado would likely recommend a lesser sentence; and (4) that Maldonado could withdraw the guilty plea if the sentence was greater than that recommended by the state. At the change of plea hearing, the court accepted Maldonado's plea and sentenced Maldonado to concurrent sentences despite the state's recommendation that the sentences be consecutive. At Maldonado's parole hearing, the state declined involvement pursuant to the agreement. On a petition for postconviction relief, Maldonado asserted that no plea agreement existed because the agreement between the parties did not contain all the material terms. The Supreme Court disagreed. Based on the language of Maldonado's acknowledgment and the state's conduct at the plea hearing and the parole hearing, the parties did have a plea agreement that was limited to the terms enumerated in the state's offer of proof plus the state's agreement not to involve itself in parole matters, which were the terms that the parties mutually agreed to. Thus, the District Court did not err in denying Maldonado's petition for postconviction relief on grounds that the parties had no plea agreement. Maldonado v. St., 2008 MT 253, 345 M 69, 190 P3d 1043 (2008).

Sentence Based on Recommendation of Sexual Offender Evaluator — State Breach of Plea Agreement by Presenting Conflicting Testimony of Different Evaluator: In a plea agreement, the state agreed to recommend one sentence if Rahn was designated by a sexual offender evaluator as a level 2 or lower offender and a harsher sentence if Rahn was designated as a level 3 offender. An evaluator who personally evaluated Rahn opined that Rahn should be designated as a level 2 offender. At the sentencing hearing, the state presented testimony by a different evaluator, who had not evaluated Rahn, attacking the level 2 designation and arguing that Rahn should be designated as a level 3 offender. Rahn objected on grounds that the state witness's testimony breached the plea agreement, but the sentencing court overruled the objection and subsequently designated Rahn as a level 3 offender and imposed the harsher sentence. Rahn appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Rahn complied with the plea agreement, but the state's conduct in presenting alternate testimony and recommending a level 3 designation was not what was agreed upon in the plea bargain; therefore, the state breached the plea agreement. The state was obligated to make the recommendation as agreed upon in the plea bargain, and the Supreme Court remanded for resentencing with a different judge pursuant to the terms of the plea agreement. St. v. Rahn, 2008 MT 201, 344 M 110, 187 P3d 622 (2008).

Plea Agreement Not Formally Rejected — Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Properly Denied — Illegal Fine or Surcharge Stricken From Sentence: Stephenson plea bargained for suspended sentences in exchange for a guilty plea, but there was no agreement that the court would impose any particular fine. However, Stephenson did agree to undertake certain financial obligations, such as restitution, fines, court costs, and fees. In the presentence investigation (PSI) report, the probation officer recommended that Stephenson pay a fine of $85 to the community service program. At sentencing, the court imposed the agreed suspended sentences, but also followed the PSI and imposed the $85 fine, although characterizing the fine as a surcharge. Stephenson objected to the fine/surcharge and asserted that because the court rejected the plea agreement, he should be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea and proceed to trial. The motion to withdraw the guilty plea was denied, and Stephenson appealed. Shortly after the appeal was filed, the state conceded that the fine was illegal and recommended that the case be remanded for purposes of striking the fine/surcharge from Stephenson's sentence. The Supreme Court found nothing to indicate that the plea agreement was effectively rejected or that the state failed to support the agreement, allowing withdrawal of the guilty plea. The sentencing court did not err in disallowing withdrawal of the plea. Instead, the issue was the legality of the $85 fine/surcharge, which was unlawfully imposed without statutory authority. The case was remanded with instructions to strike the illegal fine/surcharge from the sentence. St. v. Stephenson, 2008 MT 64, 342 M 60, 179 P3d 502 (2008), followed in St. v. VanWinkle, 2008 MT 208, 344 M 175, 186 P3d 1258 (2008).

State Allowed to Present Evidence Regarding Veracity of Information Defendant Raises in Arguing for Sentence Without Breaching Plea Agreement: At a sentencing hearing, Bartosh testified regarding information in the presentence investigation report, asserting that he had complied with his treatment plan and that certain transcripts of telephone conversations attached to the report should be stricken because they undermined the plea agreement. The District Court declined to strike the transcripts and allowed the probation officer who prepared the report to testify in response to Bartosh's testimony. On appeal, Bartosh contended that it was error to allow the probation officer to testify because the testimony undermined the plea agreement. The Supreme Court held that the telephone transcripts were relevant and properly allowed as indicative of Bartosh's acts. The court also affirmed the sentencing court's decision to allow the probation officer's testimony. Once Bartosh testified as to his conduct concerning compliance with the treatment plan, the state was justified in presenting the probation officer who had conflicting information. If a defendant chooses to present information in support of a sentence, the state may counter with testimony to the effect that the information is misleading or untrue without breaching a plea agreement. St. v. Bartosh, 2007 MT 59, 336 M 212, 154 P3d 58 (2007).

Misinformation in Plea Agreement and Incomplete Information Provided by District Court Raising Doubt as to Intelligent Guilty Plea — Denial of Withdrawal of Plea Reversed: Rave was charged with sexual assault with bodily injury. Following advice of counsel, Rave accepted a plea agreement and pleaded guilty. Prior to sentencing, Rave moved to withdraw the guilty plea, but the motion was denied, and Rave was sentenced pursuant to the plea agreement. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the plea agreement erroneously advised Rave that sexual assault may be a lesser included felony offense and that the penalty was the same as for sexual assault with bodily injury when, in fact, the lesser included offense was a misdemeanor. In addition, the District Court did not correct the misinformation in the plea agreement when accepting the guilty plea, so Rave could not have made a knowing, intelligent, and voluntary plea. Thus, the Supreme Court reversed the denial of Rave's motion to withdraw the guilty plea and remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Rave, 2005 MT 78, 326 M 398, 109 P3d 753 (2005).

Sentence Under Plea Bargain Within Statutory Maximum Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment — Cruel and Unusual Punishment Claim Not Raised on Direct Appeal Barred in Postconviction Proceedings: In exchange for dismissal of a charge of assault with a bodily fluid, Basto entered a plea agreement to plead guilty of possession of a deadly weapon by a prisoner. Basto was sentenced to 5 years in prison and subsequently filed a timely petition for postconviction relief on grounds that the sentence was disproportionately severe when compared to the sentences of other defendants in the case, constituting cruel and unusual punishment. The state responded that there is no guarantee of proportionality under the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment and that even if there were, Basto's sentence was still within statutory parameters. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. A sentence that is within maximum statutory guidelines does not violate the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. Basto received the sentence that he bargained for, and there was nothing in the plea agreement that indicated that Basto would receive the same sentence as the other defendants. Further, Basto failed to raise any cruel and unusual punishment argument on direct appeal, so the argument was barred in postconviction proceedings under 46-21-105. Basto v. St., 2004 MT 257, 323 M 80, 97 P3d 1113 (2004). See also St. v. DeSalvo, 273 M 343, 903 P2d 202 (1995), and St. v. Mingus, 2004 MT 24, 319 M 349, 84 P3d 658 (2004).

Improper Prosecutorial Solicitation of Testimony Intended to Undermine Plea Agreement — Choice of Remedies on Remand: The prosecutor in Rardon's sexual assault trial gave lip service to the letter of a plea agreement by recommending the sentence suggested in the presentence investigation, but then went on to solicit inflammatory testimony from the victims that would almost undoubtedly cause the court to question the appropriateness of the recommended sentence, which effectively undercut the plea agreement. Although it is appropriate for a prosecutor to questions victims and solicit their testimony at a sentencing hearing and for victims to express their fears and feelings, it is not acceptable for a prosecutor to aggressively solicit testimony that is clearly intended to undermine a plea agreement and to convince the sentencing court that a bargained sentence agreement should not be accepted. A plea agreement is subject to contract law standards, and prosecutors must meet strict and meticulous standards of both promise and performance. A guilty plea resting on an unfulfilled promise in a plea bargain is involuntary, and prosecutorial violations, even if made inadvertently or in good faith to obtain a just and mutually desired end, are unacceptable. When the prosecution breaches a plea agreement, the sentencing judge may determine the appropriate remedy, which may include withdrawal of the guilty plea or specific performance of the plea agreement in a new sentencing hearing with a different prosecutor and judge. St. v. Rardon, 2002 MT 345, 313 M 321, 61 P3d 132 (2002). On remand, the prosecutor's presentation of the state's case did not undermine the plea bargained sentence recommendation or violate the contract law standards of the plea agreement. The sentencing judge was entitled to consider evidence of Rardon's abusive history and violent tendencies, as well as Rardon's daughter's opinion that Rardon should receive a lengthy sentence. None of the prosecutorial improprieties identified in previous hearings were present in the third sentencing hearing, nor did Rardon demonstrate any other kind of prosecutorial impropriety, so Rardon's third sentence was affirmed. St. v. Rardon, 2005 MT 129, 327 M 228, 115 P3d 182 (2005). The 2005 Rardon decision was followed in St. v. Bartosh, 2007 MT 59, 336 M 212, 154 P3d 58 (2007), and St. v. Rahn, 2008 MT 201, 344 M 110, 187 P3d 622 (2008). See also St. v. Lamere, 272 M 355, 900 P2d 926 (1995), St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), and St. v. Munoz, 2001 MT 85, 305 M 139, 23 P3d 922 (2001).

Additional Sentence Condition Added Following Plea Agreement — Error in Not Allowing Withdrawal of Guilty Plea: Afterbuffalo pleaded guilty to criminal endangerment pursuant to a plea agreement. The sentencing court imposed the recommended 3-year suspended sentence, but also added a requirement that Afterbuffalo be placed in either a prerelease or an intensive supervision program. Afterbuffalo claimed that the sentence was outside the scope of the plea agreement and moved to withdraw the guilty plea because the requirement was not a standard condition of probation. The motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that the additional requirement was outside the scope of the plea agreement. In entering the plea agreement, Afterbuffalo bargained for the benefit of an ordinary suspended sentence, but the additional requirement was not a standard condition of probation and materially changed the impact of the suspended sentence. Addition of the probation requirement constituted a rejection of the agreement by the sentencing court. Thus, pursuant to this section, the sentencing court was required to allow withdrawal of the guilty plea, and abused its discretion in failing to do so. St. v. Afterbuffalo, 2002 MT 14, 308 M 163, 40 P3d 375 (2002).

Breach of Plea Agreement by State — Defendant's Right to Choose Remedy: The state conceded that it breached a plea agreement that had been offered to Munoz, so the order of the District Court denying Munoz's motion to withdraw his guilty plea was erroneous. The question then became whether the sentencing court or Munoz should have the right to choose the remedy. Generally, when the state breaches a plea agreement, one of two equitable remedies is available to safeguard the defendant's due process rights. The notion of an equitable remedy for a breach is guided by the general principles of contract law. The first remedy is specific performance by the government, requiring the state to uphold its end of the bargain and, before a new sentencing judge, comply with the terms of the plea agreement by recommending a specific sentence, moving for dismissal of other charges, or simply not opposing the defendant's requested sentence. When specific performance is imposed, a defendant enjoys no contractual right or entitlement to a specific sentence. The second equitable remedy is rescission, requiring that a defendant be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea and then face trial on the original charge as if the plea agreement had never been entered. In cases of rescission, a defendant's constitutional rights that were waived by the guilty plea are reinstated. However, the seminal federal case that established these remedies, Santobello v. N.Y., 404 US 257 (1971), never reached the question of choice of remedies, leaving to the discretion of the state court the decision as to which remedy would be appropriate under the circumstances. Federal circuit courts and various state courts have also split on the question of choice of remedies. Until now, the Montana Supreme Court has also applied two lines of reasoning—in some cases leaving the choice of remedies to the discretion of the sentencing court and in other cases providing instructions that a defendant be allowed to choose the remedy. In light of the underlying principles of contract law, a nonbreaching defendant must be afforded the initial right to choose from available remedies when the state breaches a plea agreement. As the breaching party, the state bears the substantial burden of demonstrating through clear and convincing evidence that a defendant's choice of remedy would result in a miscarriage of justice, and only upon such a showing may a District Court disallow a defendant's choice. St. v. Munoz, 2001 MT 85, 305 M 139, 23 P3d 922 (2001), following St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), and St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015 (1999), overruling St. v. Persak, 256 M 404, 847 P2d 280 (1993), and St. v. Rardon, 1999 MT 220, 296 M 19, 986 P2d 424 (1999), and followed in St. v. Rardon, 2002 MT 345, 313 M 321, 61 P3d 132 (2002).

Guilty Plea Constituting Waiver of Nonjurisdictional Defects and Defenses: Gordon was charged in Montana with the murder, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery of an Idaho man. Gordon sought a ruling on a motion to require enforcement of the second of two plea agreements entered into with Idaho authorities regarding a sentence that might be imposed if Gordon's implicity was proved in the homicide or if he was not truthful in the ongoing investigation. The state argued that Idaho could not bind Montana to a pretrial agreement in which Montana had not participated and contended that Idaho had previously voided the second plea agreement because of Gordon's untruthfulness. The District Court denied the motion. Gordon subsequently entered a plea agreement with Montana. The court obtained Gordon's understanding of the rights that he would give up by pleading guilty, including the right to an appeal. The court accepted Gordon's guilty plea to aggravated kidnapping and dismissed the other charges, ultimately imposing an 80-year sentence as recommended in the state plea agreement. On appeal, Gordon asserted that his constitutional rights were violated when the District Court did not sentence him pursuant to the second Idaho plea agreement. Citing St. v. Wheeler, 285 M 400, 948 P2d 698, 54 St. Rep. 1213 (1997), the Supreme Court held that after a criminal defendant pleads guilty of the offense charged, only the voluntary and intelligent character of the guilty plea may be attacked and that independent claims relating to prior deprivations of constitutional rights may not be raised. A voluntary and intelligent guilty plea constitutes a waiver of nonjurisdictional defects and defenses. St. v. Gordon, 1999 MT 169, 295 M 183, 983 P2d 377, 56 St. Rep. 654 (1999).

Plea to Lesser Included Offense — Introduction at Sentencing of Evidence of Commission of Charged Offense — Language of Plea Agreement: Collier was arrested and charged with solicitation of deliberate homicide, which was reduced to criminal endangerment by a plea bargain. At the District Court level and on appeal, Collier challenged the state's introduction of evidence tending to prove her commission of the originally charged offense. The Supreme Court upheld the introduction of the evidence, noting not only that the rules of evidence do not apply in sentencing, but also that the plea agreement provided that "counsel for the State may make any recommendation and may introduce . . . evidence in support thereof at the time of sentencing". St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376, 53 St. Rep. 534 (1996).

Applicability of Statutory Scheme for Withdrawal of Guilty Plea: Defendant pleaded guilty to deliberate homicide approximately 3 ½ months before this section, which requires that a court inform the defendant of certain alternatives when contemplating withdrawal of a guilty plea, went into effect. The applicable statute in effect at the time was 46-12-204, which specifically stated that a judge was not required to allow the defendant to withdraw a guilty plea. Defendant's contention that the court was required to apply a statute that was not yet in effect was without merit. The District Court did not err in denying defendant's motion to withdraw the guilty plea. St. v. Strecker, 267 M 311, 883 P2d 841, 51 St. Rep. 1067 (1994).

Imposition of Sentence Different From That Recommended by Plea Bargain Agreement — No Error: Larson argued that the trial court's granting of the state's motion to amend a count from attempted sexual intercourse without consent to sexual assault constituted the court's approval of the charging part of a plea agreement and that the court thus erred in failing to follow the sentencing part of the agreement by imposing a greater sentence than recommended. A plea agreement is between the prosecutor and the defendant. A judge may not participate in and is not bound by the plea agreement. The court's grant of the motion to amend the charge did not signify that the court would or did approve of the agreement, nor is there any case law or statute that requires the court to inform a defendant of the sentence that will be imposed before a guilty plea is withdrawn. St. v. Larson, 266 M 28, 878 P2d 886, 51 St. Rep. 638 (1994).

46-12-212. Determining accuracy of plea.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: Subsection (1) is based on Rule 11(f) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and embodies Montana case law requirements. Subsection (2) was developed to allow formal recognition of what is commonly called the "Alford plea". This procedure, arising from the United States Supreme Court case of N.C. v. Alford, 400 US 25 (1970), allows a defendant to plead guilty without actually admitting to the charge if he has reviewed the evidence against him, if he is capable of making a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent choice, and if the record contains strong evidence of guilt.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 395 in (2) near middle after "guilty" inserted "or may, with the consent of the court and the prosecutor, enter a plea of nolo contendere"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Case Notes

Criminal Mischief Guilty Plea Based on Quality of Construction Work — Lack of Factual Basis for Plea Casting Doubt on Voluntariness — Remand: Wise was charged with elder abuse by exploitation and criminal mischief for allegedly performing shoddy construction work on an elderly woman's property. Wise agreed to plead guilty to criminal mischief in exchange for dismissal of the elder abuse charge. At the change of plea hearing, Wise acknowledged performing shoddy construction work but did not admit guilt sufficient to be convicted of criminal mischief. Nevertheless, the trial court did not allow Wise to withdraw the guilty plea and Wise was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Although a court need not extract an admission from a defendant of every element of a crime in order to establish a factual basis for a guilty plea, the court must ascertain from the defendant's admissions that the defendant's acts generally satisfy the elements of the crime to which the defendant is pleading guilty. In this case, shoddy construction work, without more, did not constitute criminal mischief, and the trial court incorrectly concluded that there was a factual basis for Wise's plea, which cast doubt on the voluntariness of the plea, warranting reversal and remand for further proceedings. St. v. Wise, 2009 MT 32, 349 M 187, 203 P3d 741 (2009), following St. v. Frazier, 2007 MT 40, 336 M 81, 153 P3d 18 (2007).

Alford Plea Entered Voluntarily — Motion to Withdraw Plea Properly Denied: Locke moved to withdraw his Alford plea to felony robbery, but the motion was denied. On appeal, Locke argued that the District Court failed to establish a factual basis for the Alford plea when it reviewed only the information and affidavit and that failure to establish a factual basis provided good cause to withdraw the plea. The statutory procedure in 46-12-212 allows a defendant to plead guilty without actually admitting the charge if the defendant has reviewed the evidence and is capable of making a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent choice and if the record contains strong evidence of guilt. In this case, the statutory factors were met. Locke was fully aware of the direct consequences of the plea, and nothing in the record indicated that Locke was incapable of making a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent choice. Because Locke failed to establish that the plea was involuntary, the Supreme Court affirmed denial of Locke's motion to withdraw the plea. St. v. Locke, 2008 MT 423, 347 M 387, 198 P3d 316 (2008), distinguishing St. v. Frazier, 2007 MT 40, 336 M 81, 153 P3d 18 (2007).

Failure to Inform Defendant of Elements of Partner or Family Member Assault Prior to Guilty Plea — Reversible Error: At arraignment in Justice's Court on charges of partner or family member assault, the court asked defendant if he understood that by pleading guilty, he was admitting facts in the complaint, but the court did not ask defendant what the factual basis was for the plea. One day after defendant's guilty plea, he moved to withdraw the plea, but the Justice's Court denied the motion. On appeal, the District Court affirmed. On appeal to the Supreme Court, defendant asserted that the plea colloquy was inadequate, that there was no plea bargain, and that there was evidence of his innocence. The court considered the contention of the inadequate plea colloquy. Although defendant did not specifically raise the inadequate plea colloquy, defendant did adequately raise the issue in the motion to withdraw the guilty plea, and the District Court committed reversible error by not allowing defendant to withdraw the guilty plea by failing to advise defendant that by pleading guilty, the right to appeal would be waived. St. v. Frazier, 2007 MT 40, 336 M 81, 153 P3d 18 (2007), following St. v. Boucher, 2002 MT 114, 309 M 514, 48 P3d 21 (2002).

Plea Colloquy to Include Admission of Elements of Offense: A court must solicit admission from a defendant regarding what acts the defendant committed that constitute the offense charged. The court need not extract an admission of every element of the crime in order to establish a factual basis for a guilty plea, but the court must ascertain, from admissions made by the defendant at the plea colloquy, that the defendant's acts satisfy in a general sense the requirements of the crime. If the defendant is unwilling to admit any element of the crime, the court must reject the guilty plea or treat the plea as an Alford plea and apply the stricter standards of subsection (2) of this section that require strong evidence of guilt. In this case, the Justice's Court's interrogation of defendant was inadequate to determine whether there was a factual basis for defendant's guilty plea to partner or family member assault, and on appeal, the District Court should have resolved any doubt as to the voluntariness of the plea by allowing withdrawal of the plea. Failure to do so was reversible error, and the Supreme Court remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Frazier, 2007 MT 40, 336 M 81, 153 P3d 18 (2007), followed in St. v. Wise, 2009 MT 32, 349 M 187, 203 P3d 741 (2009). See also St. v. Muhammad, 2005 MT 234, 328 M 397, 121 P3d 521 (2005).

Question of Adequacy of Advisement Regarding Waiver of Appeal Rights Resolved in Favor of Defendant: The first factor in determining whether good cause existed in allowing the withdrawal of a guilty plea and whether a court abused its discretion in denying a motion to withdraw the guilty plea, as set out in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), is the adequacy of the court's interrogation at the time that the plea was entered regarding the defendant's understanding of the consequences of the plea. The plea must be a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent choice among the alternative courses of action open to the defendant. In the present case, Boucher was charged with DUI, and at his initial appearance, the Justice's Court had Boucher acknowledge in writing that he understood the waivers that he would make if he pleaded guilty. Boucher pleaded not guilty and waived no rights. Five months later, the state amended the complaint, and Boucher changed his plea to guilty, but at the time that the plea was entered, the Justice's Court did not reiterate the information provided at the initial appearance and failed to question Boucher regarding his understanding of the waiver of his constitutional rights. The Supreme Court concluded that the court's colloquy was inadequate and that good cause existed to permit Boucher to withdraw his guilty plea. Any doubt about the voluntariness of Boucher's plea was resolved in his favor, and the Supreme Court remanded to Justice's Court for further proceedings. St. v. Boucher, 2002 MT 114, 309 M 514, 48 P3d 21 (2002).

Right of Defendant to Plead Guilty Over State's Objection — Erroneous Refusal to Accept Guilty Plea: Peplow was charged with and convicted of DUI, driving with a suspended or revoked license, driving without insurance, failing to report an accident, and tampering with evidence. Prior to trial, Peplow tried to enter guilty pleas to the driving with a suspended or revoked license and driving without insurance counts, but the trial court ruled that it was not required to accept the pleas because Peplow's actions giving rise to the counts were part of the res gestae and probative of the issue of impairment; the trial court proceeded to trial on all counts. Peplow appealed on grounds that the trial court erred in refusing the guilty pleas. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court considered a defendant's right to plead guilty over the state's objection. The court noted the numerous statutory procedural safeguards in place to ensure that: (1) a guilty plea is made knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently; (2) there is a factual basis for the plea; (3) the court is not bound by any plea agreements; and (4) a defendant may not withdraw a guilty plea if the plea agreement is not accepted. The Supreme Court cited Lamb v. Missoula Imports, 230 M 183, 748 P2d 965 (1988), for the proposition that when the word "may" is used to confer power upon an officer, court, or tribunal and the public or a third person has an interest in the exercise of power, then the exercise of power becomes imperative. Under 46-16-105, a plea of guilty "may" be accepted before or during trial. The Supreme Court construed this language to mandate the acceptance of a guilty plea as long as the statutory requirements are met. Further, under 46-12-204, a defendant may plead guilty or not guilty without limitation on the right to plead. St. v. Peplow, 2001 MT 253, 307 M 172, 36 P3d 922 (2001).

Establishment of Every Element of Offense Not Required Before Guilty Plea Accepted: This section does not require a defendant to establish every element of the offense charged in order for a guilty plea to be accepted. In the present case, the fact that a defendant made no admission concerning the mental state element of an offense did not, of itself, render the trial court's interrogation inadequate or the guilty plea involuntary. St. v. Schaff, 1998 MT 104, 288 M 421, 958 P2d 682, 55 St. Rep. 396 (1998).

Alford Plea in Sexual Assault Case — Revocation of Suspended Sentence: In a sexual assault case, the defendant sufficiently raised the issue of the fifth amendment right against self-incrimination to warrant review on appeal. The defendant entered an Alford plea, and sexual offender evaluation and treatment were conditions of the suspended sentence. The District Court did not abuse its discretion when it revoked the defendant's suspended sentence for violations of the conditions of the suspended sentence, including sexual offender evaluation and treatment. St. v. Butler, 272 M 286, 900 P2d 908, 52 St. Rep. 745 (1995).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is a restatement of Rule 11(h) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and embodies the intent of 1987 MCA 46-12-206.

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, section 113-6.

The real question in all criminal cases [on appeal] is whether the substantial rights of the defendant have been adversely affected. The purpose of this section is to prevent reversal where the court has strayed from the procedure set forth, but the failure has not hindered the defense.

The burden is upon the defendant to object if any irregularity in connection with the arraignment is going to affect his defense. This does not intend to override any of the defendant's substantial constitutional rights even though not objected to during the procedure.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: At beginning substituted "Any variance from the procedure required by 46-12-211 that" for "No irregularity in the arraignment which" and after "defendant" substituted "must be disregarded" for "shall affect the validity of any proceeding in the cause if the defendant pleads to the charge or proceeds to trial without objecting to such irregularity".

Case Notes

Voluntary Guilty Plea — Withdrawal of Plea Properly Denied: Usrey pleaded guilty through a plea agreement to sexual intercourse without consent with a 6-year-old girl but later sought to withdraw the plea on grounds that it was involuntary because Usrey did not understand the plea agreement and because the District Court did not explain the rights Usrey was waiving. The Supreme Court examined the plea bargain language and affirmed. Although the written plea agreement did not state the specific maximum penalty upon conviction of sexual intercourse without consent and the District Court did not state the penalty when Usrey pleaded guilty, the court did ask Usrey if he was mindful of the maximum penalty, which was clearly stated in the information, and Usrey replied affirmatively. Also, the plea bargain called for a sentence far less than the maximum penalty, and the sentence that Usrey bargained for and that was imposed was far less than the maximum. Additionally, Usrey was not misled to his detriment simply because the District Court did not use the exact words of 46-12-210(1)(d) in telling Usrey that he might not be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea if the plea bargain was rejected. The record contained substantial evidence supporting the District Court's conclusions that Usrey understood the proceedings and was mentally competent to enter a voluntary guilty plea, and the District Court did not err in denying the motion to withdraw the plea on grounds of involuntariness. St. v. Usrey, 2009 MT 227, 351 M 341, 212 P3d 279 (2009).

Lack of Formal Plea: Although formal entry of a plea by the defendant was never completed, the defendant did not object to any irregularity before proceeding to trial and suffered no prejudice from the irregularity. St. v. Petko, 177 M 229, 581 P2d 425 (1978).

CHAPTER 13
PRETRIAL MOTIONS

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

1991 Chapter Comments: This chapter is a consolidation of code principles generally affecting the use of pretrial motions and notices. The 1987 code required only that pretrial motions be raised prior to trial. This chapter, while recognizing the court's discretion to accept motions at any time, establishes that motions and notices will generally be raised at or before the pretrial omnibus hearing or will be considered waived.

Part 1
General Provisions

46-13-101. Pretrial motions and notices.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute establishes general time restraints on pretrial motion and notice practices. These provisions are modeled after the 1987 code, but changes have been made to establish the pretrial omnibus hearing as the fulcrum of pretrial practice. The statute continues to recognize the court's wide discretion in controlling pretrial motion practice.

Subsection (1) retains the basic provision of 1987 MCA 46-13-101. The subsection requires that all pretrial motions capable of being determined before trial be submitted at or before the pretrial omnibus hearing. The statute also allows for exceptions to that standard, including instances otherwise provided for under Title 46 or instances in which good cause for the delay is shown. The court has discretion to conduct a hearing on the motions either at the pretrial omnibus hearing or at a later date.

Subsection (3) recognizes the exceptions to the waiver provided in subsection (2). It allows the court to grant relief from a waiver for good cause. It also recognizes that lack of jurisdiction or failure to state an offense are the two defenses that cannot be waived.

Subsection (4) requires that all pretrial notices be made at the pretrial omnibus hearing. The notices required at the omnibus hearing are provided for in 46-13-108.

Source: New.

Although the pre-trial motion is located at this point in the general arrangement of the code, various pre-trial motions will likely be made prior to the plea. The section is intended to cover the multitude of objections which can be raised before the commencement of trial. It is intended to include all the presently used objections as well as any valid objection the ingenuity of counsel can provide. The general theory of the entire chapter is to simplify the procedure for testing the validity of the information, indictment or complaint and the processes employed by the police, the prosecution and the judiciary in bringing a case to trial.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In (1), at beginning, inserted exception clause, after "objection" inserted "or request", and at end, after "raised", substituted "at or before the omnibus hearing unless otherwise provided by Title 46" for "before trial by motion to dismiss or for other appropriate relief"; inserted (2) concerning waiver by failure to timely raise defense or objection; inserted (3) providing for court relief from waiver; inserted first sentence of (4) requiring written motions; and made minor changes in style.

Objections to Prosecution 381

ATTACKING INDICTMENT OR INFORMATION

Elements of Issuing Bad Checks Supportive of Information: The County Attorney filed an information against McWilliams for issuing bad checks in connection with a construction business. McWilliams asserted that the information should be dismissed because the series of transactions involving the checks were an illegal series of deferred deposit loans, so McWilliams could not be criminally prosecuted. However, 31-1-723, which prohibits deferred deposit loans, applies only to licensees under Title 31, ch. 1, part 7. None of the parties involved were licensees, so the statute did not apply. McWilliams also contended that the checks did not meet the definition of negotiable instruments in 30-3-104 because they were not payable on demand, but rather were in the nature of a future promise. However, the checks contained no restrictive endorsement, and although the parties to whom the checks were written agreed to refrain from cashing them immediately, the checks were in fact payable on demand and met the statutory definition. McWilliams also cited 45-2-211 in arguing a consent defense because the parties consented to take the checks and hold them, but that argument also failed because even though the parties agreed to hold the checks, they did not consent to nonpayment or to having McWilliams stop payment altogether. McWilliams next asserted that under St. v. Patterson, 75 M 315, 243 P 355 (1926), the information was defective because it contained no assertion of an intent to defraud. The statutory language under which Patterson was charged in 1926 required a showing of intent to defraud, but the current statute, 45-6-316, contains no intent to defraud element, so the information was not defective in that regard. There was sufficient evidence to charge McWilliams with issuing bad checks, and the District Court did not err in denying McWilliams' pretrial motion to dismiss the information. St. v. McWilliams, 2008 MT 59, 341 M 517, 178 P3d 121 (2008).

Failure of Trial Court to Address Issues Raised in Defendant's Pro Se Petition — Reversible Error: After being charged with failure to register as a sexual offender, Samples was granted the opportunity to file a pretrial pro se petition addressing the ex post facto application of Title 46, ch. 23, part 5, as well as a variety of other constitutional challenges to the sexual offender registration law. The District Court substantively discussed and rejected Samples' ex post facto argument, refused to discuss the other constitutional concerns, and denied the petition. Following denial of the petition, Samples pleaded guilty, but reserved the right to appeal the ruling on the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that, even though the District Court could have refused to allow the pro se motion, once the District Court expressly authorized Samples to file a pro se motion challenging the constitutionality of the sexual offender registration law, the court was obligated to address the constitutional issues raised in the petition. Failure of the District Court to consider all of the constitutional issues raised in the petition was reversible error, and the case was remanded for consideration of all issues raised by Samples in the petition. St. v. Samples, 2005 MT 210, 328 M 242, 119 P3d 1191 (2005).

Abuse of Discretion Standard of Review of Denial of Relief From Waiver: Relief from a waiver under this section may be granted by a District Court for good cause. What constitutes good cause for granting relief from waiver is fact-specific and falls under the sound discretion of the District Court, including a request for relief based on substitution of counsel. The Supreme Court reviews a District Court's denial of relief from waiver under an abuse of discretion standard. St. v. VonBergen, 2003 MT 265, 317 M 445, 77 P3d 537 (2003).

Pretrial Motion to Dismiss Burglary and Stalking Charges Properly Denied as Premature: Tichenor was charged with three counts of felony burglary and two counts of stalking for entering his girlfriend's apartment. Following arraignment, Tichenor moved to dismiss the charges for lack of sufficient evidence, claiming that he lacked the necessary intent required for the stalking charges and that he had license to enter the apartment, so the burglary charges were unfounded. The motion was denied, and Tichenor appealed. The Supreme Court noted that the questions of Tichenor's requisite intent and whether he was unlawfully in the apartment were questions for the jury. It would have been improper for the court to step into the jury's place and resolve the issues before trial, so the motion to dismiss was premature and properly dismissed. St. v. Tichenor, 2002 MT 311, 313 M 95, 60 P3d 454 (2002), distinguishing St. v. David, 266 M 365, 880 P2d 1308 (1994), and followed in St. v. McWilliams, 2008 MT 59, 341 M 517, 178 P3d 121 (2008).

Failure to Raise Double Jeopardy Argument at Trial — Insufficient Record: The Supreme Court refused to consider a double jeopardy argument that was not raised in a timely fashion at trial, given that the record presented for review was insufficient to establish a double jeopardy defense. St. v. Dahms, 252 M 1, 825 P2d 1214, 49 St. Rep. 106 (1992).

Charge Unsupported by Probable Cause Showing — Plain Error: Petitioner was convicted of assault. The charge was not supported by any probable cause showing, and nothing contained in the affidavit filed with the original information related to assault. An amended information was filed without an affidavit. This is "plain error" of constitutional magnitude that requires reversal of petitioner's conviction of assault, notwithstanding statute then in effect and providing for waiver of defects in the institution of prosecution if they are not raised before trial. Petitioner had not raised the issue prior to trial. Parker v. Crist, 190 M 376, 621 P2d 484, 37 St. Rep. 2048 (1980).

Original Charge Supported by Probable Cause Showing — Amended Charge Not Supported: The original information filed against petitioner, with an affidavit establishing probable cause, charged him with one count of armed robbery, naming as victims all seven persons later named in the seven counts of the amended information. Before petitioner entered a plea to the original information, the County Attorney filed an amended information, with leave of court but without an affidavit establishing probable cause. No objection was made by petitioner, who simply pleaded not guilty to each of the charges and went to trial. At the time of petitioner's trial, the statute in effect provided that defects in instituting the prosecution of the case or in the information had to be raised before trial and that failure to do so constituted a waiver of any defects. Thus, the alleged defects in filing the amended information were waived by petitioner's failure to object prior to trial. More importantly, probable cause was shown by the affidavit filed with the original information. Parker v. Crist, 190 M 376, 621 P2d 484, 37 St. Rep. 2048 (1980).

Motion to Strike Information for Lack of Specificity: In prosecution for attempted deliberate homicide, the court did not err in denying defendant's motion to strike the information for lack of specificity of the applicable statutes. The motion was properly denied in that it was not made before the defendant's plea was entered, and the information was sufficiently clear even though it cited only the attempt statute, as it contained an allegation that the defendant attempted deliberate homicide. St. v. Kirkland, 184 M 229, 602 P2d 586 (1979).

Entrapment: Casual offer to buy unaccompanied by pleading, begging, or coercing of the accused does not constitute entrapment. State ex rel. Hamlin v. District Court, 163 M 16, 515 P2d 74 (1973).

Absence of Supporting Affidavit — Leave to File Information: Absence of a supporting affidavit for leave to file an information, contrary to 46-11-201, was not a fatal error since it is a procedural matter and does not affect the substantial rights of the defendant. St. v. Logan, 156 M 48, 473 P2d 833 (1970).

Waiver of Objection to Information — Generally:

The failure to object in the trial court that the application for permission to file an information was not accompanied by a supporting affidavit waived the objection. St. v. Logan, 156 M 48, 473 P2d 833 (1970).

By his failure to object to the information before demurrer or plea on the ground that it was filed prior to a preliminary hearing, the defendant waived his right to challenge the foundation of the information. St. v. Sorenson, 65 M 65, 210 P 752 (1922).

By pleading to the information without interposing a demurrer that the facts stated did not constitute a public offense, the defendant waived objections to its sufficiency. St. v. Fowler, 59 M 346, 196 P 992 (1921).

By entering his plea without a written motion to set aside the information and consenting to go to trial, the defendant waived his right to question the propriety of proceedings prior to the filing of the information. St. v. Vinn, 50 M 27, 144 P 773 (1914).

The defendant's failure to raise the objection that an information charged two distinct offenses, contrary to a former statute, constituted a waiver of such objection. St. v. Rodgers, 40 M 248, 106 P 3 (1909); St. v. Mahoney, 24 M 281, 61 P 647 (1900).

Failure to move to set aside the information on the ground that it had not been subscribed by the County Attorney waived the objection to the action of the court in permitting the information to be subscribed before demurrer or plea. St. v. Peterson, 24 M 81, 60 P 809 (1900).

If a defendant, on a second trial, does not ask to withdraw the plea of not guilty interposed at the first trial, and have another and different plea substituted, it is a waiver of any grounds of objection to the information. St. v. McCaffery, 16 M 33, 40 P 63 (1895).

Test of Sufficiency of Information:

The test of the sufficiency of an information is whether the defendant is apprised of the charges brought against him and whether he will be surprised. St. v. Bogue, 142 M 459, 384 P2d 749 (1963), overruling St. v. Hale, 129 M 449, 291 P2d 229 (1955).

The test of the sufficiency of an information is whether a person of common understanding would know what is intended to be charged. St. v. Board, 135 M 139, 337 P2d 924 (1959), followed in St. v. Brogan, 261 M 79, 862 P2d 19, 50 St. Rep. 1204 (1993).

Former Jeopardy: Defendant charged with sale of intoxicating liquor to a minor was not placed in former jeopardy by a dismissal of the complaint without any further proceedings. St. v. Moore, 138 M 379, 357 P2d 346 (1960).

Attacking Charge on Remand: When a first conviction is set aside, the defendant is not precluded upon a remand for a new trial from attacking the indictment or information. St. v. Hale, 129 M 449, 291 P2d 229 (1955), overruled on other grounds in St. v. Bogue, 142 M 459, 384 P2d 749 (1963).

Waiver of Objection to Amendment of Information: When, after a plea of not guilty, the County Attorney asked permission to amend the information and counsel for the defendant stated there was no objection, any objection to the amendment of the information to include a prior conviction was waived. State ex rel. Treat v. District Court, 122 M 249, 200 P2d 248 (1948).

Sufficiency of Charge: Ordinarily, an information charging a public offense in the language of the statute is sufficient; if considered insufficient as to details and facts, the remedy of the defendant was formerly a request for a bill of particulars. St. v. Hahn, 105 M 270, 72 P2d 459 (1937).

When Insufficiency of Information Does Not Warrant Dismissal: Insufficiency of the information does not warrant a dismissal of the action if in the opinion of the court the objection may be avoided by an amended information. State ex rel. Freebourn v. District Court, 105 M 77, 69 P2d 748 (1937).

Dismissal Before Plea Not a Bar: Dismissal of an information before the defendant is called upon to plead or before the jury is impaneled and sworn does not bar a subsequent prosecution for the same offense. St. v. Knilans, 69 M 8, 220 P 91 (1923).

Improper Joinder of Counts — Remedy: The objection that several offenses are improperly united under separate counts in an information cannot be raised by a motion to require the prosecution to elect upon which one count it would rely for conviction but must be taken by demurrer. St. v. Marchindo, 65 M 431, 211 P 1093 (1922).

Objection That Facts Do Not Constitute an Offense — When Taken: Under former law, the objection that the facts stated in an information do not constitute a public offense could be taken by demurrer, at the trial under a plea of not guilty, or after the trial in arrest of judgment. St. v. Smith, 58 M 567, 194 P 131 (1920).

Waiver of Objection Based on Former Indictment: When an accused person pleads to an information without interposing the objection, by motion, that, having already been prosecuted by indictment, he cannot be prosecuted by information, that objection is waived. St. v. Vinn, 50 M 27, 144 P 773 (1914).

Waiver of Irregularity in Filing Information:

The objection to a failure to timely file the information must be made in writing and before the demurrer or plea or it is waived. St. v. Chevigny, 48 M 382, 138 P 257 (1914).

When the County Attorney fails to comply with 46-11-203, any advantage thereof must be taken by the defendant by motion to set aside the information, and failure to so take advantage of the irregularity waives it. St. v. Lagoni, 30 M 472, 76 P 1044 (1904).

How to Object to Information on Grounds of Duplicity: An objection to an information on the grounds of duplicity is addressed to the jurisdiction of the District Court rather than to the form of the information and may be raised by an objection to the introduction of evidence and a motion to compel an election. St. v. Mjelde, 29 M 490, 75 P 87 (1903).

Count Containing Differing Forms of Offense — Waiver of Objection: Any objection to the inclusion of one count of the statement of different forms of the same offense must be made in the District Court before plea; otherwise it is waived. St. v. Mahoney, 24 M 281, 61 P 647 (1900).

Remedy When Information Has Been Filed Without Leave of Court: When an information has been filed without leave of court and before the examination and commitment of the defendant, an appropriate remedy is by a motion to quash. St. v. McCaffery, 16 M 33, 40 P 63 (1895).

OBJECTIONS TO PROSECUTION

No Grounds Asserted for Speedy Trial Argument — Motion Properly Dismissed: Cybulski filed a pretrial motion to dismiss a DUI case for lack of a speedy trial, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Cybulski's motion consisted of one paragraph and no brief in support of the motion. The statutory requirements for filing pretrial motions are that a motion must state with particularity the grounds for the motion and the order or relief sought. Cybulski's motion consisted of only an assertion that because more than 1 year had elapsed, a speedy trial analysis was required. Without more, the requirements for pretrial motions were not met and the motion was properly dismissed. St. v. Cybulski, 2009 MT 70, 349 M 429, 204 P3d 7 (2009). See also St. v. Yecovenko, 2004 MT 196, 322 M 247, 95 P3d 145 (2004).

Waiver of Right to Raise Issue of Unreasonable Delay — Failure to Move Court for Ruling at or Before Omnibus Hearing: Approximately 4 hours after Kummerfeldt was involved in a single-vehicle accident, his blood was drawn for a BAC test, which produced a 0.14% result. At trial, he moved for a judgment of acquittal on the DUI per se charge, based on the state's failure to prove his BAC result was 0.08 or greater at the time he was driving and because under St. v. McGowan, 2006 MT 163, 332 M 490, 139 P3d 841 (2006), 4 hours was an unreasonable delay between the driving and the drawing of blood. However, not only did Kummerfeldt fail to raise this objection at the omnibus hearing, he also entered into a pretrial stipulation as to the admissibility of the BAC report. Therefore, Kummerfeldt waived his arguments. St. v. Kummerfeldt, 2008 MT 333, 346 M 187, 194 P3d 662, (2008).

Failure of Trial and Appellate Counsel to Adequately Assert Prejudice Element of Motion to Sever Constituting Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Warranting Reversal: Trial counsel failed to properly form a motion to sever sexual assault charges from pornography charges in a manner to demonstrate that failure to sever the criminal counts would result in prejudice to defendant. Following conviction on all counts, appellate counsel argued in St. v. Yecovenko, 2004 MT 196, 322 M 247, 95 P3d 145 (2004), that the trial court erred in failing to sever, but did not raise the issue of ineffective assistance of trial counsel, so the Supreme Court declined to consider the issue. On a petition for postconviction relief, new counsel argued the ineffective assistance of both trial and appellate counsel, and the District Court agreed. However, the petition was dismissed on grounds that counsels' conduct did not prejudice defendant in a manner that denied defendant a fair trial. Defendant appealed denial of the petition, and the Supreme Court reversed. Trial counsel's failure to allege the nature or type of prejudice that would occur absent a severance constituted ineffective assistance, and appellate counsel's failure to raise ineffective assistance of trial counsel could not be viewed as a legitimate appellate strategy. Defendant received inadequate assistance of both trial and appellate counsel and was entitled to a new trial on the sexual assault charges. Yecovenko v. St., 2007 MT 338, 340 M 251, 173 P3d 684 (2007).

Issue of Particularized Suspicion for Traffic Stop to Be Raised Prior to Trial: At the close of Vincent's DUI trial, Vincent moved for acquittal on grounds that the officer lacked a particularized suspicion to make the stop. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. This section requires that, unless good cause exists, any defense, objection, or request that is capable of determination without trial of the general issues must be raised at or before the omnibus hearing. The defense of lack of a particularized suspicion to make a traffic stop is an issue that is capable of such determination. When Vincent made the motion at the end of the trial, it was too late to seek a judgment of acquittal based on a defense that could have been made before the trial. St. v. Vincent, 2007 MT 94, 337 M 87, 155 P3d 1292 (2007).

No Error in Trial Court's Failure to Sever Counts of Sexual Assault and Sexual Abuse of Children — Defendant's Failure to Show Prejudice: Prior to trial, Yecovenko moved to sever charges of sexual abuse of his stepdaughters from charges of sexual abuse of children related to Yecovenko's downloading of child pornography from the Internet, asserting that prejudice would result, but failing to assert the type of prejudice that would occur if the charges were not severed, as required by St. v. Freshment, 2002 MT 61, 309 M 154, 43 P3d 968 (2002). Because Yecovenko failed in District Court to satisfy the threshold requirement of alleging the nature or type of prejudice that would occur, the Supreme Court declined to consider Yecovenko's prejudice arguments on appeal, and denial of the motion to sever was affirmed. St. v. Yecovenko, 2004 MT 196, 322 M 247, 95 P3d 145 (2004).

Failure to Meet Statutory Duty to Bring Defense, Objection, or Request at or Before Omnibus Hearing Constituting Waiver: A party has a statutory duty to bring any defense, objection, or request that is capable of determination without trial of the general issue, including motions to suppress, at or before the omnibus hearing or by a later date if ordered by the court, and failure to do so constitutes a waiver. Here, defendant's motion to suppress was filed after both the date of the omnibus hearing and a later deadline for motions set by the District Court, but 6 months before the actual trial. Nevertheless, the motion was untimely as a matter of law, and the District Court did not err in denying relief from the waiver. St. v. VonBergen, 2003 MT 265, 317 M 445, 77 P3d 537 (2003), followed in St. v. Adkins, 2009 MT 71, 349 M 444, 204 P3d 1 (2009).

Waiver of Issue of Probable Cause Based on Failure to Raise Issue Prior to Omnibus Hearing: Landis was charged with felony theft and felony deceptive practices. At arraignment, Landis entered not guilty pleas to both charges. About 2 months later, an omnibus hearing was held. Approximately 3 months after the hearing, Landis moved for a probable cause hearing, which the District Court denied as untimely. Landis moved to dismiss, arguing lack of probable cause, and that motion was also denied. Landis was ultimately convicted of both charges, but appealed on grounds that the District Court erred in refusing to dismiss the case for lack of probable cause. The Supreme Court disagreed. Allegations of lack of probable cause to support criminal charges, whether raised by motion to dismiss or motion for a probable cause hearing, are defenses or objections that can be determined without trial on the general issue, and thus must be raised at or before the omnibus hearing pursuant to this section. Failure by Landis to raise the probable cause issue until 3 months after the omnibus hearing constituted waiver of the issue. The District Court properly dismissed the motions as untimely. St. v. Landis, 2002 MT 45, 308 M 354, 43 P3d 298 (2002).

Lack of Subject Matter Jurisdiction Nonwaivable Defect: LaPier argued that the lower court's finding that he was guilty of the felony offense of violation of a protective order because it was his third such violation was error because the court lacked jurisdiction to do so because one of the prior convictions was constitutionally infirm. The state argued that LaPier could not raise the issue for the first time on appeal. The Supreme Court held that although the general rule was that an issue could not be raised for the first time on appeal, lack of subject matter jurisdiction is a nonwaivable defect and may be raised at any stage of the proceedings. St. v. LaPier, 1998 MT 174, 289 M 392, 961 P2d 1274, 55 St. Rep. 707 (1998), overruled in Slavin v. St., 2005 MT 306, 329 M 424, 127 P3d 350 (2005).

No Error in Denial of Untimely Midtrial Motion to Suppress Evidence: Motions to suppress are expressly among pretrial matters that must be raised at or before the omnibus hearing. Griffing indicated an intent to file motions to suppress his confession and physical evidence pursuant to this section and 46-13-302, but the motions were not made until trial had commenced. Failure to raise the issues at or before the omnibus hearing constituted a waiver under this section. Thus, the trial court did not err in denying the midtrial motion to suppress as untimely. St. v. Griffing, 1998 MT 75, 288 M 213, 955 P2d 1388, 55 St. Rep. 309 (1998), following St. v. Greywater, 282 M 28, 939 P2d 975 (1997).

Failure to Raise Objection Prior to Trial — Waiver of Objection: Defendant was convicted of tampering with a witness, defendant's child. In the reply brief to the Supreme Court, defendant contended that the crime of witness tampering does not apply to the constitutionally protected relationship of parent and child and that the District Court thus did not have subject matter jurisdiction over the issue. Under this section, lack of jurisdiction must be noticed by the court at any time during the pendency of the proceedings. However, the Supreme Court held that the challenge went not to the fundamental authority of a District Court to adjudicate a witness tampering case but rather to the constitutionality of applying the witness tampering statute to this particular case. Because the issue was not actually jurisdiction but rather constitutionality, the Supreme Court declined to address it because it was not raised until defendant filed the reply brief, therefore waiving the defense. St. v. Williams-Rusch, 279 M 437, 928 P2d 169, 53 St. Rep. 1224 (1996).

Refusal to Grant Defense Access to Witness Statement Used to Refresh Memory Prior to Pretrial Hearing — No Abuse of Discretion: It was within the discretion of the District Court to refuse to allow defense counsel to inspect a written statement used by a witness to refresh his memory prior to a pretrial hearing when there was nothing in the statement that would have aided the defense's cross-examination and the statement was subsequently provided to the defense after the hearing and prior to trial. It would have been nonsensical to allow the defense access to the statement at the same hearing at which defense access to the statement was at issue. St. v. Briner, 253 M 158, 831 P2d 1365, 49 St. Rep. 402 (1992).

Denial of Motion to Disqualify County Prosecutor for Alleged Conflict of Interest: Defendant sought to disqualify the County Attorney who was prosecuting his criminal case based on an alleged conflict of interest arising from the County Attorney's representation of the county in defendant's pro se civil suit against the county and its officers filed subsequent to defendant's arrest but prior to trial. Lacking a showing that defendant's prosecution was handled any differently because of his pending civil suit, the trial judge was well within his discretion in denying defendant's motion to disqualify the County Attorney. St. v. Dahms, 252 M 1, 825 P2d 1214, 49 St. Rep. 106 (1992). See also St. v. Clark, 2000 MT 40, 298 M 300, 997 P2d 107, 57 St. Rep. 185 (2000).

Authority to Dismiss: A judge had no authority under 46-13-101 to grant the defendant's motion to dismiss based on a defense that went to the general issue to be determined at trial or under 46-13-201 (renumbered 46-13-401) because he did not set forth the reasons for dismissal in an order entered on the minutes. St. v. Cole, 174 M 380, 571 P2d 87 (1977).

Timeliness of Motion to Suppress Evidence:

If evidence was obtained by unlawful search and seizure, it was necessary for the accused, who desired to exclude such evidence from his trial, to make a timely objection to its introduction and not wait until the first day of trial after voir dire of the jury. St. v. Briner, 173 M 185, 567 P2d 35 (1977), followed in St. v. Greywater, 282 M 28, 939 P2d 975, 54 St. Rep. 16 (1997).

If accused has had opportunity to suppress illegally obtained evidence before trial and fails to do so, objection to the evidence at trial will not avail him. St. v. Gotta, 71 M 288, 229 P 405 (1924).

Off-the-Record Statements — Prosecutorial Misconduct: Allegations of improper statements by an Assistant Attorney General and prosecutorial misconduct do not reach the merits of the charges and are a weak basis for seeking dismissal of the charges. St. v. Scanlon, 33 St. Rep. 1355 (1976), replaced by opinion in 174 M 139, 569 P2d 368 (1977).

Bill of Particulars: In a criminal case no bill of particulars may be required or ordered. St. v. Bosch, 125 M 566, 242 P2d 977 (1952).

Objection Based on Statute of Limitations:

Under former law, the defendant was charged with taking and using an automobile without the consent of the owner, which offense was punishable by fine or imprisonment in the county jail or by imprisonment in the state penitentiary not exceeding 5 years. The information was not filed until 14 months after the commission of the offense. The court held that the District Court erred in sustaining a demurrer to the pleading on the grounds that, the offense being a misdemeanor, the limitation of 1 year within which the information could be filed had expired, and in holding that it was without jurisdiction to proceed. St. v. Atlas, 75 M 547, 244 P 477 (1926).

Under former law, when an information for a misdemeanor was filed more than 1 year and 10 months after the alleged offense, and it alleged that on or about that time the defendant left the state and afterwards resided outside the state, the defendant could properly demur to the information on the grounds that prosecution was barred by the Statute of Limitations. St. v. Clemens, 40 M 567, 107 P 896 (1910).

Objection That Facts Do Not Constitute an Offense — When Taken: Under former law, the objection that the facts stated in an information do not constitute a public offense could be taken by demurrer, at the trial under a plea of not guilty, or after the trial in arrest of judgment. St. v. Smith, 58 M 567, 194 P 131 (1920).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute combines elements of both the 1987 code and the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure to establish a single statute governing the determination of pretrial motions. The statute continues to recognize the court's discretion in this area but imposes certain requirements upon the court not stated in the 1987 code.

Subsection (1) adopts the initial sentence of the federal rule providing for the determination of pretrial motions. See Rule 12(e), Fed. R. Crim. P. The statute reflects 1987 MCA 46-13-104 but more clearly identifies the court's discretion in deferring the determination of certain pretrial motions.

Subsection (2) provides the court with certain discretion to conduct hearings on motions, although in certain cases a hearing is mandatory.

Subsection (3) is a new requirement that the determination of any pretrial motion either be written or stated on the record so as to be available for review.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In (1), near beginning after "trial", deleted "raising defenses or objections", after "court" inserted "for good cause", and at end inserted "or until after the verdict, but a determination may not be deferred if a party's right to appeal is adversely affected"; inserted (2) concerning hearing on motion; inserted (3) requiring court's statement of findings of fact and conclusions of law; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Hearing on Suppression Motion Unnecessary When Facts Uncontested: In Justice's Court, Schulke moved to suppress evidence, but the motion was denied. Schulke stated that an evidentiary hearing on the motion would be superfluous and thus did not request a hearing. On appeal, the District Court declined to hold a hearing on the suppression motion and Schulke asserted error, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Schulke did not contest the facts in the investigating officer's report in Justice's Court and argued that a hearing was necessary only when the Justice's Court and the District Court ruled against him. An evidentiary hearing is unnecessary when facts are uncontested and the court is asked to make a decision as a matter of law. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying a hearing on the suppression motion when a hearing was not requested in Justice's Court. St. v. Schulke, 2005 MT 77, 326 M 390, 109 P3d 744 (2005). See also St. v. Shook, 2002 MT 347, 313 M 347, 61 P3d 863 (2002).

Objectionable Testimony Elicited by Defendant's Own Actions — Right to Allege Error on Appeal Waived: Smith was charged with stealing his mother's credit card and using the card to withdraw money from her bank account and charge items for his personal use. Pretrial, Smith moved in limine to preclude witnesses at trial from testifying regarding Smith's prior criminal convictions, and the motion was granted. When his mother testified, Smith's counsel asked what efforts she made to locate Smith after discovering that her credit card was gone, and the mother responded that she had checked with Smith's parole officer to see if the officer knew where Smith was. Smith immediately moved for a mistrial, asserting that the comment violated the motion in limine, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Because the objectionable testimony was elicited by Smith's own actions, he waived the right to allege error on appeal because he actively participated in creating the error. St. v. Smith, 2005 MT 18, 325 M 374, 106 P3d 553 (2005), following St. v. Gafford, 172 M 380, 563 P2d 1129 (1977).

No Pretrial Determination Regarding Whether Statement Admissible for Impeachment Purposes — Waiver of Right to Object to Admissibility: At the time of arrest, Harris admitted an act of sexual intercourse with his adopted daughter. Prior to trial, Harris moved to suppress the statement on grounds that it was involuntary and obtained in violation of his fifth amendment rights under the United States Constitution. The District Court agreed that the statement could not be used, but expressly stated that its limited suppression order did not address whether it could be used by the state for impeachment purposes in the event that Harris testified, essentially reserving its ruling for a later time, as authorized in this section. Harris's testimony about the statement during direct examination brought the statement into evidence by his own volition, constituting waiver of the right to appeal the admissibility of the statement for use as impeachment. St. v. Harris, 1999 MT 115, 294 M 397, 983 P2d 881, 56 St. Rep. 481 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162, 53 St. Rep. 966 (1996), and St. v. Ingraham, 284 M 77, 945 P2d 16, 54 St. Rep. 614 (1997).

Motion In Limine Not Ruled on Until After Defense Witness Called — Opening Statement Not Impaired — Requirements of Statute: Huerta was charged with felony assault (now assault with a weapon) of a juvenile. At his trial, Huerta tried to introduce testimony from witnesses that the juvenile's mother, Brenda, was in the habit of severely punishing her son. The District Court required Huerta to prepare summaries of the testimony expected from his witnesses, but it was not until the second day of trial, after Huerta had called his first witness, that the District Court ruled on the state's motion in limine to exclude the testimony. Huerta claimed that the delay in the ruling was error because of the confusion that it caused and that it had prevented him from making an effective opening statement. Huerta also claimed that the District Court violated this section because the District Court did not state its intention to delay ruling on the state's motion until trial with a statement of good cause. The Supreme Court held that this section cannot be read to require the District Court to make a statement of good cause at any particular time but only to require that the court have good cause for taking the motion under advisement. The Supreme Court reviewed the record and held that the District Court had good cause in delaying the ruling on the state's motion until trial because the District Court needed to determine the motion in light of the cross-examination of Brenda and to decide the relevance of any character or habit evidence in light of her testimony. St. v. Huerta, 285 M 245, 947 P2d 483, 54 St. Rep. 1133 (1997).

46-13-108. Notice by prosecutor seeking persistent felony offender status.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute retains the requirement contained in 1987 MCA 46-18-503 that the prosecutor notify the defendant that he is seeking persistent felony offender status. Subsection (1) requires that the notice be given at or before the omnibus hearing and references 46-13-101. Subsection (2) retains the 1987 code's requirement for notice that the prosecutor is seeking persistent felony offender status. See 1987 MCA 46-18-503(2). Subsection (3) reflects the statute change that requires notice at or before the omnibus hearing. Subsection (4) retains the 1987 code's hearing requirements. See 1987 MCA 46-18-503(4).

Source: Revised Sections of Nebraska, 1943 (29-2221(2)).

The section is a new approach to charging prior convictions and is intended to give the defendant the requisite notice and to avoid infecting any trial of the case with the potentially prejudicial information of the defendant's prior criminal record.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 395 in (5) inserted "or nolo contendere". Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 at end of (1) substituted "46-13-110" for "46-13-101".

1991 Amendment: In (1), at beginning, inserted exception clause, before "seeks" substituted "prosecution" for "state", after "offender" deleted "under 46-18-502", and after "given" substituted "at or before the omnibus hearing pursuant to 46-13-101" for "in writing to the accused or his attorney before the entry of a plea of guilty by the accused or before the case is called for trial upon a plea of not guilty"; in (2) substituted "and may not be" for "The notice and the charges of prior convictions contained therein shall not be made public or in any manner", after "returned" deleted "upon the felony charge", and at end substituted "except as allowed by the Montana Rules of Evidence" for "However, if the defendant testifies in his own behalf, he is subject to impeachment as provided in the Montana Rules of Evidence"; in (3), at beginning, substituted "defendant objects to the allegations contained in" for "accused is convicted upon the felony charge", after "notice" deleted "together with proper proof of timely service, shall be filed with the court before the time fixed for sentencing", and at end substituted "the judge shall conduct a hearing to determine if the allegations in the notice are true" for "the court shall then fix a time for hearing with at least 3 days' notice to the accused"; in (4), in two places, substituted "judge" for "court" and at end substituted "as provided by law" for "under the provisions of 46-18-502"; inserted (5) regarding filing and sealing of notice; and made minor changes in style.

Notice 387
Hearing 389

GENERAL

Alternative Sentence for Drug Offense Not Precluded by Persistent Felony Offender Statutes, but Incarceration Not Error: Brendal pleaded guilty to fraudulently obtaining dangerous drugs and was sentenced to 25 years in prison with 15 years suspended. Based on prior convictions for the same offense, the sentencing court designated Brendal as a persistent felony offender and imposed a mandatory 10-year prison sentence. Brendal appealed the sentence on grounds that the sentencing court should have considered a sentence to a drug treatment program pursuant to the alternative sentencing authority in 45-9-202. However, the Supreme Court affirmed. The persistent felony offender statutes do not preclude a District Court from providing an alternative sentence under 45-9-202 for a person convicted of a drug-related offense, as long as the required criteria for imposing an alternative sentence are satisfied. Therefore, although the District Court could have provided an alternative sentence, it was not error to sentence Brendal to incarceration. St. v. Brendal, 2009 MT 236, 351 M 395, 213 P3d 448 (2009).

Failure to Object to Persistent Felony Offender Notice — No Hearing or Findings Required: If a defendant fails to object to a persistent felony offender notice, no hearing or findings regarding alleged prior convictions are required. St. v. Minez, 2003 MT 344, 318 M 478, 82 P3d 1 (2003), followed in St. v. Gallagher, 2005 MT 336, 330 M 65, 125 P3d 1141 (2005).

District Court Jurisdiction to Apply Persistent Felony Offender Designation to Felony DUI: Yorek pleaded guilty to and was sentenced on a felony DUI charge. The District Court determined that it had jurisdiction and imposed a persistent felony offender designation. Yorek sought postconviction relief on grounds that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to impose a persistent felony offender designation for felony DUI. The District Court denied the petition for postconviction relief, concluding that sentencing for felony DUI is not solely governed by 61-8-731 and 61-8-734, that nothing in the persistent felony offender statute excludes felony DUI offenders from its application, and that Yorek waived any jurisdiction claim by pleading guilty. The Supreme Court affirmed. Nothing in 46-18-502 distinguishes between or among the types of felonies to which it applies, or excludes DUI offenders. Rather, if the underlying charge meets the definition of a felony and if the state has provided proper notice of its intent to seek persistent felony offender status under this section, a District Court has the statutory authority to designate and sentence an offender as a persistent felony offender. Yorek's crime met the definition of a felony, and Yorek fell squarely within the persistent felony offender statute. The state met the notice provisions, and the District Court possessed subject matter jurisdiction to designate Yorek as a persistent felony offender. Because the jurisdiction question was dispositive, the Supreme Court did not reach the question of whether Yorek's guilty plea was a procedural bar against bringing the claim. St. v. Yorek, 2002 MT 74, 309 M 238, 45 P3d 872 (2002), followed in St. v. Pettijohn, 2002 MT 75, 309 M 244, 45 P3d 870 (2002), and St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 M 276, 119 P3d 1194 (2005).

Sentencing Hearings — Montana Rules of Evidence Not Applicable: Rule 101(c)(3), Montana Rules of Evidence, exempts sentencing proceedings from evidentiary constraints, and because felony offender hearings are part of the sentencing proceedings, they too are subject to the Montana Rules of Evidence. St. v. Lamere, 202 M 313, 658 P2d 376, 40 St. Rep. 110 (1983).

Similar Break-Ins on Same Day Admissible: Defendant was charged with felony theft for stealing a pickup, burglary for a break-in at the Ulm Bar, burglary for a break-in at the Mountain Palace Bar, and theft of personal property from the Ulm Bar break-in. On the same day these break-ins occurred, the Craig Bar was broken into and burglarized. The District Court denied defendant's motion in limine to exclude evidence from similar crimes committed on the same date as those with which defendant was charged. On appeal the Supreme Court said that applying the four-part test set forth in St v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), the evidence was admissible, that the proper procedure was followed as to the form and content of the notice, and that the jury was properly instructed. St. v. Van Natta, 200 M 312, 651 P2d 57, 39 St. Rep. 1771 (1982).

Admissibility of Evidence of Prior Crimes or Acts: To introduce evidence of prior uncharged offenses for the limited purposes allowed, the potential for prejudice to the defendant requires the prospective application of a three-part procedure in addition to any other requirements: (1) the defendant must be given notice of planned introduction and its purpose, following the form and procedure in 46-18-503 (renumbered as this section); (2) the court must give a cautionary instruction on the purpose of the evidence; and (3) the court must charge the jury that the defendant is not being tried and may not be convicted for any other offense. St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979).

Statutes Construed Together: The Supreme Court saw no problem in construing 46-18-502 and 46-18-503 (renumbered as this section) together to provide both the procedural requirements and substantive basis for implementing persistent felony offender sanctions since that is precisely what the Legislature intended. St. v. Radi, 176 M 451, 578 P2d 1169 (1978).

Not Retroactive: The statute precluding disclosure to the jury in a criminal proceeding of any prior convictions does not apply retroactively to a criminal trial prior to the effective date of the statute. St. v. Gray, 152 M 145, 447 P2d 475 (1968).

NOTICE

Filing of Amended Information — New Omnibus Hearing or Persistent Felony Offender Notice Not Required: Potter asserted that because he was not notified anew that the state would seek a persistent felony offender designation following the filing of an amended information adding an additional felony charge, the trial court erred in sentencing him as a persistent felony offender. The Supreme Court disagreed. Nothing in statute requires either a new omnibus hearing or a new persistent felony offender notice upon the filing of an amended information. Potter knew for over a year that the state would seek a persistent felony offender designation, and nothing in the record indicated that he was prejudiced by the timing of the notice. The persistent felony offender designation was affirmed. St. v. Potter, 2008 MT 381, 347 M 38, 197 P3d 471 (2008).

Adequate Notice of State's Intention to File Persistent Felony Offender Status — Failure of Defendant to File Objection to Prior Offense Despite Opportunity to Do So: Shults asserted that the state failed to properly notify of its intention to seek persistent felony offender (PFO) status by not specifying the alleged prior convictions before or at the omnibus hearing. The Supreme Court held that notice was adequate. The Supreme Court will not overturn a PFO designation if a defendant has ample opportunity to object to PFO treatment, including the underlying charge on which the statute is based, and the defendant is not prejudiced by the timing of the filing. Here, Shults had 4 months to file an objection to the alleged prior offense prior to sentencing, but failed to do so. The sentencing designation was affirmed. St. v. Shults, 2006 MT 100, 332 M 130, 136 P3d 507 (2006), followed in St. v. Ramsey, 2007 MT 31, 336 M 44, 152 P3d 710 (2007), and St. v. Dodson, 2009 MT 419, 354 M 28, 221 P3d 687 (2009).

Belated Notice to Seek Persistent Felony Offender Status Based on "Good Cause": Fields, charged with felony theft and DUI, negotiated a plea agreement under which the state agreed not to seek persistent felony offender status and recommended a 7-year suspended sentence. After the signing of the agreement and the filing of an omnibus status report, the state reinstituted its intent to seek persistent felony offender status after Fields informed officials that he would not abide by the agreement and would be seeking a jury trial. When upon conviction, the District Court sentenced Fields to a prison term as a persistent felony offender, Fields appealed, alleging that the District Court erred when it determined that the state had "good cause" to increase Fields' sentence as a persistent felony offender because the state had not given Fields notice of that intent at the omnibus hearing. In affirming the District Court decision, the Supreme Court ruled that there was "good cause" for allowing the state to file its intent to seek persistent felony offender status as a result of Fields' decision not to follow through with the negotiated plea agreement. St. v. Fields, 2000 MT 328, 303 M 56, 15 P3d 400, 57 St. Rep. 1391 (2000).

Guilty Plea Constituting Waiver of Nonjurisdictional Defects and Defenses: Following Niederklopfer's omnibus hearing on charges of deliberate homicide, the state filed a notice to seek increased punishment of Niederklopfer as a persistent felony offender. Niederklopfer subsequently waived his rights, pleaded guilty to mitigated deliberate homicide pursuant to a plea agreement, and was sentenced to 80 years as a persistent felony offender. Niederklopfer later sought postconviction relief on grounds that the state did not give sufficient notice that it would seek persistent felony offender status. The Supreme Court affirmed the sentence. The District Court had jurisdiction to consider Niederklopfer a persistent felony offender when notice was filed to designate him as such, even though the notice was filed late. Timeliness of the notice was not jurisdictional, but rather the late notice was a procedural defect that Niederklopfer did not object to when filed. Niederklopfer's voluntary and intelligent guilty plea constituted a waiver of nonjurisdictional or procedural defects, including the timeliness of the notice. Because Niederklopfer failed to allege that he would have gone to trial but for his counsel's failure to object, the second prong of the Strickland test (466 US 668) for ineffective assistance of counsel was not met, and the District Court did not err in denying his petition for postconviction relief. St. v. Niederklopfer, 2000 MT 187, 300 M 397, 6 P3d 448, 57 St. Rep. 742 (2000).

Notice of Intent to Seek Increased Punishment Not Filed With Court Until After Trial — No Error in Persistent Felony Offender Designation: The state timely served defense counsel with notice of its intent to seek increased punishment for McQuiston as a persistent felony offender but did not file the notice with the court until after trial was concluded, 5 months before sentencing. McQuiston contended that timely filing of the notice was a jurisdictional prerequisite and that failure to so do constituted reversible error. However, the state's notice to defense counsel 5 months before trial and to the court 5 months before sentencing did not prejudice McQuiston, and the persistent felony offender designation was not made in error. St. v. McQuiston, 277 M 397, 922 P2d 519, 53 St. Rep. 729 (1996).

Notice to Specify Purpose of Proposed Evidence: The prosecution's notice to the defendant of the state's intent to introduce evidence of prior conduct stated that the evidence was to be introduced for the purpose of showing "opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident in committing the offenses charged". The Supreme Court held that the introduction of the evidence was reversible error because the prosecution had used a "shotgun" approach in listing reasons for introducing the evidence rather than giving the defendant a specific purpose for the evidence's admission. St. v. Croteau, 248 M 403, 812 P2d 1251, 48 St. Rep. 484 (1991).

Prejudice of Untimely Notice Not Cured by Right to Continuance: On the first day of trial, the prosecution gave the defense notice of additional evidence of prior acts that the state intended to introduce. The Supreme Court held that the defendant had the right to a speedy trial and to proper notice and that the defendant could not be compelled due to untimely notice to choose between the two. St. v. Croteau, 248 M 403, 812 P2d 1251, 48 St. Rep. 484 (1991).

Time of Giving:

The state could give defendant who pleaded not guilty notice of intent to seek increased punishment at any point prior to the beginning of the trial and did not have to give the notice before or at the pretrial omnibus hearing. St. v. Scheffelman, 225 M 408, 733 P2d 348, 44 St. Rep. 357 (1987).

When notice of the invocation of the persistent felony offender statute was given 12 days before the case came to trial, the State's invocation adequately conformed with the statute and due process. St. v. Seitzinger, 180 M 136, 589 P2d 655 (1979).

The county attorney had the right to seek increased punishment under 46-18-502, whether plea bargaining negotiations were in progress or not. There was no record of retaliation on his part. The only question presented was whether the giving of the notice required by 46-18-503 (renumbered as this section) violated due process when given on a Friday afternoon when the trial was to commence the following Monday. The Supreme Court held that notice can be given any time before the case is "called for trial", meaning the beginning of the trial. St. v. Johnson, 179 M 61, 585 P2d 1328 (1978).

Notice of Exact Crimes and Form of Testimony Required: Defendant was charged with slashing his ex-wife's tires. During the trial, evidence was introduced that the wife had had a total of 36 tires slashed since her divorce from defendant. Additionally, men she had dated testified to having their tires slashed during the dating period. Defense counsel challenged this evidence of prior conduct because the defense had not received notice that the State would introduce such evidence. The State said that there was no prejudice as defendant was aware the State intended to introduce such evidence. The Supreme Court said prejudice was found in the fact that defendant did not know exactly what acts or crimes he would have to be prepared to defend against at trial, nor did he know the form of such testimony. The case was remanded for retrial. St. v. Brown, 209 M 502, 680 P2d 582, 41 St. Rep. 852 (1984).

Notice as Jurisdictional or Procedural: This section, which provides for sentencing persons designated as persistent felony offenders, requires that two notices be given to the accused or his attorney. The first notice must be given prior to the entry of a guilty plea or before a trial is called upon a not guilty plea. The second notice applies when a defendant is convicted. The first notice is jurisdictional and was clearly given in this case. The second notice is procedural. The record does not show any prejudice due to lack of the second notice, because defendant appeared at the hearing with counsel and did not contest the lack of notice. St. v. Madera, 206 M 140, 670 P2d 552, 40 St. Rep. 1558 (1983). See also St. v. Hawkins, 239 M 404, 781 P2d 259, 46 St. Rep. 1786 (1989).

Written Notice Required: Although the defendant was aware of the State's intention to have him designated as a persistent felony offender, the State did not file written notice of its intent until the day of sentencing. The case was remanded for sentencing, with written notice of the State's intent to be given at least 3 days prior to sentencing. St. v. Welling, 199 M 135, 647 P2d 852, 39 St. Rep. 1215 (1982).

Failure to Object to Lack of Notice: Failure to object to lack of notice at the time of sentencing as a persistent felony offender does not constitute a waiver of the requirement of notice to the defendant. In re Davis, 179 M 196, 587 P2d 30 (1978).

Notice Not Error When Jury Uninformed: When the State, pursuant to this section, gave proper notice to the defendant of its intention to seek increased punishment if the defendant was convicted on a charge of rape, on the basis of the defendant's prior conviction of a felony, there was no error since the jury was not in possession of such information. St. v. Metcalf, 153 M 369, 457 P2d 453 (1969).

Alleging Previous Conviction: Under former law, in an information charging, among other things, a prior conviction of an offense in another state which in this state was punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, it was unnecessary to allege the facts constituting the crime in the foreign state, and it was immaterial whether the offense of which the defendant was alleged to have been previously convicted in the sister state was a felony there. St. v. Paisley, 36 M 237, 92 P 566 (1907).

HEARING

Finding of No Mitigating Factors Supported in Record: Where the trial court considered defendant's drinking and sexual problems but concluded that those conditions did not excuse defendant from accountability for his acts, and the evidence presented at the hearing and in the presentence investigation report supported the trial court's conclusion, there was no abuse of discretion in sentencing defendant as a persistent felony offender. St. v. Metz, 184 M 533, 604 P2d 102 (1979).

Specific Objection to Evidence Required: By failing to make a specific objection, the defendant waived his right to assert that the State's certificate of prior conviction was not competent evidence without proof that he was the person named in the certificate. The defendant was informed well in advance of the time he entered his guilty plea that he would be tried as a persistent felony offender. At the hearing to determine whether the defendant was a persistent felony offender, he had an opportunity to object to the State's lack of identification but failed to do so. St. v. Metz, 184 M 533, 604 P2d 102 (1979).

Impeachment of Defendant's Testimony: Subsection (2)(b) of this section does not change any law relative to informing the jury of a defendant's prior record for impeachment purposes. A prior record of the defendant may still be used to impeach his testimony should he decide to testify in his own behalf. St. v. Romero, 161 M 333, 505 P2d 1207 (1973).

Sufficiency of Evidence: A mere showing that the defendant's name is similar to the name of a person on a charge sheet showing an alleged prior offense is not sufficient to authorize an enhanced sentence. There must be competent proof that the defendant is the same person as the one named on the charge sheet. Failure to produce such proof does not invalidate the conviction, only the sentence. St. v. Cooper, 158 M 102, 489 P2d 99 (1971).

Cross-Examination of Defendant: Even though the prosecutor gave notice under this section, the defendant was not entitled to enjoin the prosecutor from cross-examining the defendant on prior convictions in the absence of a showing of prejudice from the cross-examination and the defendant was not prejudiced by his failure to testify after an injunction was denied. St. v. Lewis, 157 M 452, 486 P2d 863 (1971).

Constitutionality: Subsection (4) of this section does not unconstitutionally deprive the accused of the right to a jury trial. Newman v. Estelle, 156 M 502, 484 P2d 276 (1971), certiorari denied, 404 US 966, 30 L Ed 2d 285, 92 S Ct 341 (1971).

Case Notes

Failure to Give Notice of Intent to Introduce Evidence of Prior Intervention Hearing and Sanctions — New Trial Granted: At Campa's drug trial, the state sought to introduce evidence of a prior intervention hearing and of sanctions that were imposed as a result of the hearing. However, the state neglected to give Campa notice of its intent to introduce the evidence as required by 46-13-109. Campa appealed the lack of notice, but the state argued that no notice was required because the evidence was part of the transaction of the charged offense and thus admissible under the transaction rule in 26-1-103. The Supreme Court disagreed. Evidence of the intervention hearing and sanctions constituted evidence of a wrong at a time other than the offense charged, and because the state failed to comply with the procedural notice requirement, the evidence was improperly admitted, prejudicing Campa. The case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Campa, 2009 MT 251, 351 M 504, 213 P3d 1102 (2009).

46-13-110. Omnibus hearing.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: Subsection (1) provides a time limit for the court to hold an omnibus hearing. Subsection (3) is designed to constitute a checklist of motions and notices otherwise provided in the statutes that should be considered, when applicable, at the omnibus hearing. Subsection (5) grants the court discretion to rule on the motion summarily or to establish a briefing schedule and subsequent hearing.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 at end of (1)(g) substituted "persistent felony offender status, 46-13-108" for "enhanced punishment, 46-13-503"; and in (1)(h) substituted "46-13-109" for "46-13-503".

Case Notes

Factual Basis for Amended Charge Same as Factual Basis for Initial Charge — Second Omnibus Hearing Not Required: Adkins was originally arraigned on a charge of intent to distribute dangerous drugs, which was predicated on Adkins' possession of dangerous drugs, and an omnibus hearing was held on the charge. The state subsequently dropped the intent to distribute charge and amended the information to include only a straight possession charge. Adkins contended that a second omnibus hearing was required on the possession charge. The Supreme Court disagreed. The factual basis for the straight possession charge was identical to the factual basis underlying the intent to distribute charge for which an omnibus hearing had been held. Therefore, when the state amends an information to charge an alternate lesser included offense that is supported by an identical factual basis, a new omnibus hearing is not required. St. v. Adkins, 2009 MT 71, 349 M 444, 204 P3d 1 (2009).

Filing of Amended Information — New Omnibus Hearing or Persistent Felony Offender Notice Not Required: Potter asserted that because he was not notified anew that the state would seek a persistent felony offender designation following the filing of an amended information adding an additional felony charge, the trial court erred in sentencing him as a persistent felony offender. The Supreme Court disagreed. Nothing in statute requires either a new omnibus hearing or a new persistent felony offender notice upon the filing of an amended information. Potter knew for over a year that the state would seek a persistent felony offender designation, and nothing in the record indicated that he was prejudiced by the timing of the notice. The persistent felony offender designation was affirmed. St. v. Potter, 2008 MT 381, 347 M 38, 197 P3d 471 (2008).

Failure to Meet Statutory Duty to Bring Defense, Objection, or Request at or Before Omnibus Hearing Constituting Waiver: A party has a statutory duty to bring any defense, objection, or request that is capable of determination without trial of the general issue, including motions to suppress, at or before the omnibus hearing or by a later date if ordered by the court, and failure to do so constitutes a waiver. Here, defendant's motion to suppress was filed after both the date of the omnibus hearing and a later deadline for motions set by the District Court, but 6 months before the actual trial. Nevertheless, the motion was untimely as a matter of law, and the District Court did not err in denying relief from the waiver. St. v. VonBergen, 2003 MT 265, 317 M 445, 77 P3d 537 (2003), followed in St. v. Adkins, 2009 MT 71, 349 M 444, 204 P3d 1 (2009).

No Error in Denial of Untimely Midtrial Motion to Suppress Evidence: Motions to suppress are expressly among pretrial matters that must be raised at or before the omnibus hearing. Griffing indicated an intent to file motions to suppress his confession and physical evidence pursuant to 46-13-301 and 46-13-302, but the motions were not made until trial had commenced. Failure to raise the issues at or before the omnibus hearing constituted a waiver under 46-13-101. Thus, the trial court did not err in denying the midtrial motion to suppress as untimely. St. v. Griffing, 1998 MT 75, 288 M 213, 955 P2d 1388, 55 St. Rep. 309 (1998), following St. v. Greywater, 282 M 28, 939 P2d 975 (1997).

Lack of Omnibus Hearing Not Prejudicial — Adequate Notice and Presentation of Case: Defendant claimed error because no omnibus hearing was held in his criminal case, which prejudiced his opportunities for preparation of a timely defense and led to surprise when the state attempted to introduce certain physical evidence at trial. One of the purposes of the omnibus hearing is to discuss the use of evidence regarding other bad acts. In this case, the acts were other sexual assaults defendant had purportedly committed. Twenty days before trial, the state gave notice to defendant, pursuant to St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), of its intent to use the evidence of other bad acts, which constituted ample notice and opportunity for defendant to prepare for that evidence. Defendant's claim of lack of ability to confront the witness failed because the Van Pelt exception to the rape shield law did not apply in this case because the defendant did not contend that the victim made accusations that had been adjudicated as false prior to trial. Defendant's argument of surprise also failed because even though he was not made aware at an omnibus hearing of the state's intent to introduce the rape victim's clothing as evidence, his objection to introduction of the evidence at trial was sustained and the evidence excluded. Defendant was not prejudiced by the lack of an omnibus hearing. St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994).

No Prejudice in Holding Omnibus Hearing Three Days Prior to Trial: Defendant argued that the holding of an omnibus hearing at least 30 days prior to trial as required by this section rather than 3 days before trial would have ensured timely consideration of pretrial motions and issues and would have avoided confusion and error. Noting that the purpose of the omnibus hearing is to expedite the procedures leading up to trial, the Supreme Court found that all pretrial motions were raised, argued, considered, and disposed of at the hearing and that nothing in the record demonstrated that defendant was prejudiced by the disposition of those matters 3 days rather than at least 30 days prior to trial. St. v. Sullivan, 266 M 313, 880 P2d 829, 51 St. Rep. 827 (1994).

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: This part governs motions for a change of place of trial. While the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure were considered, these statutes are largely modeled after the 1987 code. The statutes do not retain the general procedural requirements applicable to all pretrial motions. The statutes do establish a new provision for a return of the trial to the county in which the charge was originally filed. Established procedure, however, should not be affected by the adoption of these provisions.

Part Case Notes

Failure of Trial Court to Address Issues Raised in Defendant's Pro Se Petition — Reversible Error: After being charged with failure to register as a sexual offender, Samples was granted the opportunity to file a pretrial pro se petition addressing the ex post facto application of Title 46, ch. 23, part 5, as well as a variety of other constitutional challenges to the sexual offender registration law. The District Court substantively discussed and rejected Samples' ex post facto argument, refused to discuss the other constitutional concerns, and denied the petition. Following denial of the petition, Samples pleaded guilty, but reserved the right to appeal the ruling on the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that, even though the District Court could have refused to allow the pro se motion, once the District Court expressly authorized Samples to file a pro se motion challenging the constitutionality of the sexual offender registration law, the court was obligated to address the constitutional issues raised in the petition. Failure of the District Court to consider all of the constitutional issues raised in the petition was reversible error, and the case was remanded for consideration of all issues raised by Samples in the petition. St. v. Samples, 2005 MT 210, 328 M 242, 119 P3d 1191 (2005).

This section utilizes a general approach. It is comprehensive and at the same time should not harm either party by outlining pre-planned excuses that might be cause for continuance. If something has occurred that makes it difficult or impossible to meet established dates set for a case this "something" should be brought to the attention of the trial court and a ruling made. An example of the various kinds of reasons that might be grounds for a continuance are loss of a material witness, death or illness of the attorneys, or pre-trial publicity.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 in first sentence of (1) substituted "prosecutor" for "state"; near end of (3) substituted "prosecution" for "state"; and made minor changes in style.

GENERAL

Continuation of Trial Not Double Jeopardy Violation: Based on pretrial conversations with both counsel, a Justice's Court Judge anticipated an abbreviated bench trial designed to get Barron's DUI case through Justice's Court as quickly as possible so that Barron could then receive a trial de novo in District Court. However, defense counsel immediately began lodging objections, and the judge realized that the proceedings would not be quickly resolved. After concluding that neither party was ready for a more full-blown proceeding, the judge decided in the interests of justice to continue the trial to another date when the parties could be more fully prepared and more time could be allotted for trial. Defense counsel subsequently objected to the continuance on double jeopardy grounds, and following conviction and appeal to District Court, defense counsel again raised the issue, asserting that the trial following the continuation in Justice's Court constituted double jeopardy and warranted dismissal of the charges. The District Court declined to dismiss the charges, and Barron appealed. The Supreme Court considered whether Barron had been subjected to double jeopardy when the Justice's Court continued the initial bench trial and decided that no double jeopardy violation occurred. The trial following the lawful continuance did not constitute a new trial because the Justice's Court did not issue any findings or reach a verdict following the initial hearing, the state did not use the continuance to encourage the judge to reexamine evidence presented in the initial hearing, and Barron was not subjected to multiple punishments for the same offense. Double jeopardy did not apply because Barron was not subject to a second or successive trial on the underlying charges. St. v. Barron, 2008 MT 69, 342 M 100, 179 P3d 519 (2008).

No Assurance of Witness's Availability to Testify or Aid Defense — Motion for Continuance Properly Denied: After presenting his case at trial, Toulouse requested a continuance in order to allow his sister, who was sick with cancer, to testify the following day. The trial court granted a 15-minute recess to inquire whether the sister would be able to testify, but Toulouse could give no reasonable assurance that she would, so the continuance motion was denied. Following conviction, Toulouse appealed on grounds that he was denied a fair trial when the motion for continuance was denied, but the Supreme Court affirmed. A defendant moving for a continuance to secure an absent witness must demonstrate that a reasonable expectation or prospect of obtaining the presence of the witness exists, that the witness would testify, and that the witness's testimony would help the defense, and Toulouse did not meet this burden. Additionally, under 25-4-501, when a party moves to postpone a trial on the grounds of absence of evidence, such as an absent witness, the motion may be made only upon an affidavit showing the materiality of the evidence expected to be obtained and that due diligence has been used to procure it. Toulouse failed to file an affidavit or to meet the other statutory criteria, so the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion for continuance. St. v. Toulouse, 2005 MT 166, 327 M 467, 115 P3d 197 (2005), following St. v. Fields, 2002 MT 84, 309 M 300, 46 P3d 612 (2002).

Failure of Defense Counsel to Diligently Obtain Requisite Witness Information — Motion for Continuance Properly Denied: Three days before Earl's trial for sexual assault, Earl learned of the existence of various witness statements that he did not have copies of. Earl moved for a continuance for additional time to review the statements. The motion was denied, and Earl appealed, arguing that the continuance should have been granted in the interests of justice. The Supreme Court disagreed. The District Court was required to consider not only the interests of justice, but also the diligence shown by the movant. The record showed that Earl's counsel did not make a diligent effort to obtain the requisite information, despite the state's recognized open file policy, nor did Earl present a compelling argument that the interests of justice mandated a continuance. Thus, denial of the continuance motion was affirmed. St. v. Earl, 2003 MT 158, 316 M 263, 71 P3d 1201 (2003).

Motion for Continuance Not Granted Absent Showing of Necessity: Three taped interviews were conducted with a sexual assault victim. The first two related to Baker's alleged assault of the victim, while the third related to separate allegations that the victim had also been abused by a family member, although Baker's name was also mentioned. Baker was not provided with a copy or transcript of the third interview prior to trial. When that information came out at trial, Baker moved for a continuance of the trial in order to review the transcript. The motion was denied, but Baker was provided a copy and viewed it during a 2-hour break. The court expressed its willingness to reconsider the motion after the break if Baker determined more time was needed to prepare. Following the break and Baker's review of the transcript, Baker again moved for a continuance. The court reserved its ruling until after presentation of the state's case in chief, but never ruled on the motion, nor did Baker ever renew the motion or request the court to rule on the motion. On appeal, Baker contended that the court erred by failing to grant a continuance. The Supreme Court held that no error occurred because by not renewing the motion or requesting a ruling on the motion, Baker tacitly conceded that he did not need more time to prepare, thereby failing to establish the necessity for a continuance. St. v. Baker, 2000 MT 235, 301 M 323, 8 P3d 817, 57 St. Rep. 976 (2000).

Failure to Request Continuance of Trial Date — Issue Not Properly Raised or Preserved for Appeal: At a change of plea hearing 1 day before trial, Root requested that the public defender be removed and informed the court that he was seeking private counsel. The court postponed trial for 1 week, informing Root that if private counsel were retained, counsel must be ready for trial as scheduled. In the notice of substitution of counsel, Root's new counsel expressly stated an awareness of the trial date and the intention to be prepared to proceed that day. Root was convicted. On appeal, Root alleged error in the court's failure to grant a continuance of the trial. The Supreme Court noted that the trial court, either on its own motion or by granting what it considered a motion for continuance, did postpone the trial for an additional week upon learning that Root was seeking substitute counsel. Further, Root never requested a continuance, so the trial court could not be put in error on appeal regarding an issue that it had no opportunity to address. St. v. Root, 1999 MT 203, 296 M 1, 987 P2d 1140, 56 St. Rep. 792 (1999). See also St. v. Rodgers, 257 M 413, 849 P2d 1028, 50 St. Rep. 335 (1993).

Right to Speedy Trial Violated — Dismissal Correct: Defendant was charged with alternate counts of forgery or theft. After a 298-day delay, attributable solely to the state, defendant moved to dismiss for lack of speedy trial, and the District Court granted the motion. The state appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. When the delay resulted from the court's failure to arraign the defendant, from its failure to rule on the defendant's pretrial motions, and from the prosecution's lack of diligence, the District Court was correct in granting the defendant's speedy trial motion and in dismissing the charges with prejudice. The Barker v. Wingo factors applied. St. v. Matthews, 271 M 24, 894 P2d 285, 52 St. Rep. 305 (1995).

Videotaped Testimony — No Demonstration of Prejudice: Defendant claimed that he was prejudiced by the District Court's denial of his motion for continuance made on the day that videotaped testimony was to be made. When defendant failed to demonstrate prejudice on appeal, the Supreme Court ruled that the District Court did not err in denying the motion for continuance. St. v. Scott, 257 M 454, 850 P2d 286, 50 St. Rep. 353 (1993).

Continuance Sought to Allow Investigator More Time: The defendant contended that the trial court erred in not granting his request for a continuance to allow his special investigator more time. The Supreme Court affirmed the trial court on the basis of the lower court's findings that the motion was not timely, the defendant had not been diligent in his trial preparation, and the continuance would inconvenience many witnesses. St. v. LaPier, 242 M 335, 790 P2d 983, 47 St. Rep. 760 (1990).

Minimal Diligence of Movant — Motion for Continuance Denied: This section clearly allows the District Court to exercise discretion in granting or denying a motion for continuance after considering the diligence put forth by the movant. Where a trial date had already been rescheduled twice, the court properly denied a motion for continuance when defendant offered no evidence or argument that he exercised due diligence in pursuing a psychological evaluation and no formal affidavit was submitted as required by 25-4-501. St. v. French, 233 M 364, 760 P2d 86, 45 St. Rep. 1557 (1988), followed in St. v. Haskins, 255 M 202, 841 P2d 542, 49 St. Rep. 922 (1992).

Period of Delay Following Grant of Continuance Chargeable Against Defendant: Where trial would have occurred within 6 months of the filing of the charge had defendant not moved for continuance, the period of delay was chargeable to defendant and the state did not have the burden of explaining the delay or showing absence of prejudice to defendant. St. v. Moehr, 227 M 253, 738 P2d 499, 44 St. Rep. 1058 (1987).

Pro Se Defendant — No Prejudice to Deny Motion for Continuance: Pro se defendant requested continuance so he could file proposed jury instructions. The motion was supported with the reason that because of all his other pending lawsuits, he did not have time to prepare the proposed instructions. The Supreme Court held that the defendant was not prejudiced by denial of the motion when over 4 months elapsed between arrest and trial. St. v. Lance, 222 M 92, 721 P2d 1258, 43 St. Rep. 1086 (1986).

Delay Charged to Defendant Who Waived Speedy Trial Right: No denial of defendant's right to speedy trial occurred where defendant had previously filed multiple waivers of his right to speedy trial, pending a great number of motions and voluminous supporting briefs, and subsequently was granted an extension to allow substitution of counsel, which resulted in an additional 2-month delay. St. v. Harvey, 219 M 402, 713 P2d 517, 43 St. Rep. 46 (1986).

Judge, Jury, and Prosecutor Failing to Appear for Trial — Not Grounds for Dismissal — Continuance Without Notice: Defendant moved to dismiss because on the date originally set for trial the defendant, his attorney, and witnesses appeared, but for disputed reasons the judge, jury, and prosecution failed to appear. The District Court was correct in denying the motion because there was no delay prejudicing defendant's right to a speedy trial, and although it would be advisable, there is no rule that courts must give notice of continuances. St. v. Roll, 206 M 259, 670 P2d 566, 40 St. Rep. 1635 (1983).

Burden of Showing Prior Due Diligence: Before a motion for a continuance will be granted, the movant must show that he has employed due diligence to procure that which he requests additional time to procure. St. v. Klemann, 194 M 117, 634 P2d 632, 38 St. Rep. 1627 (1981), followed in St. v. Strandberg, 223 M 132, 724 P2d 710, 43 St. Rep. 1591 (1986), and in St. v. McPherson, 236 M 484, 771 P2d 120, 46 St. Rep. 525 (1989).

Circumstances of Each Case to Be Considered: Decision whether denial of a continuance was so arbitrary as to violate due process depends not on the application of a mechanical test but rather on the circumstances of the particular case, particularly the reasons presented to the trial judge at the time of the request. St. v. Klemann, 194 M 117, 634 P2d 632, 38 St. Rep. 1627 (1981).

Delay in Seeking to Obtain New Counsel: An information was filed on March 20, the case was set for an April 28 trial, was reset to June 9, then to June 16, and then to June 19, when the trial began. On the first morning of the trial, appellant moved for a continuance, mainly on the ground of dissatisfaction with his counsel and a desire to obtain new counsel. The motion for continuance was properly denied because appellant did not show prejudice to himself or arbitrariness on the part of the lower court and did not make the required showing of diligence on his part. St. v. Klemann, 194 M 117, 634 P2d 632, 38 St. Rep. 1627 (1981).

Discretion of Trial Court: A motion for a continuance is addressed to the discretion of the trial court and is not a matter of right. The trial court cannot be overturned on appeal in absence of a showing of prejudice to movant. St. v. Klemann, 194 M 117, 634 P2d 632, 38 St. Rep. 1627 (1981), followed in St. v. Strandberg, 223 M 132, 724 P2d 710, 43 St. Rep. 1591 (1986).
